Preface

This work was commenced; and has been carried forward to completion, with a specific object in view, which was to place upon record, in a reliable manner and in permanent form, whatever incidents of importance have transpired within what are now the limits of Green county since its first settlement. As preliminary to the narrative proper, it was thought best to give a succinct history of the State at large, including an account of its pre-historic earthworks, of the early visitations of the fur trader and missionary, and of the jurisdictions exercised over this region by different governments; also, of the important; incidents transpiring here while the Territory of Wisconsin was in existence. This part of the work is from the pen of Prof. C. W. Butterfield, of Madison, Wisconsin.

In the general history of the county, as well as in the sketches of its city, towns and villages, the reader will find that incidents, reminiscences and anecdotes are recorded with a variety and completeness commensurate with their importance. Herein is furnished (and this is said with confidence) to the present generation and to those which follow it, a valuable reflex of the times and deeds of the pioneers. It has been truly said that “a people that take no pride in the noble achievements of remote ancestors will never achieve anything to be remembered with pride by remote descendants.” It is believed that, in the following pages, there is erected a lasting monument to the memory of the pioneer men and women of Green county.

The resolutions passed by Congress in 1876, in reference to the preparation and preservation of local history, and the proclamation of the President of the United States recommending that those resolutions be carefully observed, have met with the very general and hearty approval of the people.’ Indeed, so acceptable has seemed this advice of our law-makers, that steps have already been taken in almost every thoroughly organized community throughout the land to chronicle and place in permanent form the annals of each neighborhood; thus rescuing from oblivion much interesting and valuable information that otherwise would have been irretrievably lost.

It was thought there could be no good reason why the annals of Green county should not be placed on as enduring a foundation as those of surrounding counties; and to this end, no expense or pains have been spared to render this history worthy of patronage. That portion of the work which relates to the county generally (including the whole of the first twenty-eight chapters) has been prepared and edited by Prof. C. W. Butterfield—"whose reputation as a writer of history," says the Monroe Sentinel, "was well established before he came to Green county to prepare its chronicles." A number of experienced writers under the guidance of George A. Ogle, Esq., have had charge of the sketches relating especially to the city, towns and villages. The whole book has been submitted to county and town committees of citizens for revision, thus insuring correctness and adding materially to its value.

The labors of all engaged in this enterprise have been cheered by the cordial assistance and good will of many friends—so many, indeed, that, to attempt to name them, would in this connection, be impracticable; to all of whom, grateful acknowledgements are tendered. The officers of the State Historical Society of Wisconsin, have, from the first, been unremitting in their endeavors to aid the undertaking. The newspaper press of the county is entitled to especial mention for their help and encouragement so generously tendered.

HISTORY OF WISCONSIN.

CHAPTER I.

PREHISTORIC AND SETTLEMENT

At a remote period there lived in this country a people now designated mound builders. Of their origin nothing is known. Their history is lost in the lapse of ages. The evidences, however, of their existence in Wisconsin and surrounding States are numerous. Many of their earth works—the so-called mounds—are still to be seen. These are of various forms. Some are regularly arranged, forming squares, octagons and circles; others are like walls or ramparts; while many, especially in Wisconsin, are imitative in figure, having the shape of implements or animals, resembling war clubs, tobacco pipes, beasts, reptiles, fish and even man. A few are in the similitude of trees.

In selecting sites for many of their earth works, the mound-builders appear to have been influenced by motives which prompt civilized men to choose localities for their great marts; hence, Milwaukee and other cities of the west are founded on ruins of pre-existing structures. River terraces and river bottoms seem to have been favorite places for these mounds. Their works are seen in the basin of the Fox river, of the Illinois, and of Rock river and its branches, also in the valley of the Fox river of Green bay, in that of the Wisconsin, as well as near the waters of the Mississippi. As to the object of these earth works, all knowledge rests upon conjecture alone. It is generally believed that some were used for purposes of defense, others for the observance of religious rites and as burial places.

In some parts of Wisconsin are seen earth works of a different character from those usually denominated “mounds.” These, from their supposed use, are styled “garden beds.” They are ridges or beds about six inches in height, and four feet in width. They are arranged methodically and in parallel rows. Some are rectangular in shape; others are in regular curves. These beds occupy fields of various sizes, from ten to a hundred acres.

The mound builders have left other evidences besides mounds and garden beds, to attest their presence in this country, in ages past. In the Lake Superior region exist ancient copper mines, excavations in the solid rock. In these mines have been found stone hammers, wooden bowls and shovels, props and levers for raising and supporting mass copper, and ladders for descending into the pits and ascending from them.

There are, also, scattered widely over the country, numerous relics, evidently the handiwork of these pre-historic people; such as stone axes, stone and copper spear-heads and arrow heads, and various other implements and utensils. As these articles are frequently discovered many feet below the surface of the ground, it argues a high antiquity for the artificers. 'These relics indicate that the mound builders were superior in intelligence to the Indians. None of their implements or utensils, however, point to a "copper age" as having succeeded a "stone age." They all refer alike to one age, the indefinite past; to one people, the mound builders.

There is nothing to connect "the dark backward and abysm" of mound-building times with those of the red race of Wisconsin. And all that is known of the savages inhabiting this section previous to its discovery, is exceedingly dim and shadowy. Upon the extended area bounded by Lake Superior on the north, Lake Michigan on the east, wide-spreading prairies on the south, and the Mississippi river on the west, there met and mingled two distinct Indian families, Algonquins and Dakotas. Concerning the various tribes of these families, nothing of importance could be gleaned by the earliest explorers; at least, very little has been preserved. Tradition, it is true, pointed to the Algonquins as having, at some remote period, migrated from the east, and this has been confirmed by a study of their language. It indicated, also, that the Dakotas, at a time far beyond the memory of the most aged, came from the west or southwest, fighting their way as they came; that one of their tribes once dwelt upon the shores of a sea; but when and for what purpose they left their home for the country of the great lakes there was no evidence. This was all. In reality, therefore, Wisconsin has no veritable history ante-dating its discovery by civilized man. The country has been heard of, but only through vague reports of savages.* There were no accounts at all, besides these, of the extensive region of the upper lakes; while of the valley of the upper Mississippi, nothing whatever was known.

FIRST EXPLORATION OF THE NORTHWEST

The history of Wisconsin commences with the recital of the indomitable perseverance and heroic bravery displayed by its first visitant, John Nicolet. An investigation of the career of this Frenchman shows him, at an early age, leaving his home in Normandy for the new world, landing at Quebec in 1618, and at once seeking a residence among the Algonquins of the Ottawa river, in Canada, sent thither by the governor to learn their language. In the midst of many hardships, and surrounded by perils, he applied himself with great zeal to his task. Having become familiar with the Algonquin tongue, he was admitted into the councils of the savages.

The return of Nicolet to civilization, after a number of years immured in the dark forests of Canada, an excellent interpreter, qualified him to act as government agent among the wild western tribes in promoting peace, to the end that all who had been visited by the fur-trader might remain firm allies of the French. Nay, further: it resulted in his being dispatched to Nations far beyond the Ottawa, known only by hearsay, with whom it was believed might be opened a profitable trade in furs. So he started on his perilous voyage. He visited the Hurons, upon the Georgian bay. With seven of that Nation, he struck boldly into wilds to the northward and westward never before visited by civilized man. He paddled his birch canoe along the eastern coast of Lake Huron and up the St. Mary's Strait to the falls. He floated back to the Straits of Mackinaw and courageously turned his face toward the west. At the Sault de Ste. Marie, he had—the first of white men—set foot upon the soil of the northwest.

Nicolet coasted along the northern shore of Lake Michigan, ascended Green Bay, and finally entered the mouth of Fox river. It was not until he and his swarthy Hurons had urged their frail canoes six days up that stream, that his western exploration was ended. He had, meanwhile, on his way hither, visited a number of tribes; some that had never before been heard of by the French upon the St. Lawrence. With them all he smoked the pipe of peace; with the ancestors of the present Chippewa's, at the Sault; with the Menomonee's, the Winnebago's, the Mascoutin's, in what is now the State of Wisconsin; with the Ottawa's, upon the Manitoulin Islands, and the Nez Perces, upon the east coast of Lake Huron. He made his outward voyage in the summer and fall of 1634, and returned the next year to the St. Lawrence. He did not reach the Wisconsin river, but heard of a "great water" to the westward, which he mistook for the sea. It was, in fact, that stream, and the Mississippi, into which it pours its flood.

"History cannot refrain from saluting Nicolet as a distinguished traveler, who, by his explorations in the northwest, has given clear proofs of his energetic character, and whose merits have not been disputed, although, subsequently, they were temporarily forgotten." The first fruits of his daring were gathered by the Jesuit fathers, even before his death; for, in the autumn of 1641, those of them who were among the Hurons at the head of the Georgian bay of Lake Huron, received a deputation of Indians occupying the "country around a rapid [now known as the 'Sault de Ste. Marie'], in the midst of the channel by which Lake Superior empties into Lake Huron," inviting them to visit their tribe. These missionaries were not displeased with the opportunity thus presented of knowing the countries lying beyond Lake Huron, which no one of them had yet traveled;" so Isaac Jogues and Charles Raymbault were detached to accompany the Chippewa deputies, and view the field simply, not to establish a mission. They passed along the shore of Lake Huron, northward, and pushed as far up St. Mary's strait as the Sault, which they reached after seventeen days' sail from their place of starting. There they—the first white men to visit the northwest after Nicolet—harangued 2,000 Chippewa's and other Algonquins. Upon their return to the St. Lawrence, Jogues was captured by the Iroquois, and Raymbault died on the 22d of October, 1642—a few days before the death of Nicolet.*

WISCONSIN VISITED BY FUR TRADERS AND JESUIT MISSIONARIES

Very faint, indeed, are the gleams which break in upon the darkness surrounding our knowledge of events immediately following the visit of Nicolet, in what is now the State of Wisconsin. that the Winnebago's, soon after his return, made war upon the Nez Perces, killing two of their men, of whom they made a feast, we are assured.* We also know that in 1640, these same Winnebago's were nearly all destroyed by the Illinois; and that the next year, the Pottawattamie took refuge from their homes upon the islands at the mouth of Green bay, with the Chippewa. † This is all. And had it not been for the greed of the fur trader and the zeal of the Jesuit, little more, for many years, probably, would have been learned of the northwest. However, a questioning missionary, took from the lips of an Indian captain ‡ "an account of his having, in the month of June, 1658, set out from Green Bay for the north, passing the rest of the summer and the following winter near Lake Superior;

so called in consequence of being above that of Lake Huron. This Indian informed the Jesuit of the havoc and desolation of the Iroquois war in the west; how it had reduced the Algonquin Nations about Lake Superior and Green bay. The same missionary saw at Quebec, two Frenchmen who had just arrived from the upper countries with 300 Algonquins in sixty canoes, laden with peltries. These fur traders had passed the winter of 1659 on the shores of Lake Superior, during which time they made several trips among the surrounding tribes. In their wanderings they probably visited some of the northern parts of what is now Wisconsin. They saw at six days' journey beyond the lake toward the southwest, a tribe composed of the remainder of the Hurons of the Tobacco Nation, compelled by the Iroquois to abandon Mackinaw and to bury themselves thus deep in the forests, that they could not be found by their enemies. The two traders told the tales they had heard of the ferocious Sioux, and of a great river upon which they dwelt—the great water of Nicolet. Thus a knowledge of the Mississippi began to dawn again upon the civilized world.*

The narratives of the Indian captain and the two Frenchmen induced further exploration two years later when Father Rene Menard attempted to found a mission on Lake Superior, with eight Frenchmen and some Ottawa's. He made his way in 1660 to what is now Keweenaw, Mich. He determined while there to visit some Hurons on the islands at the mouth of Green bay. He sent three of his companions to explore the way. They reached those islands by way of the Menominee river, returning to Keweenaw with discouraging accounts. But Menard resolved to undertake the journey., starting from the lake with one white companion and' some Hurons; he perished, however, in the forest, in what manner is not known, his companion reaching the Green bay islands in safety. White men had floated upon the Menominee, so that the northeastern part of what is now Wisconsin, as well as its interior by Nicolet in 1634, had now been seen by civilized white man†.

FOUNDING OF JESUIT MISSIONS IN WISCONSIN.

In August, 1665, Father Claude Allouez embarked on a mission to the country visited by Menard. Early in September he had reached the Sault de Ste. Marie, and on the first day of October, arrived in the bay of Chegoimegon, at a village of Chippewa's. Here he erected a chapel of bark, establishing the first mission in what is now Wisconsin to which he gave the name of the Holy Spirit. While Allouez had charge of this field, he either visited or saw, at Chegoimegon, scattered bands of Hurons and Ottawa's; also Pottawattamie from Lake Michigan, and the Sacs and Foxes, who lived upon the waters of Fox river of Green bay. He was likewise visited by the Illinois, and at the extremity of Lake Superior he met representatives of the Sioux. 'These declared they dwelt on the banks of the river "Messipi."' Father James Marquette reached Chegoimegon in September, 1669, and took charge of the mission of the Holy Spirit, Allouez proceeding to the Sault de Ste. Marie, intending to establish a mission on the shores of Green bay. He left the Sault Nov. 3, 1669, and on the 25th, reached a Pottawattamie cabin. On the 2d. of December he founded upon the shore of Green bay the mission of St. Francis Xavier, the second one established by him within what are now the limits of Wisconsin. Here Allouez passed the winter. In April, 1670, he founded another mission this one was upon Wolf river, a tributary of the Fox river of Green bay. Here the missionary labored among the Foxes, who had located upon that stream. The mission, the third in the present Wisconsin, he called St. Mark.

In 1671 Father Louis Andre was sent to the missions of St. Francis Xavier and St. Mark, as a co-worker with Allouez. At what is now the village of De Pere, Brown Co., Wis., was located the central station of the mission of St. Francis Xavier. This mission included all the tribes inhabiting the vicinity of Green bay. A rude chapel, the third one within the present limits of Wisconsin, was soon erected. Allouez then left for other fields of labor; but Andre remained here, working with zeal during the summer of 1671. However, during a temporary absence his chapel was burned, but he speedily erected another. Then his dwelling was destroyed, but although he erected another, it soon shared the same fate. He was at this time laboring among the Menomonee's. When he finally left "the bay tribes" is not known. In 1676 Father Charles Albanel was stationed at what is now De Pere, where a new and better chapel was erected than the one left by Andre. In 1680 the mission was supplied by Father James Eryalran, who was recalled in 1687. When he left, his house and chapel were burned by the Winnebago's. It was the end of the mission of St. Francis Xavier. The mission of the Holy Spirit was deserted by Father James Marquette in 1671. It was the end for 170 years of a Roman Catholic mission at Chegoimegon.

WISCONSIN UNDER FRENCH DOMINATION.

In the year 1671, France took formal possession of the whole country of the upper lakes An agent, Daumont de St. Lusson, was dispatched to the distant tribes, proposing a congress of Indian Nations at the Falls of St. Mary, between Lake Huron and Lake Superior. The principal chiefs of the Wisconsin tribes were gathered there by Nicholas Perrot. When all were assembled, it was solemnly announced that the great northwest was placed under the protection of the French government. This was the beginning of French domination 'in what is now Wisconsin. The act of Daumont de St. Lusson, at the Falls of St. Mary, in 1671, in establishing the right of France to the regions beyond Lake Michigan, not being regarded as sufficiently definite, Nicholas Perrot, in 1689, at the head of Green bay, again took possession of the country, extending the dominion of New France, not only over the territory of the upper Mississippi, but to other places more remote;" so that then, all that is now included within the boundaries of the State of Wisconsin (and much more) passed quietly into the possession of the French king.

No fur-trader or missionary, no white man, had as yet reached the Mississippi above the mouth of the Illinois river. But the time for its exploration was at hand. Civilized men were now to behold its vast tribute rolling onward toward the Gulf of Mexico. These men were Louis Joliet and James Marquette. Joliet came from Quebec, having been appointed by the government to "discover" the Mississippi. He found Marquette on the north side of the straits of Mackinaw, laboring as a missionary among the Indians. The latter was solicited and readily agreed to accompany Joliet upon his expedition.* The outfit of the party was very simple: two birch-bark canoes and a supply of smoked meat and Indian corn. They had with them five white men. They began their voyage on the 17th day of May, 1673. Passing into Lake Michigan, they coasted along its northern shore, and paddled their canoes up Green bay and Fox river to the portage. They then crossed to the Wisconsin, down which they floated, until, on the 17th of June, they entered the Mississippi. After dropping down the river many miles, they returned by way of the Illinois and Lake Michigan to Green bay, where Marquette remained to recruit his strength, while Joliet returned to Quebec to make known the extent of his discoveries.

Fontenac's report of Joliet's return from a voyage to discover the South sea, dated Nov. 14, 1674, is as follows:

"Sieur Joliet, whom Monsieur Talon advised me, on my arrival from France, to dispatch for

* That Count Fontenac, governor of New France, and M. Tolon, intendant, should have expressed a wish to Joliet that Father Marquette be invited to accompany him in his contemplated journey, is to be inferred from the words of the missionary; but nothing in the orders of these officers to Joliet is found to confirm the statement.

HISTORY OF WISCONSIN.

the discovery of the South sea, has returned three months ago, and discovered some very fine countries, and a navigation so easy through the beautiful rivers he has found, that a person can go from Lake Ontario and Fort Fontenac in a bark to the Gulf of Mexico, there being only one carrying place, half a league in length, where Lake Ontario communicates with Lake Erie. These are projects which it will be possible to effect when peace shall be firmly established and whenever it will please the king to prosecute these discoveries. Joliet has been within ten days' journey of the Gulf of Mexico, and believes that water communications could be found leading to the Vermilion and California seas, by means of the river that flows from the west [the Missouri] into the grand river [the Mississippi] that he discovered, which runs from north to south, and is as large as the St. Lawrence opposite Quebec.

"I send you by my secretary the map he has made of it, and the observations he has been able to recollect, as he has lost all his minutes and journals in the shipwreck he suffered within sight of Montreal, where, after having completed a voyage of twelve hundred leagues, he was near being drowned, and lost all his papers and a little Indian, whom he brought from those countries. These accidents have caused me great regret. Joliet left with the fathers at the Sault de Ste. Marie, in Lake Superior, copies of his journals; these we cannot get before next year. You will glean from them additional particulars of this discovery, in which he has very well acquitted himself."

It is not known that the copies of Joliet's journals, mentioned in Frontenac's report, were delivered to the French government; but an account of the voyage by Marquette was published in 1681 by Thevenat. This fact* has caused an undue importance to be attached to the name of the missionary in connection with the discovery of the Mississippi, and at the expense of the fame of Joliet.

"The Count of Fontenac," says Shea (Wis. Hist. Coil., Vol. VII. page 119), "on the 14th of November, [1674] in a Explorations begun by Joliet were continued. La Salle, in 1679, with Father Louis Hennepin, coasted along the western shore of Lake Michigan, landing frequently. The return of Henry de Tonty, one of La Salle's party, down the same coast to Green bay, from the Illinois, followed in 1680. The same year, Father Hennepin from the upper Mississippi, whither he had gone from the Illinois, made his way across what is now Wisconsin, by the Wisconsin and Fox rivers to Green bay.

He was accompanied by Daniel Greysolon Duluth, who, on his way down the Mississippi had met Hennepin in September, 1678. Duluth left Quebec to explore, under the authority of the governor of New France, the region of the upper Mississippi, and establish relations of friendship with the Sioux and their kindred, the Assiniboines. In the summer of 1679 he was in the Sioux country and early in the autumn of that year at the head of Lake Superior holding an Indian council. In June, 1680, he set out from that point to continue his explorations. Going down the Mississippi he met with Hennepin, as stated above, journeyed with him to the Jesuit station, near the head of Green bay, across what is now the State of Wisconsin. Following the voyages of Hennepin and Duluth was the one by Le Sueur, in 1683, from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi, ascending that river to the Sioux country in the region about St. Anthony, and his subsequent establishment, said to have been in 1693, at La Pointe, in the present Ashland Co., Wis. He was, at least, a voyageur stationed at Chegoimegon during that year. He continued to trade with the Sioux at intervals to the year 1702†.

dispatch to Colbert announced the successful issue of Joliet's expedition; "but Shea then adds: "They had to wait for full details till the account drawn up by Father Marquette should be sent down," as though such an account was really expected; but the fact was, as stated by Fontenac himself, that copies of Joliet's journals were what was looked for,

Nicholas Perrot was again in the northwest in 1684. He was commissioned to have chief command, not only "at the bay," but also upon the Mississippi, on the east side of which stream, at the foot of Lake Pepin, he erected a post. Here he spent the winter of 1685—6. The next year he had returned to Green bay. He vibrated between Montreal and the west until 1697. In 1699 St. Cosme and his companions coasted along the west shore of Lake Michigan. Other explorations followed, but generally in the tracks of previous ones. Except at "the bay," there was not so long as the French had dominion over the northwest, a single post occupied for any length of time by regular soldiers. This post was called Fort St. Francis. There were other stockades—one at La Pointe in 1726, and, as we have already seen one upon the Mississippi; but neither of these had cannon. At the commencement of the French and Indian War, all three had disappeared. At the ending of hostilities, in 1760, there was not a single vestige of civilization within what are now the bounds of Wisconsin, except a few vagrant Frenchmen among the Indians; there was no post; no settlement, west of Lake Michigan. But before dismissing the subject of French supremacy in the northwest, it is proper to mention the hostility that for a number of years existed between the Fox Indians and Frenchmen.

In the year 1693, several fur-traders were plundered by the Fox Indians (located upon Fox river of Green bay), while on their way to the Sioux; the Foxes alleging that the Frenchmen were carrying arms to their ancient enemies. We bear no more of their hostility to the French until early in the spring of 1712, when they and some Mascoutin's, laid a plan to burn the fort at Detroit. It was besieged for nineteen days by these savages, but the besiegers were obliged finally to retreat, as their provisions had become exhausted. They were pursued, however, and near Lake St. Clair suffered a signal defeat at the hands of M. Dubisson and his Indian allies. The Marquis do Vaudreuil, now that the Foxes continued their hostilities, determined on a war of extermination against them. De Lourigny, a lieutenant, left Quebec in March, 1716. He made his way with alacrity, entering Green bay and Fox river, it is said, with a force of 800 French and Indians, encountering the enemy in a palisaded fort, which would have been soon reduced had not the Foxes asked for peace. Hostages were given, and Lourigny returned to Quebec. In 1721 the war was renewed, and in 1728 another expedition was organized against these savages, commanded by Marchemond de Lignery. This officer proceeded by way of the Ottawa river of Canada and Lake Huron to Green bay, upon the northern shore of which the Menominee's, who had also become hostile were attacked and defeated. On the 24th of August, a Winnebago village on Fox river was reached by De Lignery with a force of 400 French and 750 Indians. They proceeded thence up the river to the home of the Foxes, but did not succeed in meeting the enemy in force. The expedition was a signal failure. But the march of Neyon de Villiers, in 1730, against the Foxes, was more successful, resulting in their defeat. They suffered a loss of 200 killed of warriors, and three times as many women and children. Still the Foxes were not humbled. Another expedition, this time under the direction of Capt. De Noyelle, marched against them in 1735. The result was not decisive. Many places have been designated upon Fox river as points where conflicts between the French and their allies, and the Foxes and their allies took place; but all such designations are traditionary and uncertain. The Sacs and Foxes finally became connected with the government of Canada, and during the French and Indian War were arrayed against the English.

over the northwest passed from France to Great Britain. But in what is now Wisconsin there was little besides savages to be affected by the change. The vagrant fur-trader represented all that there was of civilization west of Lake Michigan. Detroit was soon taken possession of; then Mackinaw, and finally, in 1761, a squad of English soldiers reached the head of Green bay, to garrison the tumble-down post, where now is Fort Howard, Brown Co., Wis. This was on October 12 of the year just mentioned. Lieut. James Gorrell and one sergeant, one corporal and fifteen privates constituted the "army of occupation" for the whole country west of Lake Michigan from this time to June 21, 1783, when the post was abandoned by the commandant on account of the breaking out of Pontiac's War, and the capture of the fort at Mackinaw by the savages. The cause of the war was this: The Indian tribes saw the danger which the downfall of the French interests in Canada was sure to bring them. They banded together under Pontiac to avert their ruin. The struggle was short but fierce—full of "scenes of tragic interest, with marvels of suffering and vicissitude, of heroism and endurance; "but the white man conquered. The moving incidents in this bloody drama were enacted to the eastward of what is now Wisconsin, coming no nearer than Mackinaw, but it resulted in the evacuation of its territory by British troops, who never after took possession of it, though they continued until 1796 a nominal military rule over it after Mackinaw was again occupied by them.

No sooner had the soldiers under Gorrell left the bay than French traders seized upon the occasion to again make it headquarters for traffic in furs to the westward of Lake Michigan. Not that only, for a few determined to make it their permanent home. By the year 1766 there were some families living in the decayed Fort Edward Augustus and opposite thereto, on the east side of Fox river, where they cultivated the soil in a small way and in an extremely primitive manner, living, now that peace was again restored, very comfortably. Of these French Canadians, no one can be considered as the pioneer—no one is entitled to the renown of having first led the way, becoming, therefore the first settler of the State, much less the father and founder of Wisconsin. It was simply that "the bay," being, after Pontiac's war, occupied by Canadian French fur-traders, their station finally ripened into a permanent settlement—the first in Wisconsin—the leading spirits of which were the two Langlades, Augustin and Charles, father and son. It had all the characteristics of a French settlement. Its growth was very slow. The industries were few and simple. Besides the employments of trading and transporting goods and peltries, the inhabitants engaged in hunting and trapping. Attention was given to the cultivation of the soil only incidentally. Gardens were cultivated to some extent for a supply of vegetables. Gradually, however, a few persons turned their chief attention to agriculture.*

In 1783 four white persons occupied in a permanent manner the tract of land where now is Prairie du Chien, in Crawford Co., Wis. They were soon followed by a number of persons who located there. These became permanent traders with the Indians.

Besides the settlement at "the bay" and one at Prairie du Chien some French traders were located where Milwaukee now is in 1795, but they could hardly be called settlers. Ten years before that date Laurence Barth lived at the portage between the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, now the site of Portage, Columbia Co., Wis., where he was engaged in the carrying trade. But his residence could not fairly be termed a settlement; so that when, in 1796, the English yielded possession of what is now Wisconsin to the Americans (a nominal one, however, there were really but two settlements— Green Bay and Prairie du Chien.

WISCONSIN AS A PART OF THE NORTHWEST TERRITORY.

The Congress of the United States, by their act of the 6th day of September, 1780, recommended to the several States in the Union having claims to waste and unappropriated lands in the western country, a liberal cession to the general government of a portion of their respective claims for the common benefit of the Union. The claiming States were Connecticut, New York and Virginia, all under their colonial charters, and the last mentioned, in addition thereto, by right of conquest of the Illinois country. The region contended for lay to the northwest of the river Ohio. Virginia claimed territory westward to the Mississippi and northward to a somewhat indefinite extent. New York, and especially Connecticut, laid claim to territory stretching away to an unbounded extent westward, but not so far to the south as Virginia. The last mentioned State, by virtue of conquests largely her own, extended her jurisdiction over the Illinois settlements in 1778, and the year after, and erected into a county enough to include all her conquests. But, what is now the State of Wisconsin, she certainly did not exercise dominion over. The three States finally ceded all their rights to the United States, leaving the general government absolute owner of the whole country, subject only to the rights, such as they were, of the Indian Nations who dwelt therein.

Under a congressional ordinance, passed in 1785, for ascertaining the mode of disposing of lands in the western territory, the geographer of the United States was directed to commence the survey of them immediately beyond the Ohio river, upon the plan which has ever since been followed by the general government, resulting in regular latitudinal and longitudinal lines being run, so as to circumscribe every 640 acres of land, not only in Wisconsin but in all the west, wherever these surveys have been brought to completion. Two years subsequent to the passage of the first ordinance, was that of another and more famous one, providing for the government of the territory northwest of the river Ohio. This is familiarly known as the ordinance of 1787; and to this day it is apart of the fundamental law of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin, the five states since formed out of the region included within the limits affected by its provisions;—an act of Congress, passed in 1789, having adapted it to the constitution of the United States. But neither the treaty with Great Britain of 1783, nor the ordinances of Congress which followed, gave the United States anything more than constructive possession of the whole of its western territory. The mother country, it is true, recognized the northern lakes as the boundary between her possessions and those of the now independent states, but finding an excuse in the fact of some of her merchants not being paid their claims as stipulated by the treaty of 1783, she retained possession of the whole northwest, including what is now Wisconsin, until 1796.

By the ordinance of 1787, the United States in Congress assembled declared that the territory northwest of the Ohio, should, for the purposes of temporary government, be one district, subject, however, to be divided into districts, as future circumstances might, in the opinion of Congress, make it expedient. It was ordained, that a governor, secretary and three judges should be appointed for the territory; a general assembly was also provided for; and it was declared that religion, morality and knowledge, being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education should forever be encouraged. It was also ordained that there should be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the territory, “otherwise than in the punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted.” But this organic law was of course nugatory over that portion of the territory occupied by the British, and so continued until the latter yielded possession, and in fact, for some time subsequent thereto

By the treaty agreed upon in 1794, between the United States and Great Britain, usually known as the Jay treaty, the evacuation of the posts and places occupied by British troops and garrisons in the northwest, was to take place on or before the 1st day of June, 1796. All settlers and traders within the precincts or jurisdiction of these posts were to continue to enjoy unmolested, all their property of every kind, and to be protected therein. They were at full liberty to remain there, or to remove with all or any part of their effects; and it was left free to them to sell their lands, houses, or effects, or to retain the property thereof, at their discretion. Such of them as should continue to reside there were not to be compelled to become citizens of the United States, or to take any oath of allegiance to the government thereof; but were at full liberty so to do if they thought proper; and they were to make and declare their election within one year after the evacuation of the posts by the military. Persons continuing after the expiration of one year without having declared their intentions of remaining subjects of his Britannic majesty, were to be considered as having elected to become citizens of the United States. It is believed that no citizen of Wisconsin, either in the settlement at "the bay" or at Prairie du Chien made such a declaration, but that all who remained, became thereby citizens of the new government.

The Indian war in the west; which followed the Revolution, was brought to an end by the victorious arms of Gen. Anthony Wayne, upon the banks of the Maumee river, in what is now the State of Ohio, in the year 1794. the treaty of Greenville was entered into the next year with twelve western tribes of Indians, none of which resided in Wisconsin. Nevertheless, one of the provisions of the treaty was that, in consideration of the peace then established and the cessations and the relinquishments of lands made by the Indian tribes there represented, and to manifest the liberality of the United States, claims to all Indian lands northward of the Ohio, eastward of the Mississippi, and westward and southward of the great lakes and the waters uniting them, were relinquished by the general government to the Indians having a right thereto. This included all the lands within the present boundaries of Wisconsin. The meaning of the relinquishment by the United States was that the Indian tribes who had a right to those lands were quietly to enjoy them, hunting, planting and dwelling thereon as long as they pleased, without any molestation from the general government; but when any tribe should be disposed to sell its lands, or any part of them, they were to be sold only to the United States; and until such sale, the general government would protect all the Indian tribes in the quiet enjoyment of their land against all citizens of the country, and against all other white persons who might intrude upon them. And if any citizen of the United States, or any other white person or persons should presume to settle upon the lands then relinquished by the general government, such citizens or other persons should be out of the protection of the United States; and the Indian tribe on whose land the settlement might be made might drive off the settler, or punish him in such manner as they might think fit; and because such settlements made without the consent of the general government would be injurious to them as well as to the Indians, the United States should be at liberty to break them up, and remove and punish the settlers, as they might think proper.

The titles of the Indians to their lands were thus acknowledged; and they were unquestionable, because treaties made, or to be made with the various tribes had been declared by the constitution of the United States, the supreme law of the land. But those titles could only be yielded to the general government. The principal question to be afterward determined was, what lands were each tribe the rightful owners of. So long as Wisconsin formed a part of the northwestern territory, no treaty was made by the United States with any tribe or tribes occupying any portion of the country now lying within the limits of Wisconsin.

When, in 1796, Great Britain yielded possession of the 'north west by withdrawing its garrisons from the military posts therein, in pursuance of the Jay treaty of 1794, and the United States took formal possession thereof, the change in the political relations of the few settlers of Green Bay and Prairie du Chien was not felt by them. They had become the adopted citizens of the United States without any realization further than a bare knowledge of the fact. British authority had been so little exercised in their domestic affairs, that its withdrawal was unnoticed, while that of the United States only reached them in name. Nearly all who were engaged in the fur trade were agents or employees of the British fur companies, and their relation to these remained unbroken. No intercourse for several years sprung up with the Americans.

Under the ordinance of 1787, Arthur St. Clair was appointed governor of the northwestern territory. At different periods counties were erected to include various portions of that region of country. By the governor's proclamation of the 15th of August, 1796, one was formed to include the whole of the present area of northern Ohio, west of a point where the city of Cleveland is now located; also all of the present State of Indiana, north of a line drawn from Fort Wayne, "west-northerly to the southern part of Lake Michigan," the whole of what is now the State of Michigan, except the extreme northwest corner on Lake Superior; a small corner in the northeast part of the present State of Illinois, including Chicago; and so much of what is now Wisconsin as is watered by the streams flowing into Lake Michigan, which included an extensive portion of its area, taking in the territory now constituting many of its eastern and interior counties. To this county was given the name of Wayne. The citizens at the head of Green bay, from 1796, until the 4th of July, 1800, were, therefore, residents of Wayne county, Northwest territory. But the western portion of the present State of Wisconsin, including all its area watered by streams flowing northward into Lake Superior. and westward and southwestward into the Mississippi, was during those years attached to no county whatever. Within this part of the State was located, of course, the settlement of Prairie du Chien.

WISCONSIN AS A PART OF THE TERRITORY OF INDIANA.

After the fourth day of July, 1800, all that portion of the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio river, lying to the westward of a line beginning upon that stream opposite the mouth of the Kentucky river and running thence to what is now Fort Recovery, in Mercer Co., Ohio, thence north until it intersected the territorial line between the United States and Canada, was for the purposes of temporary government, constituted a separate territory, called Indiana. Within its boundaries were included not only nearly all of what is now the State of Indiana, but the whole of the present State of Illinois, more than half of what is now Michigan, a considerable portion of the present State of Minnesota, and the whole of Wisconsin. The seat of government was established at "Saint Vincennes on the Wabash." now the city of Vincennes, Ind. Upon the formation of a State government for the State of Ohio, in 1802, all the country west of that State, but east of the eastern boundary of the territory of Indiana, was added to the latter; so that then the area northwest of the Ohio river included but one State and one territory. Afterward, civil jurisdiction was exercised by the authorities of Indian a territory over the Green bay settlement, in a faint way, by the appointment, by Gov. William Henry Harrison, of Charles Reanme as the justice of the peace therein. Prairie du Chien was also recognized by the new territorial government by the appointment of two persons to a like office-

HISTORY OF WISCONSIN

Henry M. Fisher and a trader by the name of Campbell.

As American emigration was now rapidly dotting the wilderness to the westward of the State of Ohio with settlements, a treaty with some of the Indian tribes who claimed lands in that region extending northward into what is now Wisconsin, was a necessity, for as yet, none of these Nations had met any authorities of the United States in council. At the close of the contest between France and Great Britain so disastrous in North America to the former, the Sacs and Foxes readily gave in their adhesion to the latter, asking that English traders might be sent them. The two Nations, then about equally divided, numbered about 700 warriors. Neither of the tribes took part in Pontiac's war, but they befriended the English. The Sacs had, by that date emigrated some distance to the westward, while the Foxes, at least a portion of them, still remained upon the waters of the river of Green bay, which perpetuates their name. A few years later, however, and the Sacs were occupants of the upper Wisconsin also to a considerable extent below the portage between that stream and Fox river, where their chief town was located. Further down the Wisconsin was the upper village of the Foxes, while their lower town was situated not far from its mouth, near the site of the present city of Prairie du Chien.

Not long after Wisconsin had been taken possession of by the British, its northern portion, including all that part watered by the streams flowing north into Lake Superior, was the home of the Chippewa's. the country around nearly the whole of Green bay, was the hunting grounds of the Menomonee's. The territory of Winnebago lake and Fox river was the seat of the Winnebago's, while, as just stated, the Sacs and Foxes had the region of the Wisconsin river as their dwelling place. During the war of the Revolution, these two tribes continued the firm friends of the English, although not engaged in active hostilities against the Americans. When finally England delivered up to the United States the possession of the northwest, the Sacs and Foxes had only a small portion of their territory in Wisconsin, and that in the extreme southwest. Their principal possession extended a considerable distance to the south of the mouth of the Wisconsin, upon both sides of the Mississippi river.

On the 3d of November, 1804, a treaty was held at St. Louis between the Sacs and Foxes and the United States. These tribes then ceded to the general government, a large tract of land on both sides of the Mississippi, extending on the east from the mouth of the Illinois to the head of that river, thence to the Wisconsin. This grant embraces, in what is now Wisconsin, the whole of the present counties of Grant and La Fayette, and a large portion of those of Iowa and Green. It included the lead region. These tribes also claimed territory on the upper side of the Wisconsin, but they only granted away a tract two miles square above that stream, near its mouth, with the right of the United States to build a fort adjacent thereto. In consideration of the cession of these lands, the general government agreed to protect the two tribes in the quiet enjoyment of the residue of their possessions against its own citizens and all others who should intrude on them; carrying out the stipulations to that effect embodied in the Greenville treaty, of 1795. Thus begun the quieting of the Indian title to the eminent domain of Wisconsin by the United States, which was carried forward until the whole territory (except certain reservations to a few tribes) had been fairly purchased of the original proprietors.

northern boundary of the United States, was, for the purposes of temporary government, on the 30th of June, 1805, constituted a separate and distinct territory, called Michigan. This new territory did not include within its boundaries any part of Wisconsin as at present defined.

WISCONSIN AS A PART OF ILLINOIS TERRITORY.

On the 3d of February, 1809, an act of Congress, entitled an act for dividing the Indiana territory into two separate governments, was approved by the President and became a law. It provided that from and after the 1st day of March thereafter, all that part of the Indiana territory lying west of the Wabash river and a direct line drawn from that stream and "Post Vincennes" due north to the territorial line between the United States and Canada, should, for the purpose of temporary government, constitute a separate territory and be called Illinois, with the seat of government at Kaskaskia, on the Mississippi river, until it should be otherwise ordered. By this law, all of what is now Wisconsin was transferred from Indiana territory to that of Illinois, except that portion lying east of the meridian line drawn through Vincennes. This fraction included nearly the whole area between Green bay and Lake Michigan and remained a part of the territory of Indiana. When, in 1816, Indiana became a State, this narrow strip, as it was neither a portion of Michigan territory on the east or Illinois territory on the west, remained without any organization until 1818. In that year it became a part of Michigan territory.

In 1809, an effort was made by John Jacob Astor, of New York city, to extend the American fur-trade by way of the lakes to Wisconsin and parts beyond; but the monopoly of the British fur companies was too strong. He could only effect his object by uniting with the Northwest company of Montreal, in 1811, to form out of the American and Mackinaw companies, a new one, to be known as the Southwest company, of which Astor owned a half interest, with the arrangement that, after five years, it was to pass into his hands altogether, being restricted in its operations to the territories of the United States. This company was suspended by the war with Great Britain, which immediately followed. At the close of hostilities, British traders were prohibited by law from pursuing their calling within the jurisdiction of the United States. The result was the Southwest company closed up its affairs, and the American fur company re-appeared under the exclusive control of Astor, who established his western headquarters at Mackinaw, operating extensively in what is now Wisconsin, especially at La Pointe, upon Lake Superior, where large warehouses were erected; a stockade built, lands cleared, farms opened, dwellings and stores put up. But English traders evaded the law by sending their goods into the United States in the name of American clerks in their employ. These goods being of superior quality to those furnished by Astor, they continued to command the Indian trade to a large extent. It was only when the American prince of fur-traders was enabled to import goods to New York of equal quality and send them by way of the lakes, that he could successfully compete with his rivals and in the end drive them from the field.

At the commencement of the war with Great Britain the few settlers at Green Bay and Prairie du Chien depended largely upon the fur trade for their living, monopolized, as we have seen, at that period, by British traders. At the beginning of hostilities this dependency was promptly secured to the latter by the capture, from the Americans, of the post at Mackinaw. Naturally enough most of the people of Wisconsin, limited in number as they were, adhered to the English during the continuance of hostilities. As to the Indian tribes, within what are now the limits of the State, it may be said that, in a measure, they, too, all arrayed themselves on the side of Great Britain. The Menomonee's and Winnebago's took part in the capture of Mackinaw, and subsequently in other enterprises against the Americans. Indeed, all the tribes in the northwest were firmly attached to the English by reciprocal interest in the fur trade, from which they derived their supplies. Great Britain had never ceased since the Revolution to foster their friendship by the liberal distribution annually of presents; hence, they were ready when the War of 1812—15 was inaugurated to take up the hatchet against the Americans. Just before hostilities began, the English traders were especially active in exciting the Indians against the Americans, more especially against American traders. Robert Dickson, a resident of Prairie du Chien, an Englishman by birth, was among the foremost in stirring up the animosity of the savages. Soon after the declaration of war he collected a body of Indians at Green Bay for the purpose of rendering assistance to the British forces in their operations on the lakes and in the northwest; they were principally Pottawattamie, Kickapoo, Ottawa's, Winnebago's and Sac's, the last mentioned being Black Hawk's band. This chief was made commander-in-chief of the savages there assembled, by Dickinson, and sent to join the British army under Proctor.

The English early succeeded in securing the Wisconsin Indian tribes as their allies in this war; and having taken Mackinaw in July, 1812, they were, virtually, put in possession of what is now the eastern portion of the State. Early in 1814, the government authorities of the United States caused to be fitted out at St. Louis a large boat, having on board all the men that could be mustered and spared from the lower country, and sent up the Mississippi to protect the upper region and the few settlers therein. The troops landed at Prairie du Chien, and immediately proceeded to fortify. Not long after, Col. McKay, of the British army, crossing the country by course of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, with over 500 British and Indians, received the surrender of the whole force. The officers and men were paroled and sent down the river. This was the only battle fought upon Wisconsin soil during the last war with England. The post at Prairie du Chien was left in command of a captain with two companies from Mackinaw. he remained there until after the peace of 1815, when the place was evacuated by the British.

On the 3d of August, 1814, an expedition of about 300 men, under command of Maj. Zachary Taylor, left St. Louis in boats for the upper Mississippi. When they arrived at Rock Island they found the British there, apparently in force, with a battery on shore commanding the river. A severe fight took place, but after sustaining a loss of several killed and wounded the Americans returned to St. Louis. The British afterwards left Rock Island, and upon the signing of the treaty of peace by the envoys of the two governments, and the ratification of the same, the whole northwest, including Fort McKay at Prairie du Chien, was evacuated by British forces.

When it was made known to the Indian tribes of the west some of them upon the Mississippi were willing and eager to make treaties with the United States. A lucrative trade sprung up between the merchants of St. Louis and the traders and Indians up that river. Goods were periodically sent up the river to traders, who in turn transmitted in payment, by the same boats, furs and lead. But, generally, the savages hovered sullenly around the now rapidly increasing settlements in the territories of Michigan and Illinois, and the general government began to consider in earnest how the influence of British intercourse might be checked, for the savages were still encouraged by English traders in their unfriendly disposition and supplied with arms by them. Accordingly, in the winter after the close of the war, congress prohibited foreign trade in the territory of the United States; and, in the summer following, steps were taken to make this policy effectual, by establishing a chain of military posts near the Canadian frontier and upon the principal lines of communication thence into the interior. These posts were to be occupied by Indian agents, with factories, or government stores, designed to supply the place of the prohibited traffic.

On the 21st of June, 1816, United States troops took possession of the fort at Prairie du Chien. During the next month three schooners entered Fox river of Green bay, under the American flag, displaying to the astonished inhabitants of the small settlement upon that stream near its mouth, their decks covered with government troops. They were under command of Col. John Miller, of the Third United States Infantry, whose purpose was the establishment of a garrison near the head of the bay. The rendezvous of the troops was upon the east side some distance up the river, and was called "Camp Smith." At the end of two months the garrison was established in barracks enclosed with a stockade. Camp Smith was occupied until 1820, when a more substantial structure was erected on the west side of the stream near its mouth, and named Fort Howard.

The settlement at Green Bay was made up at the close of the war, of about forty or fifty French Canadians. The inhabitants (as at Prairie du Chien) were now for a time the subjects of military rule. "They received the advent of the troops in a hospitable spirit, and acquiesced in the authority asserted over them, with little evidence of discontent, maintaining a character for docility and freedom from turbulence of disposition remarkably in contrast with their surroundings. Military authority was, in the main, exerted for the preservation of order." There was no civil authority worth speaking of. It was at a period when important changes were taking place. That sometimes military authority, under such circumstances, should have been exercised in an arbitrary manner, is not at all a matter of surprise. "The conduct of the soldiery was also sometimes troublesome and offensive; as a rule, however, harmonious relations existed between them and the citizens. The abuses were only such as were unavoidable, in the absence of any lawful restraint on the one hand, or means of redress on the other." This state of affairs did not long continue, as initiatory steps were not long after taken to extend over the community both here and at Prairie du Chien the protection of civil government.

The Indians of Wisconsin, upon the arrival of United States troops at Prairie du Chien and Green bay, gave evident signs of a disposition to remain friendly, although some thought the advent of soldiers an intrusion. An Indian agency under John Boyer and a United States factory, well supplied with goods, with Major Matthew Irwin at its head, were soon established at the bay; a factory at Prairie du Chien, under charge of John W. Johnson, was also started. The Menomonee and Winnebago tribes, the former upon Green bay, the latter upon the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, were now brought into nearer relations with the United States.

WISCONSIN AS A PART OF MICHIGAN TERRITORY.

Upon the admission of Illinois into the Union, in 1818, all "the territory of the United States, northwest of the River Ohio," lying west of Michigan territory and north of the States of Indiana and Illinois, was attached to and made a part of Michigan territory; by which act the whole of the present State of Wisconsin came under the jurisdiction of the latter. At the close of the last war with Great Britain, Wisconsin began in earnest to be occupied by Americans. But the latter were still few in number when the country west of Lake Michigan was attached to Michigan territory. Now, however, that the laws of the United States were in reality extended over them, they began to feel as though they were not altogether beyond the protection of a government of their own, notwithstanding they were surrounded by Indian tribes. On the 28th of October, 1818, the governor of the territory erected by proclamation three counties lying in whole or in part in what is now Wisconsin—Brown, Crawford and Michilimackinac. The county of Michilimackinac not only included all of the present State of Wisconsin lying north of a line drawn due west from near the head of the Little Noquet bay, but territory east and west of it, so as to reach from Lake Huron to the Mississippi river. Its county seat was established "at the Borough of Michilimackinac." The whole area in Michigan territory south of the county of Michilimackinac, and west of Lake Michigan formed the two counties of Brown and Crawford; the former to include the area east of a line drawn due north and south through the middle of the portage between the Fox river of Green bay and the Wisconsin; the latter to include the whole region west of that line. Prairie du Chien was designated as the county seat of Crawford; Green Bay, of Brown county. On the 22d of December, 1826, a county named Chippewa was formed from the northern portions of Michilimackinac, including the southern shores of Lake Superior throughout its entire length, and extending from the straits leading from that lake into Lake Huron, west to the western boundary line of Michigan territory, with the county seat "at such point in the vicinity of the Sault de Ste. Marie, as a majority of the county commissioners to be appointed shall designate." Embraced within this county—its southern boundary being the parallel of 46 degrees 31 minutes north latitude—was all the territory of the present State of Wisconsin now bordering on Lake Superior. Brown and Crawford counties were soon organized, the offices being filled by appointments of the governor. County courts were also established, to which appeals were taken from justices of the peace. In January, 1823, a district court was established by an act of Congress, for the counties last mentioned, including also Michilimackinac. One term during the year was held in each county. James Duane Doty was the judge of this court to May, 1832, when he was succeeded by David Irvin.

The United States were not unmindful of her citizens to the westward of Lake Michigan, in several other Important matters. Indian agencies were established; treaties were held with some of the native tribes, and land claims of white settlers at Green Bay and Prairie du Chien adjusted. Postmasters were also appointed at these two places.

In 1825 and the two following years, a general attention was called to the lead mines in what is now the southwestern portion of the State. Different places therein were settled with American miners. In June, 1827, the Winnebago Indians became hostile; this caused the militia of Prairie du Chien to be called out. United States troops ascended the Wisconsin river to quell the disturbance. There they were joined by Illinois volunteers, and the Winnebago's awed into submission. Fort Winnebago was thereupon erected by the general government at the portage, near the present site of Portage, Columbia Co., Wis. A treaty with the Indians followed, and there was no more trouble because of mining operations in the "lead region." On the 9th of October, 1829, a county was formed of all that part of Crawford lying south of the Wisconsin, and named Iowa. In 1831 the United States purchased of the Menomonee's all their lands east of Green bay, Winnebago lake and the Fox and Milwaukee rivers. The general government, before this late, had, at several periods, held treaties with the Sac and Fox Indians. And the time had now come when the two tribes were to leave the eastern for the western side of the Mississippi river; but a band headed by Black Hawk refused to leave their village near Rock Island, Ill. They contended that they had not sold their town to the United States; and upon their return early in 1831, from a hunt across the Mississippi, finding their village and fields in possession of the whites, they determined to repossess their homes at all hazards. This was looked upon, or called, an encroachment by the settlers; so the governor of Illinois took the responsibility of declaring the State invaded, and asked the United States to drive the refractory

HISTORY OF WISCONSIN.

Indians beyond the Mississippi. The result was, the Indian village was destroyed by Illinois volunteers. This and the threatened advance across the river by the United States commander, brought Black Hawk and his followers to terms. They sued for peace—agreeing to remain forever on the west side of the Mississippi. But this truce was of short duration.

Early in the spring of 1832, Black Hawk having assembled his forces on the Mississippi in the vicinity of the locality where Fort Madison had stood, crossed that stream and ascended Rock river. This was the signal for war. The governor of Illinois made a call for volunteers, and in a brief space of time 1,800 had assembled at Beardstown, Cass county. They marched for the mouth of Rock river, where a council of war was held by their officers and Brigadier-General Henry Atkinson, of the regular forces. The Indians were sent word by General Atkinson that they must return and re-cross the Mississippi or they would be driven back by force. When the attempt was made to compel them to go back a collision occurred between the Illinois militia and Black Hawk's braves, resulting in the discomfiture of the former with the loss of eleven men. Soon afterward the volunteers were discharged, and the first campaign of Black Hawk's War was at an end. This was in May, 1832. In June following a new force had been raised and put under the command of General Atkinson, who commenced his march up Rock river. Before this there had been a general "forting" in the lead region, in Illinois, and including the whole country in what is now Southwest Wisconsin, notwithstanding which a number of settlers had been killed by the savages, mostly in Illinois. Squads of volunteers, in two or three instances, had encountered the Indians, and in one with entire success—upon the Pecatonica, in the present Lafayette Co., Wis.—every savage (and there were seventeen of them) being killed. The loss of the volunteers was three killed and wounded. Atkinson's march up Rock river was attended with some skirmishing, when, being informed that Black Hawk and his force were at Lake Koshkonong, in the southwest corner of what is now Jefferson Co., Wis., he immediately moved thither with a portion of his army, where the whole force was ordered to concentrate. But the Sac chief, with his people, had flown. Colonels Henry Dodge and James D. Henry, with the forces under them, discovered the trail of the savages, heading in the direction of Wisconsin river. It was evident that the retreating force was large, and that it had but recently passed. The pursuing troops hastened their march. On the 21st of July, 1832, they arrived at the hills which skirt the left bank of that stream, in what is now Roxbury town (township), Dane county. Here was Black Hawk's whole force, including women and children, the aged and infirm, hastening by every effort to escape across the river. But that this might now be effected it became necessary for that chief to make a firm stand, to cover the retreat. The Indians were in the bottom lands when the pursuing whites made their appearance upon the heights in their rear. Colonel Dodge occupied the front and sustained the first attack of the Indians. He was soon joined by Henry with his force, when they obtained a complete victory. The action commenced about 5 o'clock in the afternoon and ended at sunset. The enemy sustained a loss, it is said, of about sixty killed and a large number wounded.* The loss of the Americans was one killed and eight wounded. During the following night Black Hawk made his escape down the Wisconsin. He was pursued and finally brought to a stand on the Mississippi near the mouth of the Bad Axe, on the western boundary of what is now Vernon Co., Wis.; and on the 2d of August attacked on all sides by the Americans, who soon obtained a complete victory. Black Hawk escaped, but was soon after captured. This ended the war.

*Black Hawk gives a very different account as to his loss. "In this skirmish," says he, "with fifty braves I defended and accomplished my passage over the Wisconsin with a loss of only six men."

HISTORY OF WISCONSIN.

The survey of public lands to which the Indian title had been extinguished; the erection of Milwaukee county from the southern part of Brown; the changing of the eastern boundary of Iowa county to correspond with the western one of Milwaukee county; the attaching, for judicial purposes, of all the country west of the Mississippi river and north of the State of Missouri to the territory of Michigan in 1834, and the division of it into the two counties of Des Moines and Dubuque, were the important events following the close of the Black Hawk war. The prospective admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, to include all that part of the territory lying east of Lake Michigan, caused, on the 1st of January, 1836, a session (the first one) of the seventh territorial council, to legislate for so much of the territory as lay to the westward of that lake, to be held at Green Bay, when a memorial was adopted, asking Congress for the formation of a new territory, to include all of Michigan territory not to be admitted as a State. This request, it will now be seen, was soon complied with by the National Legislature.

CHAPTER II.

WISCONSIN AS A TERRITORY.

The Territory of Wisconsin* was erected by act of Congress of April 20, 1836, to take effect from and after the 3d day of July following.

*Wisconsin takes Its name from its principal river, which drains an extensive portion of its surface. It rises in Lake Vieux Desert (which is partly in Michigan and partly In Wisconsin), flows generally a south course to Portage in what is now Columbia county, where it turns to the southwest, and after a further course of 118 miles, with a rapid current, reaches the Mississippi river, four miles below Prairie du Chien. Its entire length is about 460 miles, descending, in that distance, a little more than 1,000 feet. Along the lower portion of the stream are the high lands, or river hills. Some of these hills present high and precipitous faces toward the water. Others terminate in knobs. The name is supposed to have been taken from this feature; the word being derived from mis-is, great, and os-sin, a stone or rock.

Compare Shea's Discovery and Exploration of the Mississippi, pp. 6 (note) and 268; Foster's Mississippi Valley, p. 2 (note); Schoolcraft's Thirty Years with the Indian Tribes, p. 220 and note.

Two definitions of the word are current—as widely differing from each other as from the one just given. (See Wis. Hist. Soc. Coll., Vol. I., p. 111, and Webster's Dic, Unabridged, p.1632.) The first—"the gathering of the waters"—has no corresponding words in Algonquin at all resembling the name; the same may be said of the second—"wild rushing channel." (See Otchipwe Dic. of Rev. F. Baraga.

Since first used by the French the word "Wisconsin" has undergone considerable change, On the map by Joliet, recently brought to light by Gravier,

It is given as "Miskonsing." In Marquette's journal, published by Thevenot, In Paris, 1681, It is noted as the "Meskousing." It appeared there for the first time In print. Hennepin, in 1683, wrote 'Onisconsin' and "Misconsin;" Charlevoix. 1743, "Ouisconsin;" Carver. 1766, "Ouisconsin" (English—"Wisconsin"); since which last mentioned date the orthography has been uniform,—Butterfield's Discovery of the Northwest in 1634.

It was made to include all that part of the late Michigan territory described within boundaries "commencing at the northeast corner of the State of Illinois, running thence through the middle of Lake Michigan to a point opposite the main channel of Green bay; thence through that channel and the bay to the mouth of tile Menomonee river; thence up that stream to its head, which is nearest the lake of the Desert; thence to the middle of that lake; thence down the Montreal river to its mouth; thence with a direct line across Lake Superior to where the territorial line of the United States last touches the lake northwest; thence on the north, with the territorial line, to the White Earth river; on the west by a line drawn down the middle of the main channel of that stream to the Missouri river, anti down the middle of the main channel of the last mentioned stream to the northwest corner of the State of Missouri; and thence with the boundaries of the States of Missouri and Illinois, as already fixed by act of Congress, to the place or point of beginning." Its counties were Brown, Milwaukee, Iowa, Crawford, Dubuque and Des Moines, with a portion of Chippewa and Michilimackinac unorganized. Henry Dodge was commissioned governor April 30, 1836; Charles Dunn, chief justice, and David Irvin and William C. Frazer associate justices; by Andrew Jackson, President of the United States. The following were the secretaries, attorneys and marshals, with the dates of their commissions who held office while the territory was in existence

SECRETARIES.

John S. Homer, May 6, 1836; William B. Slaughter, Feb. 16, 1837; Francis I. Dunn, Jan. 25, 1841; Alexander P. Field, April 23, 1841; George Floyd, Oct. 30, 1843; John Catlin, Feb. 24, 1846.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS.

W. W. Chapman, May 6, 1836; Moses M. Strong, July 5, 1838; Thomas W. Sutherland, April 27, 1841; William P. Lynde, July 14, 1845.

UNITED STATES MARSHALS.

Francis Gehon, May 6, 1836; Edward James, June 19, 1838; Daniel Hugunin, March 15, 1841; Charles M. Prevost, Aug. 31, 1844; John S. Rockwell, March 14, 1845.

The first important measure to be looked after by Governor Dodge upon his assuming, in the spring of 1836, the executive chair of the territory was the organization of the territorial Legislature. A census showed the following population east of the Mississippi: Milwaukee county, 2,893; Brown county, 2,706; Crawford county, 850; Iowa county, 5,234. Total, 11,683. The enumeration for the two counties west of the Mississippi was—Des Moines, 6,257; Dubuque, 4,274. Total, 10,531. The population, therefore, of both sides of the river aggregated 22,214. The legislative apportionment, made by the governor, gave to the territory thirteen councilmen and twenty-six representatives. These, of course, were to be elected by the people. The election was held Oct. 10, 1836.

Belmont, in the present county of Lafayette, Wis., was appointed as the place for the meeting of the Legislature, where the first session began October 25. A quorum of each house was in attendance. Henry S. Baird, of Green Bay, was elected president of the council, and Peter H. Engle speaker of the house.

The following persons served as presidents of the council while Wisconsin was a territory:

First session, first Legislative Assembly, Henry S. Baird, Brown county.

Second session, first Legislative Assembly, Arthur R. Ingraham, Des Moines county.

Special session, first Legislative Assembly, Arthur R. Ingraham, Des Moines county.

First session, second Legislative Assembly, William Bullen, Racine county.

Second session, second Legislative Assembly, James Collins, Iowa county.

Third session, second Legislative Assembly, James Collins, Iowa county.

Fourth (extra) session, second Legislative Assembly, William A. Prentiss, Milwaukee county.

First session, third Legislative Assembly, James Maxwell, Walworth county.

Second session, third Legislative Assembly, James Collins, Iowa county.

First session, fourth Legislative Assembly, Moses M. Strong, Iowa county.

Second session, fourth Legislative Assembly, Marshal M. Strong, Racine county.

Third session, fourth Legislative Assembly, Moses M. Strong, Iowa county. -

Fourth session, fourth Legislative Assembly, Nelson Dewey, Grant county.

First session, fifth Legislative Assembly, Horatio N. Wells, Milwaukee county.

Special session, fifth Legislative Assembly, Horatio N. Wells, Milwaukee county.

Second session, fifth Legislative Assembly, Horatio N. Wells, Milwaukee county.

The following persons served as speakers of the House during the continuance of Wisconsin territory

First session, first Legislative Assembly, Peter H. Engle, Dubuque county.

Second session, first Legislative Assembly, Isaac Leffler, Des Moines county.

Special session, first Legislative Assembly, William B. Sheldon, Milwaukee county.

First session, second Legislative Assembly, John W. Blackstone, Iowa county.

Second session, second Legislative Assembly, Lucius I. Barber, Milwaukee county.

Third session, second Legislative Assembly, Edward V. Whiton, Rock county.

Fourth (extra) session, second Legislative Assembly, Nelson Dewey, Grant county.

First session, third Legislative Assembly, David Newland, Iowa county.

Second session, third Legislative Assembly, David Newland, Iowa county.

First session, fourth Legislative Assembly, Albert G. Ellis, Portage county.

Second session, fourth Legislative Assembly, George H. Walker, Milwaukee county.

Third session, fourth Legislative Assembly, George H. Walker, Milwaukee county.

Fourth session, fourth Legislative Assembly, Mason C. Darling, Fond du Lac county.

First session, fifth Legislative Assembly, William Shew, Milwaukee county.

Special session, fifth Legislative Assembly, Isaac P. Walker, Milwaukee county.

Second session, fifth Legislative Assembly, Timothy Burns, Iowa county.

Each of the three branches of the infant government was now (October, 1836) in working order, except that it remained for the Legislative Assembly to divide the territory into three judicial districts, the number required by the organic act, and make an assignment of the judges. This was speedily done. Crawford and Iowa constituted the first district, to which the chief justice was assigned; Dubuque and Des Moines the second, to which Judge Irvin was assigned; and Judge Frazer to the third, consisting of Milwaukee and Brown counties. The principal matters engaging the attention of the legislators were the permanent location of the capitol, the erection of new counties and the location of county seats. Madison was fixed upon as the seat of government; and nine counties were erected east of the Mississippi: Walworth, Racine, Jefferson, Dane, Dodge, Washington, Rock, Grant and Green. West of the river six counties were set off: Lee, Van Buren, Henry, Louisa, Muscatine and Cook. The Legislature adjourned sine die, Dec. 9, 1836. The first term of the supreme court was held at Belmont on the 8th day of December, of that year. The appointment of a clerk, crier and reporter, and the admission of several attorneys to practice, completed the business of the first term. The following persons served as clerks while Wisconsin was a territory:

John Catlin, appointed at December term, 1836; Simeon Mills, appointed at July term, 1839; La Fayette Kellogg, appointed at July term, 1840. Gov. Dodge, appointed Dec. 8, 1836; Henry S. Baird, as attorney general. His successors were as follows:

Horatio N. Wells, appointed by Gov. Dodge, March 30, 1839; Mortimer M. Jackson, appointed by Gov. Dodge, Jan. 26, 1842; William Pitt Lynde, appointed by Gov. Tallmage, Feb. 22, 1845; A. Hyatt Smith, appointed by Gov. Dodge Aug. 4, 1845. Upon the organization of the territory in 1836, it was necessary that it should be represented in the National Legislature; so on the day of the election of the territorial Legislature, George W. Jones, of Iowa county, was chosen a delegate in Congress. His successors were:

James Duane Doty, elected Sept. 10, 1838; James Duane Doty, elected Aug. 5, 1840; Henry Dodge, elected Sept. 27, 1841; Henry Dodge, elected Sept. 25, 1843; Morgan L. Martin, elected Sept. 22, 1845; John H. Tweedy, elected Sept. 6, 1847.

At the close of the year 1836, there was no land in market east of the Mississippi, except a narrow strip along the shore of Lake Michigan, and in the vicinity of Green bay. The residue of the country south and east of the Wisconsin and Fox rivers was open only to pre-emption by actual settlers. The Indian tribes still claimed a large portion of the lands. On the north were located the Chippewa's. The southern limits of their possessions were defined by a line drawn from a point on that stream in about latitude 46 degrees 31 minutes in a southeasterly direction to the head of Lake St. Croix; thence in the same general direction to what is now Stevens Point, in the present Portage Co., Wis.; thence nearly east to Wolf river; and thence in a direction nearly northeast to the Menomonee river. Between the Wisconsin river and the Mississippi, and extending north to the south line of the Chippewa's was the territory of the Winnebago's. East of the Winnebago's in the country north of the Fox river of Green bay were located the Menomonee's, their lands extending to Wolf river. Such was the general outline of Indian occupancy in Wisconsin territory, east of the Mississippi, at its organization. A portion of the country east of Wolf river and north of Green bay and the Fox river; the whole of the area lying south of Green bay, Fox river and the Wisconsin, constituted the extent of country over which the Indians had no claim. In this region, as we have seen, was a population of about 12,000, it was made up of the scattered settlers at the lead mines; the military establishments, (Fort Crawford, Fort Winnebago and Fort Howard), and settlements at or near them; and the village of Milwaukee; these were about all the parts of the territory east of the Mississippi, at that (late, occupied to any extent by the whites.

The second session of the first Legislative Assembly of the territory of Wisconsin, began at Burlington, now the county seat of Des Moines Co., Iowa, Nov. 6, 1837, and adjourned Jan. 20, 1838, to the second Monday of June following. The principal acts passed were, one for taking another census; one abolishing imprisonment for debt; another regulating the sale of school lands and to prepare for organizing, regulating and perfecting schools. There was also one passed incorporating the Milwaukee and Rock River Canal Company. This was approved by the governor, Jan. 5, 1838. By an act of Congress approved June 18 of the same year, a grant of land was made to aid in the construction of the canal. The grant consisted of the odd-numbered sections on a belt of ten miles in width from Lake Michigan to Rock river, amounting to 139,190 acres. Of those lands 43,447 acres were sold at public sale in July, 1839, at the minimum price of $2.50 per acre. Work was commenced on the canal at Milwaukee, and the Milwaukee river for a short distance from its outlet was improved by the construction of a dam across the river, which was made available for manufacturing and other purposes. A canal was also built about a mile in length and forty feet wide, leading from it down on the west bank of the river. Much dissatisfaction subsequently arose; the purchasers at this sale, and others occupying these canal and reserved lands felt the injustice of being compelled to pay double price for their lands, and efforts were made to repeal all laws authorizing further sales, and to ask Congress to repeal the act making this grant. The legislation on the subject of this grant is voluminous. In 1862 the Legislature of the State passed an act to ascertain and settle the liabilities, if any, of Wisconsin and the company, and a board of commissioners was appointed for that purpose. At the session of the Legislature in 1863, the committee made a report with a lengthy opinion of the attorney-general of the State. The views of that officer were, that the company had no valid claims for damages against the State. In this opinion the commissioners concurred. On the 23d of March, 1875, an act was approved by the governor, giving authority to the attorney-general to discharge and release of record any mortgage before executed to the late territory of Wisconsin given to secure the purchase money or any part thereof of any lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of this canal. The quantity of lands unsold was subsequently made a part of the 500,000 acre tract granted by Congress for school purposes. It is believed the whole matter is now closed against further legislative enactments.

There was another important act passed by the territorial Legislature of 1837—8, by which fourteen counties were erected, but all of them west of the Mississippi. The census having been taken in May, a special session of the first Legislative Assembly was commenced June 11, 1838, at Burlington, continuing to June 25, of that year. This session was pursuant to an adjournment of the previous one, mainly for the purpose of making a new apportionment of members. The population of the several counties east of the Mississippi was, by the May census, 18,149. By an act of Congress, approved June 12, 1838, it was provided that from and after the 3d day of July following, all that part of Wisconsin territory lying west of that river and west of a line drawn due north from its headwaters or sources to the territorial line for the purposes of a territorial government should be set apart and known by the name of Iowa. It was further enacted that the territory of Wisconsin should thereafter extend westward only to the Mississippi. Because of the passage of this act, the one passed at the special session of the territorial Legislature making an apportionment of members, became nugatory—that duty now devolving upon Gov. Doty. On the third Monday of July, 1838, the annual term of supreme court was held at Madison this, of course, being the first one after the reorganization of the territory; the previous one was not held, as there was no business for the court. On the 18th of October, Judge Frazer died, and on the 8th of November, Andrew G. Miller was appointed his successor, by Martin Van Buren, President of the United States.

The Legislature of the re-organized territory of Wisconsin met at Madison for the first time—it being the first session of the second Legislative Assembly—Nov. 26, 1838. Its attention was directed to the mode in which the commissioners of public buildings had discharged their duties. There was an investigation of three banks then in operation in the territory—one at Green Bay, one at Mineral Point, and the other at Milwaukee. A plan, also, for the revision of the laws of the territory was considered. A new assignment was made for the holding of district courts. Chief Justice Dunn was assigned to the first district, composed of the counties of Iowa, Grant and Crawford; Judge Irvin to the second, composed of the counties of Dane, Jefferson, Rock, Walworth and Green; while Judge Miller was assigned to the third district, composed of Milwaukee, Brown and Racine counties—including therein the unorganized counties of Washington and Dodge, which, for judicial purposes, were, when constituted, by name and boundary, attached to Milwaukee county. The Legislature adjourned on the 22d of December, to meet again on the 21st of the following month. The census having been taken during the year, it was found that the territory had a population of 18,130, an increase in two years, of 6,447. The second session of the second Legislative Assembly began Jan. 21, 1839, agreeable to adjournment. An act was passed during this session legalizing a revision of the laws which had been perfected by a committee previously; this act took effect July 4, and composed the principal part of the laws forming the revised statutes of 1839. The session ended March 11, 1839. On the 8th of March of this year, Henry Dodge, whose term for three years as governor was about to expire, was again commissioned by the President of the United States. At the July term of the supreme court, all the judges were present, and several cases were heard and decided. A seal for the court was also adopted. From this time, the supreme court met annually, as provided by law, until Wisconsin became a State.

The next Legislature assembled at Madison, on the 2d of December, 1839. This was the third session of the second Legislative Assembly of the territory. The term for which members of the house were elected would soon expire; it was therefore desirable that a new apportionment should be made. As the census would be taken the ensuing June, by the United States, it would be unnecessary for the territory to make an additional enumeration. A short session was resolved upon, and then an adjournment until after the completion of the census. One of the subjects occupying largely the attention of the members, was the condition of the capitol, and the conduct of the commissioners intrusted with the money appropriated by Congress to defray the Cost of its construction. These commissioners were James Duane Doty, A. A. Bird and John F. O'Neill. They received their appointment from the general government. Work began on the building in June, 1837, the corner stone being laid with appropriate ceremonies July 4. During that year and the previous one, Congress appropriated $40,000, Dane county $4,000, and the territorial Legislature, about $16,000, for the structure; so that the entire cost was about $60,000. The building, when finished, was a substantial structure, which, in architectural design and convenience of arrangement, compared favorably with the capitols of adjacent and older States. The capitol proving inadequate to the growing wants of the State, the Legislature of 1857 provided for its enlargement. By this act, the commissioners of school and university lands were directed to sell the ten sections of land appropriated by Congress "for the completion of public buildings," and apply the proceeds toward enlarging and improving the State capitol. The State also appropriated $30,000 for the same object, and $50,000 was given by the city of Madison. The governor and secretary of State were made commissioners for conducting the work, which was begun in the fall of 1857, and continued from year to year until 1869, when the dome was completed. The Legislature of 1882 appropriated $200,000 for the construction of two transverse wings to the capitol building, one on the north and the other on the south sides thereof, in order to provide additional room for the State historical society, the supreme court, the State library, and for the increasing work of the State offices. The governor, secretary of State, attorney general, with others, representing the supreme court and the historical society, were made commissioners for carrying out the work. The cost will be within the amount appropriated by the State. The total appropriations for the enlargement of the capitol and for the improvement of the park, to the present time, are $629,992.54. This does not include the sum of $6,500 appropriated in 1875, for macadamizing to the center of the streets around the park, nor the $200,000 appropriated in 1882. The park is 914 feet square, cornering north, south, east and west, contains fourteen and four-tenths acres, and is situated on an elevation commanding a view of the third and fourth lakes and the surrounding country. In the center of the square stands the capitol. The height of the building from the basement to the top of the flag staff is 225 ½ feet, while the total length of its north and south wings, exclusive of steps and porticoes, with the addition of the new wings, is 396 feet, and of the east and west wings, 226 feet.

The Legislature of 1839—40, adjourned January 18, to meet again on the 3d of the ensuing August. The completion of the federal census of 1840 showed a population for the territory of 30,744. Upon the re-assembling of the Legislature—which is known as the extra session of the second Legislative Assembly—some changes were made in the apportionment of members to the House of Representatives. The session lasted but a few days, a final adjournment taking place Aug. 14, 1840. The first session of the third Legislative Assembly began Dec. 7, 1840, and ended Feb. 19, 1841, with only three members who had served in the previous Assembly.

HISTORY OF WISCONSIN,

All had recently been elected under the new apportionment.

On the 13th of September, 1841, Gov. Dodge was removed from office by John Tyler, then President of the United States, and James Duane Doty appointed in his place, the commission of the latter being dated the 5th of October following.

The second session of the third Legislative Assembly began at Madison, on the 6th of December, 1841. Gov. Doty, in his message to that body, boldly avowed the doctrine that no law of the territory was effective until expressly approved by Congress. This construction of the organic act resulted in a lengthy warfare between the governor and the Legislative Assembly. On the 11th of February, 1842, an event occurred in the Legislative council, causing a great excitement over the whole territory. On that day, Charles C. P. Arndt, a member from Brown county, was, while that body was in session, shot dead by James R. Vineyard, a member from Grant county. The difficulty grew out of a debate on a motion to lay on the table the nomination of Enos S. Baker to the office of sheriff of Grant county. Immediately before adjournment of the council, the parties who had come together, after loud and angry words had been spoken, were separated by the by-standers. When an adjournment had been announced, they met again; whereupon Arndt struck at Vineyard. The latter then drew a pistol and shot Arndt. He died in a few moments. Vineyard immediately surrendered himself to the sheriff of the county, waived an examination, and was committed to jail. After a short confinement, he was brought before the chief justice of the territory, on a writ of habeas corpus, and admitted to bail. He was afterward indicted for manslaughter, was tried and acquitted. Three days after shooting Arndt, Vineyard sent in his resignation as member of the council. That body refused to receive it, or to have it read even; but at once expelled him. The second and last session of the third Legislative

For the next six years there were seven sessions of the territorial legislature, as follows:

First session, 4th Legislative Assembly, commenced Dec. 5, 1842, ended April 17, 1843; second session, 4th Legislative Assembly, commenced Dec. 4, 1843, ended Jan. 31, 1844; third session, 4th Legislative Assembly, commenced Jan. 6, 1845, ended Feb. 24, 1845; fourth session, 4th Legislative Assembly, commenced Jan 5, 1846, ended Feb. 3, 1846; first session, 5th Legislative Assembly, commenced Jan.4, 1847, ended Feb. 11, 1847; special session, 5th Legislative Assembly, commenced Oct. 18, 1847, ended Oct. 27, 1847; second session, 5th Legislative Assembly, commenced Feb. 7, 1848, ended March 13, 1848.

The members of the first session of the fourth legislative assembly had been elected under a new apportionment based upon a census taken in June, showing a total population of 46,678. In each house there was a democratic majority. Gov. Doty was a Whig. It was a stormy session. After the two houses had organized, the governor refused to communicate with them, as a body legally assembled, according to the organic act, he claiming that no appropriation for that object had been made by Congress. The houses continued in session until the 10th day of December, then they adjourned until the 13th of January, 1843, they having meanwhile made representation to the National Legislature, then in session, of the objections of the governor. It was not until the 4th of February that a quorum in both houses had assembled. Previous to this, Congress had made an appropriation to cover the expenses of the session; and the governor, on the 13th of January, had issued a proclamation convening a special session on the 6th of March. Both houses in February adjourned to the day fixed by the governor, which ended the troubles; and the final adjournment took place, as already stated, April 17, 1843. Nathaniel P. Tallmadge was appointed governor in place of Doty on the 21st of June, 1844, his commission bearing date the 16th of September. James K. Polk having been elected President of the United States in the fall of that year, Henry Dodge was again put in the executive chair of the territory, receiving his appointment April 8, 1845, and being commissioned May 13 following.

It was during the fourth session of the fourth legislative assembly that preliminary steps were taken, which resulted in the formation of a State government. The first Tuesday in April, 1846, was the day fixed upon for the people to vote for or against the proposition. When taken it resulted in a large majority voting in favor of the measure. An act was passed providing for taking the census of the territory, and for the apportionment by the governor of delegates to form a State constitution, based upon the new enumeration. The delegates were to be elected on the first Monday in September, and the convention was to assemble on the first Monday in October, 1846. The constitution when formed was to be submitted to the vote of the people for adoption or rejection, as, at the close of the session, the terms of members of the council who had been elected for four years, and of the house, who had been elected for two years, all ended. The legislature re-organized the election districts, and conferred on the governor the power and duty of making an apportionment, based on the census to be taken, for the next Legislative Assembly, when, on the 3d of February, 1846, both houses adjourned sine die. The census taken in the following June showed a population for the territory of 155,217. Delegates having been elected to form a constitution for the proposed new State, met at Madison on the 5th day of October. After completing their labors, they adjourned. This event took place on the 16th of December, 1846. The constitution thus formed was submitted to a popular vote on the first Tuesday of April, 1847, and rejected. A special session of the legislature, to take action concerning the admission of Wisconsin into the Union began Oct. 18, 1847, and a law was passed for the holding of another convention to frame a constitution. Delegates to the new convention were elected on the last Monday of November, and that body met at Madison the 15th of December, 1847. A census of the territory was taken this year, which showed a population of 210,546. The result of the labors of the second constitutional convention was the formation of a Constitution, which, being submitted to the people on the second Monday of March, 1848, was duly ratified. On the 29th of May, 1848, by act of Congress, Wisconsin became a State.

It may be here premised that the western boundary of the new State left out a full organized county, with a sheriff, clerk of court, judge of probate, and justices of the peace. A bill had been introduced at a previous session in Congress, by Morgan L. Martin, the delegate from Wisconsin, to organize a territorial government for Minnesota, including the district left out on the admission of Wisconsin; but which failed to become a law. The citizens of what is now Minnesota were very anxious to obtain a territorial government, and two public meetings were held—one at St. Paul, and the other at Stillwater—advising John Catlin, who was secretary of Wisconsin, to issue a proclamation as the acting governor, for the election of a delegate to represent what was left of the territory of Wisconsin. Mr. Catlin repaired to Stillwater and issued a proclamation accordingly. H. H. Sibley was elected; nearly 400 votes having been polled at the election. Sibley was admitted to his seat on the floor of Congress by a vote of two to one. His admission facilitated and hastened the passage of a bill for the organization of a territorial government for Minnesota.

HISTORY OF WISCONSIN.

CHAPTER III.

WISCONSIN AS A STATE.

The State of Wisconsin is bounded on the north by Minnesota and Michigan; on the east by the State last mentioned; on the south, by Illinois, Iowa and Minnesota; and on the west, by the two last named States. Its boundaries, as more particularly described, are as follows:

Beginning at its northeast corner of the State of Illinois, that is to say, at a point in the center of Lake Michigan, where the line of forty-two degrees and thirty minutes of north latitude, crosses the same; thence running with the boundary line of the State of Michigan, through Lake Michigan [and] Green bay to the mouth of the Menomonee river; thence up the channel of the said river to the Brule river; thence up said last mentioned river to Lake Brule; thence along the southern shore of Lake Brule, in a direct line to the center of the channel between Middle and South islands, in the Lake of the Desert; thence in a direct line to the head waters of the Montreal river, as marked upon the survey made by Captain Cram; thence down the main channel of the Montreal river to the middle of Lake Superior; thence through the center of Lake Superior to the mouth of the St. Louis river; thence up the main channel of said river to the first rapids in the same, above the Indian village, according to Nicollet's map, thence due south to the main branch of the River St. Croix; thence down the main channel of said river to the Mississippi; thence down the center of the main channel of that river to the northwest corner of the State of Illinois; thence due east with the northern boundary of the State of Illinois to the place of beginning. The general shape of Wisconsin is that of an irregular pentagon. Its land area is 53,924 square miles; and, in respect to size, it ranks with the other States as the 15th.

It is known as one of the North Central States, east of the Mississippi. It extends from 9 degrees 50 minutes to 15 degrees 50 minutes west longitude from Washington city, and from 42 degrees 30 minutes to about 47 degrees 30 minutes north latitude. It has Lake Michigan on the east, Green bay, Menomonee and Brule rivers, Lake Vieux Desert, the Montreal river, Lake Superior and the St. Louis river; on the northeast arid north; and, on the west, the St. Croix and the Mississippi rivers.* The average length of the State is about 260 miles; its average breadth 215 miles. The surface features of Wisconsin present a configuration between the mountainous, on the one hand, and a monotonous level, on the other. The State occupies a swell of land lying between three notable depressions: Lake Michigan, on the east; Lake Superior, on the north; and the valley of the Mississippi, on the west. From these depressions the surface slopes upward to the summit altitudes. Scattered over the State are prominent hills, but no mountains. Some of these hills swell upward into rounded domes, some ascend precipitously into castellated towers; and some reach prominence without regard to beauty

*The boundary of Wisconsin is commonly given as Lake Superior and the State of Michigan on the north, and Michigan and Lake Michigan on the east, and sometimes, also, the Mississippi river is given as a part of the western boundary. These boundaries are not the true ones. The State of Wisconsin extends to the center of Lakes Michigan and Superior, and to the center of the main channel of the Mississippi river. As the States of Wisconsin and Michigan meet in the center of Lake Michigan, it is not Lake Michigan that bounds Wisconsin on the east, but the State of Michigan, and so on. The correct boundary of Wisconsin in general terms, is as follows: Wisconsin is bounded north by Minnesota and Michigan, east by Michigan, south by Illinois, and west by Iowa and Minnesota"—A O. Wright or form or convenience of description. The highest peak, in the southwestern part of the State, is the West Blue Mound, 1,151 feet above Lake Michigan; in the eastern part, Lapham's Peak, 824 feet; in the central part, Rib Hill, 1,263 feet; while the crest of the Penokee Range, in the northern part, rises upward of 1,000 feet. The drainage systems correspond, in general, to the topographical features before described. The face of the State is the growth of geologic ages furrowed by the teardrops of the skies.

The constitution of Wisconsin provided for the election of a governor, lieutenant governor, secretary of State, treasurer and attorney general, as the officers of State. The first State election was held May 8, 1848, when, not only State officers were chosen, but members of the Legislature and members of Congress. The following are the names of the governors elected and the terms they have served, since Wisconsin became a State: Nelson Dewey, June 7, 1848 to Jan. 5, 1852; Leonard J. Farwell, Jan. 5, 1852, to Jan. 5, 1854; William A. Barstow, Jan. 2, 1854, to March 21, 1856; Arthur McArthur, † March 21, to March 25, 1866; Coles Bashford, March 25, 1856, to Jan. 4, 1858; Alexander W. Randall, Jan. 4, 1858, to Jan. 6, 1862; Louis P. Harvey, Jan. 6, 1862, to April 19, 1862; Edward Solomon, † April 19, 1862, to Jan. 4, 1864; James T. Lewis, Jan. 4, 1864, to Jan. 1, 1866; Lucius Fa(i)rchild, Jan. 1, 1866, to Jan. 1, 1872; C. C. Washburn, Jan. 1, 1872, to Jan. 5, 1874; William R. Taylor, Jan. 5, 1874, to Jan. 3, 1876; Harrison Ludington, Jan. 3, 1876, to Jan. 7, 1878; William E. Smith, Jan. 7, 1878 to Jan. 2, 1882; Jeremiah M. Rusk, Jan. 2, 1882, and still in office.

The constitution divided the State into nineteen senatorial and sixty-six assembly districts. In each of these districts, on the 8th of May, 1848, one member was elected.

The first Legislature of the State began its session at Madison, the capital, where all subsequent ones have convened. The commencement and ending of each session, with the names of the speakers, were as follows. Ninean E. Whiteside, June 5, 1848, to August 21; Harrison C. Hobart, Jan. 10, 1849, to April 2; Moses M. Strong, Jan. 9, 1850, to February 11; Frederick W. Horn, Jan. 8, 1851, to March 17; James M. Shafer, Jan. 14, 1852, to April 19; Henry L. Palmer, Jan. 12, 1853, to April 4; Henry L. Barrows, June 4, 1878, to June 7; David M. Kelley, Jan. 8, 1879, to March 5; Alexander A. Arnold, Jan. 14, 1880, to March 17; Ira D. Bradford, Jan. 12, 1881, to April 4; Franklin L. Gilson, Jan. 11, 1882, to March 31; Earl P. Finch, Jan. 10, 1883, to April 4.

The constitution divided the State into two congressional districts, in each of which one member of Congress was elected May 8, 1848. The first district embraced the counties of Milwaukee, Waukesha, Jefferson, Racine, Walworth, Rock and Green; the second district was composed of the counties of Washington, Sheboygan, Manitowoc, Calumet, Brown, Winnebago, Fond du Lac, Marquette, Sauk, Portage, Columbia, Dodge, Dane, Iowa, Lafayette, Grant, Richland, Crawford, Chippewa, St. Croix and La Pointe—the counties of Richland, Chippewa and La Pointe being unorganized. (It may here be stated that the first Legislature changed the apportionment, making three districts; other apportionments have been made at each decade, so that there are now nine congressional districts.) The first members were elected to the XXXth Congress, which expired March 4, 1849. The members elected from Wisconsin to that and subsequent Congresses are:

 Ninth District.—Isaac Stephenson.

The first Legislature in joint convention, on the 7th of June 1848, canvassed, in accordance with the constitution, the votes given on the 8th of May, for the State officers, and the two representatives in Congress. On the same day the State officers were sworn into office. The next day Gov. Dewey delivered his first message to the Legislature. The first important business of the first State Legislature was the election of two United States senators; Henry Dodge and Isaac P. Walker, both democrats, were elected. The latter drew the short term; so that his office expired on the 4th day of March, 1849, at the end of the thirteenth Congress; as Dodge drew the long term, his office expired on the 4th day of March, 1851, at the end of thirty-first Congress. Both were elected, June 8, 1848. Their successors, with the date of their elections, were as follows:

Isaac P. Walker, Jan. 17, 1849; Henry Dodge, Jan. 20, 1851; Charles Durkee, Feb. 1, 1855; James R. Doolittle, Jan. 23, 1857; Timothy O. Howe, Jan. 23, 1861; James R. Doolittle, Jan. 22, 1863; Timothy O. Howe, Jan. 24, 1867; Matthew H. Carpenter, Jan. 26, 1869; Timothy O. Howe, Jan. 21, 1873; Angus Cameron, Feb. 3, 1875; Matthew H. Carpenter, Jan. 22, 1879; Philetus Sawyer, Jan. 26, 1881; Angus Cameron, March 10, 1881.

The constitution vested the judicial power of the State in a supreme court, circuit court, courts of probate, and justices of the peace, giving the Legislature power to vest such jurisdiction as should be deemed necessary in municipal courts. Judges were not to be elected at any State or county election, nor within thirty days before or after one. The State was divided into five judicial circuits, Edward V. Whiton being chosen judge at the election on the first Monday in August, 1848, of the first circuit, composed of the counties of Racine, Walworth, Rock and Green as then constituted; Levi Hubbell, of the second, composed of Milwaukee, Waukesha, Jefferson and Dane; Charles H. Larrabee, of the third, composed of Washington, Dodge, Columbia, Marquette, Sauk and Portage, as then formed; Alexander W. Stow, of the fourth, composed of Brown, Manitowoc, Sheboygan, Fond du Lac, Winnebago and Calumet; and Mortimer M. Jackson, of the fifth, composed of the counties of Iowa, Lafayette, Grant, Crawford and St Croix, as then organized; the county of Richland being attached to Iowa county; the county of Chippewa to the county of Crawford; and the county of La Pointe to the county of St. Croix, for judicial purposes. In 1850, a sixth circuit was formed. By an act, which took effect in 1854, a seventh circuit was formed. On the 1st day of January, 1855, an eighth and ninth circuit was formed. In the same year was also formed a tenth circuit. An eleventh circuit was formed in 1864. By an act which took effect the 1st day of January, 1871, the twelfth circuit was formed. In 1876 a thirteenth circuit was "constituted and reorganized."

HISTORY OF WISCONSIN.

At the present time John M. Wentworth is judge of the first circuit, which is composed of the counties of Walworth, Racine, and Kenosha; Charles A. Hamilton of the second, which includes Milwaukee county; David J. Pulling of the third, composed of Calumet, Green Lake and Winnebago; Norman S. Gilson of the fourth, composed of Sheboygan, Manitowoc, Kewaunee and Fond du Lac; George Clementson of the fifth, composed of Grant, Iowa, La Fayette, Richland and Crawford; Alfred W. Newman of the sixth, composed of Clark, Jackson, La Crosse, Monroe, Trempealeau and Vernon; Charles M. Webb of the seventh, composed of Portage, Marathon, Waupaca, Wood, Waushara, Lincoln, Price, and Taylor; Egbert B. Bundy of the eighth, composed of Buffalo, Dunn, Eau Claire, Pepin, Pierce, and St. Croix; Alva Stewart of the ninth, composed of Adams, Columbia, Dane, Juneau, Sauk, Marquette; George II. Myres, of the tenth, composed of Florence, Langlade, Outagamie, and Shawano; Solon C. Clough of the eleventh, composed of Ashland, Barron, Bayfield, Burnett, Chippewa, Douglas, Polk, and Washburn; John H. Bennett the twelfth, composed of Rock, Green, and Jefferson; A. Scott Sloan, of the Thirteenth, composed of Dodge, Ozaukee, Washington, and Waukesha; Samuel D. Hastings of the fourteenth, composed of Brown, Door, Marinette and Oconto.

The first Legislature provided for the re-election of judges of the circuit courts on the first Monday of August, 1848. By the same act it was provided that the first term of the supreme court should be held in Madison, on the second Monday of January, 1849, and thereafter at the same place and on the same day, yearly; afterward changed so as to hold a January and June term in each year. Under the constitution, the circuit judges were also judges of the supreme court. One of their own number under an act of June 29, 1848, was to be, by themselves, elected chief justice. Under this arrangement, the following were the justices of the supreme court, at the times indicated: Alex. W. Stow, C. J., fourth, district, Aug. 28, 1848, to Jan. 1, 1851; Edward V. Whiton, A. J., first circuit, Aug. 28, 1848, to June 1, 1858; Levi Hubbell, A. J., elected chief justice, June 18, 1851, second circuit, Aug. 28, 1848, to June 1, 1853; Charles H. Larrabee, A. J., third circuit, Aug. 28, 1848, to June 1, 1853; Mortimer M. Jackson, A. J., fifth circuit, Aug. 28, 1848, to June 1, 1853; Timothy O. Howe, A. J., fourth circuit, Jan. 1, 1851, to June 1, 1853; Hiram Knowlton, A. J., sixth circuit, organized by the Legislature in 1850, Aug. 6, 1850, to June 1, 1853. In 1853, the supreme court was separately organized, the chief justice and associate justices being voted for as such. The following persons have constituted that court during the terms indicated, since its separate organization: Edward V. Whiton, C. J., June 1, 1853, to April 12, 1859; Luther S. Dixon, C. J., April 20, 1859, to June 17 1874; Edward G. Ryan, C. J., June 17, 1874, to Oct. 19, 1880; Orsamus Cole, C. J., Nov. 11, 1880, (in office); Samuel Crawford, A. J., June 1, 1853, to June 19, 1855; Abraham D. Smith, A. J., June 1, 1853, to June 21, 1859; Orsamus Cole, A. J., June 19, 1855, to Nov. 11, 1880; Byron Paine, A. J., June 21, 1859, to Nov. 15, 1864; Jason Downer, A. J., Nov. 15, 1864, to Sept. 11, 1867; Byron Paine, A. J., Sept. 11, 1867, to Jan. 13, 1871; William P. Lyon, A. J., Jan. 20, 1870, (in office); David Taylor, A. J., April 18, 1878, (in office); Harlow S. Orton, A. J., April 18, 1878, (in office); John B. Cassoday, A. J., Nov. 11, 1880, (in office).

The act of Congress entitled "An act to enable the people of Wisconsin territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union," approved Aug. 6, 1846, provided for one United States judicial district to be called the district of Wisconsin. It was also provided that a district court should be held therein by one judge who should reside in the district and be called district judge. The court was to hold two terms a year in the capital, Madison. This was afterward changed so that one term only was held at the seat of the State government, while the other was to be held at Milwaukee. Special terms could be held at either of these places. On the 12th day of June, 1848, Andrew G. Miller was appointed by the President district judge. By the act of Congress of July 15, 1862 a circuit court of the United States was created to be held in Wisconsin. The district judge was given power to hold the circuit court in Wisconsin in company with the circuit judge and circuit justice, or either of them, or alone in their absence. Wisconsin now composes a portion of the seventh judicial circuit of the United States, Thomas Drummond being circuit judge. He resides at Chicago. The circuit justice is one of judges of the United States supreme court. Two terms of the circuit court are held each year at Milwaukee and one term in Madison.

In 1870 the State was divided into two districts, the eastern and western. In the western district, one term of the United States district court each year was to be held at Madison and one at La Crosse; in the eastern district, two terms were to be held at Milwaukee and one at Oshkosh. On the 9th day of July, 1870, James C. Hopkins was appointed judge of the western district, Andrew G. Miller remaining judge of the eastern district. The latter resigned to take effect Jan. 1, 1874, and James H. Howe was appointed to fill the vacancy; but Judge Howe soon resigned, and Charles E. Dyer, on the 10th of February, 1875, appointed in his place. He is still in office. Judge Hopkins, of the western district, died Sept. 4, 1877; when, on the 13th of October following, Romanzo Bunn was appointed his successor, and now fills that office.

An act was passed by the first Legislature providing for the election and defining the duties of a State superintendent of public instruction. The persons holding that office, with the term of each, are as follows: Eleazer Root, from Jan. 1, 1849, to Jan. 5, 1852; Azel P. Ladd, from Jan. 5, 1852, to Jan. 2, 1854; Hiram A. Wright, from Jan. 5, 1854, to May 29, 1855; A. Constantine Barry, from June 26, 1855, to Jan. 4, 1858; Lyman C. Draper, from Jan. 4, 1858, to Jan. 2, 1860; Josiah L. Pickard, from Jan. 2, 1860, to Sept. 30, 1864; John G. McMynn, from Oct. 1, 1864, to Jan. 6, 1868; Alexander J. Craig, from Jan. 6, 1868, to Jan. 3, 1870; Samuel Fallows, from Jan. 6, 1870, to Jan. 4, 1874; Edward Searing, from Jan. 4, 1874, to Jan. 7, 1878; William C. Whitford, from Jan. 7, 1878, to Jan. 2, 1882; Robert Graham, from Jan. 2, 1882, (now in office.)

By the same Legislature, a State University was established. The school system of Wisconsin embraces graded schools, to be found in all the cities and larger villages, the district schools, organized in the smaller villages and in the country generally, besides the University of Wisconsin, (located at Madison, the capital of the State). The university has three departments: the college of letters, the college of arts, and the college of law. It was founded upon a grant of seventy-two sections of land made by Congress to the territory of Wisconsin. That act required the secretary of the treasury to set apart and reserve from sale, out of any public lands within the territory of Wisconsin, "a quantity of land, not exceeding two entire townships, for the support of a university within the said territory and for no other use or purpose whatsoever; to be located in tracts of land not less than an entire section corresponding with any of the legal divisions into which the public lands are authorized to be surveyed." The territorial Legislature, at its session in 1838, passed a law incorporating the "University of the Territory of Wisconsin," locating the same at or near Madison. In 1841 a commissioner was appointed to select the lands donated to the State for the maintenance of the university, who performed the duty assigned to him in a most acceptable manner. Section 6 of article X of the State constitution provides that "provision shall be made by law for the establishment of a State University at or near the seat of government. The proceeds of all lands that have been or may hereafter be granted by the United States to the State, for the support of a University shall be and remain a perpetual fund, to be called the 'University fund,' the interest of which shall be appropriated to the support of the State University." Immediately upon the organization of the State government an act was passed incorporating the State University, and a board of regents appointed, who at once organized the institution.

The University was formally opened by the public inauguration of a chancellor, Jan. 16, 1850. The preparatory department of the University was opened Feb. 5, 1849, with twenty pupils. In 1849 the regents purchased nearly 200 acres of land, comprising what is known as the "University Addition to the City of Madison," and the old "University Grounds." In 1851 the north dormitory was completed, and the first college classes formed. In 1854 the south dormitory was erected. Owing to the fact that the lands comprising the original grant had produced a fund wholly inadequate to the support of the university, in 1854 a further grant of seventy-two sections of land was made by Congress to the State for that purpose. In 1866 the University was completely re-organized, so as to meet the requirements of a law of Congress passed in 1862, providing for the endowment of agricultural colleges. That act granted to the several States a quantity of land equal to 30,000 acres for each senator and representative in Congress, by the apportionment under the census of 1880. The objects of that grant are fully set forth in sections four and five of said act. The lands received by Wisconsin under said act of Congress, and conferred upon the State University for the support of an agricultural college, amounted to 240,000 acres, making a total of 322,160 acres of land donated to this State by the general government for the endowment and support of this institution. Up to the time of its re-organization, the University had not received one dollar from the State or from any municipal corporation. In pursuance of a law passed in 1866, Dane county issued bonds to the amount of $40,000 for the purchase of about 200 acres of land contiguous to the University grounds for an experimental farm, and for the erection of suitable buildings thereon. The next winter the Legislature passed a law which appropriated annually for ten years to the income of the University Fund, $7,308.76, that being the interest upon the sum illegally taken from the fund by the law of 1862 to pay for the erection of buildings.

In 1870 the Legislature appropriated $50,000 for the erection of a female college, which is the first contribution made outright to the up-building of any institution of learning in this State. In order to comply with the law granting lands for the support of agricultural colleges, the University was compelled to make large outlays in fitting up laboratories and purchasing the apparatus necessary for instruction and practical advancement in the arts immediately connected with the industrial interests of the state, a burden which the Legislature very generously shared by making a further annual appropriation in 1872 of $10,000 to the income of the University Fund. The increased facilities offered by improvements in the old and by the erection of a new college building proved wholly inadequate to meet the growing wants of the institution. In its report for 1874, the board of visitors said: "A hail of natural sciences is just now the one desideratum of the University. It can never do the work it ought to do, the work the State expects it to do, without some speedily increased facilities." The Legislature promptly responded to this demand, and at its next session appropriated $50,000 for the erection of a building for scientific purposes. In order to permanently provide for deficiencies in the University Fund income, and to establish the institution upon a firm and enduring foundation, the Legislature of 1878 enacted

HISTORY OF WISCONSIN.

“That there shall be levied and collected for the year 1876 and annually thereafter, a State tax of one-tenth of one mill for each dollar of the assessed valuation of the taxable property of this State, and the amount so levied and collected is hereby appropriated to the University Fund income, to be used as a part thereof.” This is in lieu of all other appropriations for the benefit of this fund, and all tuition fees for students in the regular classes are abolished by this act.

“The fourth section of the act of 1876, to permanently provide for deficiencies in the University Fund income, is as follows: “From and out of the receipts of said tax, the sum of $3,000 annually shall be set apart for astronomical work and for instruction in astronomy, to be expended under the direction of the regents of the University of Wisconsin, as soon as a complete and well equipped observatory shall be given the University, on its own grounds without cost to the State: Provided, that such observatory shall be completed within three years from the passage of this act.” The astronomical Observatory whose construction was provided for by this act, was erected by the wise liberality of ex-Gov. Washburn. It is a beautiful stone building, finely situated and well fitted for its work. Its length is eighty feet, its breadth forty-two feet, and its height forty-eight feet. Over the door to the rotunda is a marble tablet bearing this inscription: “Erected and furnished, A. D. 1878, by the munificence of Cadwallader C. Washburn, and by him presented to the University of Wisconsin; a tribute to general science. In recognition of this gift, this tablet is inserted by the regents of the University.” The telescope has a sixteen inch object-glass. The size is a most desirable one for the great mass of astronomical work. In 1881 a students’ observatory was erected and a wing was added to the east side of the Washburn observatory.

In the fall of 1848 there was a Presidential election, There were then three organized political parties in the State—whig, democrat and free-soil, each having a ticket in the field but the democrats were in the majority. The successful electors for that year and for each four years since that date, were as follows

The act of the first Legislature of the State, exempting a homestead from forced sale on any debt or liability contracted after Jan. 1, 1849, and another act exempting certain personal property, were laws the most liberal in their nature passed by any State in the Union previous to that time. Other acts were passed—such as were deemed necessary to put the machinery of the State government in all its branches, in fair running order. And, by the second Legislature (1849) were enacted a number of laws of public utility. The statutes were revised, making a volume of over 900 pages. The year 1848 was one of general prosperity to the rapidly increasing population of the State; and that of 1849 developed in an increased ratio its productive capacity in every department of labor. The agriculturist, the artisan, the miner, reaped the well-earned reward of his honest labor. The commercial and manufacturing interests were extended in a manner highly creditable to the enterprise of the people. The educational interests of the State began to assume a more systematic organization. The tide of immigration suffered no decrease during the year. Within the limits of Wisconsin, the oppressed of other climes continued to find welcome and happy homes. There were many attractions for emigrants from the Old World, especially from northern Europe—from Germany, Norway, Sweden and Denmark; also from Ireland and England.

The third Legislature changed the January term of the supreme court to December and organized a sixth judicial circuit. The first charitable institution in Wisconsin, incorporated by the State, was the "Wisconsin Institute for the Education of the Blind." A school for that unfortunate class had been opened in Janesville, in the latter part of 1849, receiving its support from the citizens of that place and vicinity. By an act of the Legislature, approved Feb. 9, 1850, this school was taken under the care of the Institute, to continue and maintain it, at Janesville, and to qualify, as far as might be, the blind of the State for the enjoyment of the blessings of a free government; for obtaining the means of subsistence; and for the discharge of those duties, social and political, devolving upon American citizens. It has since been supported from the treasury of the State. On the 7th of October, 1850, it was opened for the reception of pupils, under the direction of a board of trustees appointed by the governor. The other charitable institutions of the State are the State Hospital for the Insane, located near Madison, and opened for patients in July, 1860; Northern Hospital for the Insane, located near Oshkosh, to which patients were first admitted in April, 1873, and the Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, located at Delavan, in Walworth county. The entire length of the building of the Wisconsin State Hospital for the Insane, situated on the north shore of Lake Mendota, in Dane county, is 569 feet, the center building being 65 x 120 feet. The first longitudinal wing on each side of the center is 132 feet, and the last on each extremity is 119 feet. The transverse wings are eighty-seven feet long. This commodious building is surrounded by ornamental grounds, woods and farming lands, to the extent of 393 acres, and is well adapted for the care of the unfortunate needing its protection. In 1879, additional room for 180 patients was added, by converting the old chapel into wards, and by the addition of cross wings in front of the old building. The hospital will now accommodate comfortably 550 patients. In 1870 a law was passed authorizing the erection of the building for the Northern Hospital, on a tract, consisting of 337 acres of land, about four miles north of the city of Oshkosh on the west shore of Lake Winnebago. The necessary appropriations were made, and the north wing and central building were completed. Further appropriations were made from time to time for additional wings, and in 1875 the hospital was completed according to the original design, at a total cost to the State of $625,250. The building has been constructed on the most approved plan, and is suited to accommodate 600 patients.

The land first occupied by the Wisconsin Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, comprising 11 46—100 acres, was donated by Hon. F. K. Phoenix, one of the first trustees, but the original boundaries have since been enlarged by the purchase of twenty-two acres. The main building was burned to the ground on the 16th of September, 1879; but during the year 1880 four new buildings were erected, and with the increased facilities provided, 250 children may be well cared for. The new buildings are a school house, boys' dormitory, dining-room and chapel, with a main or administration building. These buildings are plain, neat, substantial structures, and well fitted for the uses intended.

HISTORY OF WISCONSIN.

The Institution was originally a private school for the deaf, but was incorporated by act of the Legislature, April 19, 1852. It designs to educate that portion of the children and youth of the State, who, on account of deafness, cannot be educated in the public schools. Instruction is given by signs, by written language, and by articulation. In the primary department few books are used, slates, pencils, crayons, pictures, blocks and other illustrative apparatus being the means employed. In the intermediate department the books used are prepared especially for the deaf and dumb; more advanced pupils study textbooks used in our common schools. The shoe shop commenced business in 1867, the printing office in 1878, and the bakery in 1881. The law provides that all deaf and dumb residents of the State of the age of ten years and under twenty-five, of suitable age and capacity to receive instruction, shall be received and taught free of charge for board and tuition, but parents and guardians are expected to furnish clothing and pay traveling expenses.

The taking of the census by the United State, this year, 1850, showed a population for Wisconsin of 305,891—the astonishing increase in two years of nearly 95,000. Many, as already stated, were German, Scandinavian and Irish; but the larger proportion were, of course, from the Eastern and Middle States of the Union. The principal attractions of Wisconsin were the excellency and cheapness of its lands, its valuable mines of lead, its extensive forests of pine, and the unlimited water-power of its numerous streams. In 1860 the population had increased to 775,881; in 1870 to 1,054,670, and in 1880 to 1,815,480. By an act of the fourth Legislature of the State, approved March 14, 1851, the location and erection of a State prison for Wisconsin was provided for, Waupun, Dodge county, being afterwards the point selected for it. The office of State prison commissioner was created in 1858, but was abolished in 1874. During that time the following persons held the office: John Taylor, from March 28, 1853 to April 2, 1853; Henry Brown, from April 2, 1853 to Jan. 2, 1854; Argalus W. Starks, from Jan. 2, 1854 to Jan. 7, 1856; Edward McGarry, from Jan. 7, 1856 to Jan. 4, 1858; Edward M. MacGraw, from Jan. 4, 1858 to Jan. 2, 1860; Hans C. Heg, from Jan. 2, 1860 to Jan. 6, 1862; Alexander P. Hodges, from Jan. 6, 1862 to Jan. 4, 1864; Henry Cordier, from Jan. 4, 1864 to Jan. 3, 1870; George F. Wheeler, from Jan. 3, 1870 to Jan. 1, 1874. The State (Law) Library had its origin in the generous appropriation of $5,000 out of the general treasury, by Congress, contained in the seventeenth section of the organic act creating the territory of Wisconsin. At the first session of the territorial Legislature, held at Belmont in 1836, a joint resolution was adopted appointing a committee to select and purchase a library for the use of the territory. The first appropriation by the State, to replenish the library, was made in 1851. Since that time, several appropriations have been made. The number of volumes in the library at the beginning of 1883 was 16,285.

The fifth Legislature—the Assembly, whig, the Senate, democratic—passed an act authorizing banking. This was approved by the governor, L. J. Farwell, April 19, 1852. The question of “bank or no bank” having been submitted to the people in November previous, and decided in favor of banks; the power was thereby given to the Legislature of 1852 to grant bank charters or to pass a general banking law. By the act just mentioned, the office of bank comptroller was created, but was abolished by an act of Jan. 3, 1870. During the continuance of the law, the following persons filled the office, at the time given: James S. Baker, from Nov. 20, 1852 to Jan. 2, 1854; William M. Dennis, from Jan. 2, 1854 to Jan. 4, 1858; Joel C. Squires, from Jan. 4, 1858 to Jan. 2, 1860; Gysbert Van Steenwyk, from Jan. 2, 1860 to Jan. 6, 1862; William H. Ramsey, from Jan. 6, 1862 to Jan. 1, 1865; Jeremiah M. Husk, from Jan. 1, 1866 to Jan. 3, 1870. The sixth Wisconsin Legislature commenced its session, as we have seen, Jan. 12, 1853. On the 26th of that month charges were preferred in the Assembly against Levi Hubbell, judge of the second circuit court, for divers acts of corruption and malfeasance in office. A resolution directed a committee to go to the Senate and impeach Hubbell. On the trial he was acquitted. By an act of the same Legislature, the State Agricultural Society was incorporated. Since its organization the society has printed a number of volumes of transactions, and has held, except during the civil war, annual fairs. Its aid to the agricultural interests of the State are clearly manifest. Farming, in Wisconsin, is confined at the present time to the south half of the State, the northern half being still largely covered by forests. The surface of the agricultural portion is, for the most part, gently undulating, consisting largely of prairies alternating with "oak openings." The State is essentially a grain growing one, though stock-raising and dairy farming are rapidly gaining in importance. Wheat, the staple product of Wisconsin, is gradually losing its prestige as the farmer's sole dependence, and mixed farming is coming to the front. About twenty bushels of wheat are raised annually to each inhabitant of the State. Much more attention is now paid to fertilizers than formerly, clover and plaster being looked upon with constantly increasing favor. While within the last ten years stock-raising has been a growing interest, yet it has not been a rapid one; not so, however, with dairying—no other agricultural interest has kept pace with this. The principal markets for the farm products of Wisconsin are Milwaukee and Chicago.

By an act approved March 4, 1853, the State Historical Society was incorporated, it having been previously organized. The society is under the fostering care of the State, each Legislature voting a respectable sum for its benefit. It has published a number of volumes of "Collections" and of catalogues. Its rooms are in the capitol at Madison, where are to be found its library of historical books and pamphlets, the largest in the northwest. On the 21st of September, 1853, Timothy Burns, lieutenant-governor of the State, died at La Crosse. As a testimonial of respect for the deceased, the several State departments, in accordance with a proclamation of Gov. Farwell, were closed for one day, October 3. The year 1850, to the agriculturalist, was not one of much prosperity in Wisconsin, owing to the partial failure of the wheat crop. The State was visited during the year by cholera, riot, however, to a very alarming extent. In 1851 the State was prosperous. In 1852 the citizens of Wisconsin enjoyed unusual prosperity. There were abundant harvests and high markets; an increase of money and a downward tendency of the rates of interest. The next year (1853) was also one in which every branch of industry prospered. There was an especial increase in commerce and manufactures. And here it might be said that next to agriculture the most important pursuit in Wisconsin is manufacturing; foremost in this interest is lumber, of which the pineries furnish the raw material. The pine region extends through the northern counties of the State from Green Bay to the St. Croix river. The demand for lumber is constantly increasing, while the facilities for its manufacture are continually enlarging. Over one billion feet of logs are cut annually. The lumber mills have a capacity exceeding one and one-half billion feet. The products of these find their way to market, either by the Mississippi and its tributaries, by the various lines of railways, or through the great lakes. The other leading articles of manufacture are flour, agricultural implements and malt liquors.

The fourth administration—William A. Barstow, governor—was signalized by a fugitive slave case, which greatly excited the people of Wisconsin. Sherman M. Booth, for assisting in the rescue of Joshua Glover, a fugitive slave, was arrested, but discharged by the supreme court. He was again arrested under an indictment in the United States district court, and a second time discharged by the supreme court; but the supreme court of the United States reversed the action of the State court in its second discharge of Booth, and he was rearrested in 1860; the sentence of the district court was executed in part upon him, when he was pardoned by the President. The eighth Legislature of the State (Jan. 10—April 2, 1855), passed an act very liberal in its provisions relative to the rights of married women. On the 27th of June, 1855, Hiram A. Wright, superintendent of public instruction, died at Prairie du Chien. The State census, taken in this year (1855), showed a population of 552,109. In 1865, the number had increased to 868,325; in 1875, to 1,236,729. Industrial occupations in Wisconsin were prosperous during the years 1854 and 1855. The fifth administration began with William A. Barstow in the executive chair, by virtue of a certificate from the board of canvassers, that he had been a second time elected governor by a majority (as previously shown) of 157. But this certificate was set aside by the supreme court, giving the office to Coles Bashford, not, however, until Barstow had resigned, and Arthur McArthur, acting, by virtue of his office of lieutenant-governor, as governor from March 21, to March 25, 1856. A dry season during this year diminished the wheat crop. The tenth Legislature of Wisconsin—Jan. 14 to March 9, 1857—passed an act establishing at Waukesha a house of refuge for juvenile delinquents, afterwards called the State Reform School; now known as the Wisconsin Industrial School for boys. It was opened in 1860. The buildings are located on the southern bank of Fox river, in view of the trains as they pass to and from Milwaukee and Madison, presenting an attractive front to the traveling public, and furnishing the best evidence of the parental care of the State authorities for the juvenile wards within its borders. The buildings include a main central building, three stories high, used for the residence of the superintendent's family, office chapel, school rooms, reading room and library, officers kitchen, dining room, and lodging, furnace room and cellar. On the east of the main central building are three family buildings, three stories high, each with dining hall, play room, bath room, dressing room, hospital room, officers' rooms, dormitory and store room. On the west of the main central building are four family buildings like those on the east in all respects, with the exception of the building at the west end of this line, which is a modern building with stone basement. In the rear of this line of buildings is the shop building, 38x258 feet, three stories high, which embrace boot factory, sock and knitting factory, tailor shop, carpenter shop, engine room, laundry and steam dyeing room, bath rooms, store, store rooms, bakery and cellar. The correction house, 44x80 feet, (intended for the most refractory boys) and will accommodate forty; a double family building 38x117 feet for the accommodation of two families of boys of fifty each. There is on the farm, which consists of 283 acres of land, a comfortable house, a stone carriage and horse barn two stories high, built in the most substantial manner.

The constitution of the State, adopted in 1848, provides, "that the revenue of the school fund shall be exclusively applied to the following objects: "1st. To the support and maintenance of common schools in each school district, and the purchase of suitable libraries and appurtenances therefore. "2d. That the residue of the income of the school fund shall be appropriated to the support of academies and normal schools, and suitable libraries and appurtenances therefore." No effort was made to take advantage of this provision of the constitution for the endowment of normal schools until 1857; when an act was passed providing "that the income of twenty-five per cent. of the proceeds arising from the sale of swamp and overflowed lands should be appropriated to normal institutes and academies, under the supervision and direction of a "board of regents of normal schools," who were to be appointed in pursuance of the provisions of that act. Under this law, the income placed at the disposal of the regents was distributed for several years to such colleges, academies and high schools as maintained a normal class, and in proportion to the number of pupils in the class who passed satisfactory examinations, conducted by an agent of the board. In 1865, the Legislature divided the swamp lands and swamp land fund into two equal parts, one for drainage purposes, the other to constitute a normal school fund. The income of the latter was to be applied to establishing, supporting and maintaining normal schools, under the direction and management of the board of regents of normal schools, with a proviso that one-fourth of such income should be transferred to the common school fund, until the annual income of that fund should reach $200,000. During the same year, proposals were invited for extending aid in the establishment of a normal school, and propositions were received from various places.

In 1866, the board of regents was incorporated by the Legislature. In February, Platteville was conditionally selected as the site of a school, and as it had become apparent that a productive fund of about $600,000, with a net income of over $80,000, was already in hand, with a prospect of a steady increase as fast as lands were sold, the board, after a careful investigation and consideration of the different methods, decided upon the policy of establishing several schools, and of locating them in different parts of the State. At a meeting held on the 2d day of May, in the same year, the board designated Whitewater as the site of a school for the southeastern section of the State, where a building was subsequently erected; and on the 16th permanently located a school at Platteville, the academy building having been donated for that purpose. The school at Platteville was opened Oct. 9, 1866. The school at Whitewater was opened on the 21st of April, 1868.

1870 for a third normal school, at Oshkosh, but owing to a lack of funds, it was not opened for the admission of pupils during that year. The opening and the ceremony of dedicating the building took place Sept. 19, 1871. A fourth normal school was opened in September, 1875, at River Falls, Pierce county. It is understood to be the policy of the board of regents to establish eventually, when the means at their disposal shall permit, not less than six normal schools, but several years must elapse before so many can go into operation. The law under which these schools are organized provides that "The exclusive purpose of each normal school shall be the instruction and training of persons, both male and female, in the theory and art of teaching, and in all the various branches that pertain to a good common school education, and in all subjects needful to qualify for teaching in the public schools; also to give instruction in the fundamental laws of the United States and of this State and in what regards the rights and duties of citizens."

Subsidiary to the State normal schools are teachers' institutes, held annually in nearly every settled county, and the State teachers' association, which has been organized for a quarter of a century. Besides the public schools of the State, there are a number of denominational and other colleges, the principal of which are Racine College, Beloit College, Milton College, Ripon College, Carroll College, at Waukesha; Lawrence University, at Appleton; St. John's College, at Prairie du Chien; Galesville University; Northwestern University, at Watertown; and Pio Nono College, at St. Francis Station, south of Milwaukee. There is also quite a large number of incorporated academies and seminaries, the more prominent ones being the Milwaukee Academy and St. Mary's Institute, at Milwaukee; Kemper Hall, at Kenosha; St. Catharine's Academy, at Racine; Rochester Seminary, Lake Geneva Seminary, Fox Lake Seminary, Albion Academy, Elroy Seminary, Wayland Institute, at Beaver Dam, and Santa Clara Academy, at Sinsinawa Mound; There are also about 700 private schools in Wisconsin. The whole number of children in Wisconsin between four and twenty years of age is 483,071; the number of pupils in attendance in public schools, 299,019. The aggregate valuation of school property in the State is $5,297,678.24.

The sixth administration, Alexander W. Randall, governor, was noted for its "long parliament," the eleventh Legislature of the State having been in session 125 days. A report of commissioners previously appointed to revise the statutes, was acted upon during the session, the result being the publication, in one volume, of the "Revised Statutes of 1858." The twelfth Legislature (Jan. 12, to March 21, 1859) was, like the two previous Legislatures, republican. At the commencement of the seventh administration, Randall's second term as governor, that party not only had control of the thirteenth Legislature, but of all the State offices. The governor, in his message to the fourteenth Legislature, on the 10th of January, 1861, declared that the right of a State to secede from the Union, could never be admitted. "The government must be sustained, the laws shall be enforced!" An extra session of the Legislature was convened on the 15th of May, at which, no acts were passed except such as appertained to the military exigencies of the times. Meanwhile a demand made upon the governor by the President, for troops to sustain the federal arm, met with a quick response. During the year, 9,991 men, in ten regiments, for three years' service, and one regiment for three months service, of 810 men, were sent out of the State. The number of volunteers originally in the several military organizations, from Wisconsin during the war, were as follows:

On the 10th of April, 1862, Gov. Louis P. H. Harvey, the successor of Alexander W. Randall, started, along with others, from Wisconsin on a tour to relieve the wounded and suffering soldiers from this State, at Mound City, Paducah and Savannah. Having completed his mission, he made preparations to return. He went on board a boat, the Dunleith, at the landing in Savannah, and there awaited the arrival of the Minnehaha, which was to convey him and his party to Cairo, Ill. It was late in the evening of the 19th of April when the steamer arrived; and as she rounded to her bow touched the Dunleith precipitating the governor into the river. Every effort was made to save his life, but in vain. His body was afterward recovered and brought home for interment.

Edward Salomon, lieutenant-governor, by virtue of a provision of the constitution of the State, succeeded to the office of governor. The enlisting, organization and mustering into the United States service during Randall's administration of thirteen regiments of infantry—the First to the Thirteenth inclusive, and the marching of ten of them out of the State before the close of 1861, also, of one company of cavalry and one company of sharpshooters constituted the effective aid abroad of Wisconsin during that year to suppress the Rebellion. But for the year 1862, this aid, as to number of organizations, was more than doubled. At the end of the year 1863 thirty-three regiments left the State—the Thirteenth regiment being the only remaining one of the thirty-four in Wisconsin. The ninth administration, James T. Lewis, governor, saw the close of the Rebellion. On the 10th of April, 1865, Lewis announced to the Legislature, then in session, the surrender of Gen. Lee and his army.

Fifty-three regiments during the war were raised in Wisconsin, all, sooner or later, moving south and engaging in one way or other in suppressing the Rebellion. Twelve of these regiments were assigned to duty in the eastern division, which constituted the territory on both sides of the Potomac and upon the seaboard from Baltimore to Savannah. These twelve regiments were:

The First (three months), Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, Seventh, Nineteenth, Twenty-sixth, Thirty-sixth, Thirty-seventh and Thirty-eighth.

Ten regiments were assigned to the central division, including Kentucky, Tennessee, Northern Alabama and Georgia. These ten were;

The Tenth, Twenty-first, Twenty-second, Twenty-fourth, Thirtieth, Forty-third, Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh. Added to these was the First (re-organized).

Thirty-one regiments were ordered to the western division, embracing the country west and northwest of the central division. These were:

Eighth, Ninth, Eleventh, Twelfth, Thirteenth, Fourteenth, Fifteenth, Sixteenth, Seventeenth,

During the war several transfers were made from one district to another. There were taken from the eastern division the Third and Twenty-sixth and sent to the central division; also the Fourth, which was sent to the department of the gulf. The Twelfth, Thirteenth Fifteenth, Sixteenth, Seventeenth, Eighteenth, Twenty-fifth, Thirtieth, Thirty-first and Thirty-second were transferred from the western to the central department. The other military organizations from Wisconsin had various assignments. Recruiting ceased in the State on the 13th of April, 1865. It was not many months before Wisconsin's last soldier was mustered out of service. The State furnished during the war over 75,000 men, of which number nearly 11,000 died in the service.

Among all the noble women who gave themselves to the sanitary work of the civil war perhaps few were more peculiarly fitted for forming and carrying out plans than Mrs. C. A. P. Harvey, widow of the late lamented Gov. Louis P. Harvey. She was appointed by Gov. Salomon one of the sanitary agents of the State. She soon procured the establishment of a convalescent hospital at Madison, Wis. The building when no longer needed as a hospital, Mrs. Harvey conceived the idea of having it Converted into a home for soldiers' orphans. On Jan. 1, 1866, the home was opened with eighty-four orphans, Mrs. Harvey at the head. The necessary funds had been raised by subscription; but it soon became a State institution. The orphans were not only maintained but brought up to habits of industry. But it was not long before the number of the inmates began to decrease, owing to the fact that homes were found for many, while some were returned to their mothers; none were kept in the institution after they had reached the age of fifteen. At length when the number had diminished to less than forty children, it was thought best to close the institution. This was in 1875. The whole number of orphans cared for during the continuance of the home was about 700. The Legislature then transferred the building to the regents of the University of Wisconsin, who disposed of it; and a Norwegian seminary is now established therein.

During the tenth administration, Lucius Fairchild, governor, the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, the northwestern branch of the National institution, was established in Wisconsin, three miles from Milwaukee. It has a capacious brick building, containing accommodations for 1,000 inmates. In addition to this building which contains the main halls, eating apartment, offices, dormitory and engine room, are shops, granaries, stables and other out-buildings. The Home farm contains 410 acres, of which over one-half is cultivated The remainder is a wooded park traversed by shaded walks and drives, beautifully undulating. The main line of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad runs through the farm, and the track of the northern division passes beside it. Soldiers who were disabled in the service of the United States in the War of the Rebellion, the Mexican War, or the War of 1812, and have been honorably discharged, are entitled to admission to the Soldiers' Home.

A law was passed in 1867 creating the office of insurance commissioner, the secretary of State being assigned to its duties. But, in 1876, it was made a distinct office, to be filled by the governor's appointment. It was, however, made elective in 1881. Philip L. Spooner has served since April 1, 1878, and is still in office. The joint-stock fire insurance companies of Wisconsin are three in number, its mutual companies also three. There is but one life insurance company in the State. A large number of fire and life insurance companies located outside of

Early in 1870, during Gov. Fairchild's third term, was organized, and in March of that year incorporated, the "Wisconsin Academy of Sciences, Arts and Letters," having among its specific objects researches and investigations in the various departments of the material, metaphysical, ethical, ethnological and social sciences; a progressive and thorough scientific survey of the State, with a view of determining its mineral, agricultural and other resources; the advancement of the useful arts, through the application of science and by the encouragement of original invention; the encouragement of the fine arts by means of honors and prizes awarded to artists for original works of superior merit; the formation of scientific, economical and art museums; the encouragement of philological and historical research; the collection and preservation of historic records and the formation of a general library, and the diffusion of knowledge by the publication of original contributions to science, literature and the arts. The academy has already published several volumes of transactions, under authority of the State. On the 3d day of July of that year A. J. Craig, superintendent of public instruction, died of consumption, and on the 13th of January following occurred the death of associate justice, Byron Paine, of the supreme court. At the twenty-fourth regular session of the Legislature (January 11—March 25, 1871) a commissioner of emigration, to be elected by the people, was provided for. The office was abolished Jan. 3, 1878. During this time but two persons held the office—Ole C. Johnson, from April 3, 1871, to Jan. 5, 1874; Martin J. Argard, from Jan. 5, 1874, to Jan. 3, 1876. By an act of the Legislature, approved March 4, 1879, the board of immigration of the State of Wisconsin was created, to consist of five members, of which number two are ex-officio—the governor and secretary of State. The principal office is located in Milwaukee, with a branch office at Chicago.

The object is to encourage immigration from Europe to Wisconsin. On the 23d of March, 1871, the State board of charities and reforms was created, to consist of five members to be appointed by the governor of the State, the duties of the members being to investigate and supervise the whole system of charitable and correctional institutions supported by the State or receiving aid from the State treasury. This board have since reported annually to the governor their proceedings. The Wisconsin State horticultural Society, although previously organized, first under the name of the "Wisconsin Fruit Growers' Association," was not incorporated until the 24th of March, 1871—the object of the society being to improve the condition of horticulture, rural adornment and landscape gardening. By a law of 1888 provision was made for the publication of the society's transactions in connection with the State Agricultural Society; but by the act of 1871 this law was repealed and an appropriation made for their yearly publication in separate form. The society holds annual meetings at Madison.

In October, 1871, occurred great fires in northeastern Wisconsin. The counties of Oconto, Brown, Kewaunee, Door, Manitowoc, Outagamie and Shawano suffered more or less. More than 1,000 men, women and children perished. More than 3,000 were rendered destitute. The loss of property has been estimated at $4,000,000. No other calamity so awful in its results has ever visited Wisconsin. A compilation of the public statutes of the State was prepared during the year 1871 by David Taylor (now associate justice of the supreme court), and published in two volumes, known as the "Revised Statutes of 1871." It was wholly a private undertaking, but a very creditable one.

The Wisconsin Dairymen's Association originated in a resolution offered in the Jefferson County Dairymen's Association, Jan. 26, 1872, to issue a call for a meeting of Wisconsin dairymen, to be held at Watertown, Feb. 15,

HISTORY OF WISCONSIN.

1872. A few gentlemen met and organized the Wisconsin Dairymen's Association. The aim of the organization has been to secure improved methods of making butter and cheese and the best markets for shipment and sale. The association holds its annual meeting in January of each year for the discussion of the dairy interests. Dairy fairs are held at each meeting:

There is printed annually by the State printer 2,000 copies of the transactions of the association. The Legislature receives 600 copies, the State Historical Society, Academy of Sciences, Arts and Letters, State Agricultural Society and Northern Wisconsin Agricultural Association receive forty copies each; the remainder are distributed to the members of the association and generally over the State to all who make application for them. The association receives its support from members who join each year, paying the sum of $1, and by appropriations from the State. Wisconsin won first premium on butter in competition with the world; the second premium on Cheddar cheese (the first going to Canada), and the second on fancy shaped cheese at the International Dairy Fair, held in New York city in December, 1877. To the Dairymen's Association belongs the credit of raising the reputation of Wisconsin cheese and butter from the lowest to the highest rank.

On the 23d of March 1873, Lieut.-Gov. Milton H. Pettitt died suddenly and unexpectedly. The Legislature this year passed an act providing for a geological survey of the State, to be completed within four years, by a chief geologist and four assistants, to be appointed by the governor, appropriating for the work an annual payment of $13,000. An act, approved March 25, 1853, authorized the governor to appoint a State geologist, who was to select a suitable person as assistant geologist. Under this law Edward Daniels, on the 1st day of April, 1853, was appointed State geologist, superseded on the 12th day of August, 1854, by James G. Percival, who died in office on the 2d of May, 1856. By an act approved March 8, 1857, James Hall, Ezra Carr and Edward Daniels were appointed by the Legislature geological commissioners. By an act approved April 2, 1860, Hall was made principal of the commission. The survey was interrupted by a repeal March 21, 1862, of previous laws promoting it. However, to complete the survey, the matter was re-instated by the act of the Legislature, approved March 29, the governor, under that act, appointing as chief geologist Increase A. Lapham, April 10, 1873. On the 16th of February, 1875, O. W. Wight succeeded Lapham, but on the 2d of February, 1876, T. C. Chamberlain was appointed Wight's successor, and still holds the office. He has published four volumes of reports in a very able manner, extending from 1873 to 1879, inclusive. Reports were also published by his predecessors.

And just here it may not be inappropriate to say a word concerning the physical history of Wisconsin. "This can be traced back with certainty to a state of complete submergence beneath the waters of the ancient ocean, by which the material of our oldest and deepest strata were deposited. Let an extensive but shallow sea, covering the whole of the present territory of the State, be pictured to the mind, and let it be imagined to be depositing mud and sand, as at the present day, and we have before us the first authentic stage of the history under consideration. Back of that the history is lost in the mists of geologic antiquity. The thickness of the sediments that accumulated in that early period was immense, being measured by thousands of feet. These sediments occupied, of course, an essentially horizontal position, and were doubtless in a large degree hardened into beds of impure sandstone, shale and other sedimentary rock. But in the progress of time an enormous pressure, attended by heat, was brought to bear upon them laterally, or edgewise, by which they were folded and crumpled and forced up out of the water, giving rise to an island, the nucleus of Wisconsin. The force which produced this upheaval is believed to have arisen from the cooling and consequent contraction of the globe. The foldings may be imagined as the wrinkles of a shrinking earth. But the contortion of the beds was a scarcely more wonderful result than the change in the character of the rock which seems to have taken place simultaneously with the folding, indeed, as the result of the heat and pressure attending it. The sediments, that seem to have previously taken the form of impure sandstone and shale for the most part, underwent a change, in which re-arrangement and crystallization of the ingredients played a conspicuous part. By this method, amorphous granite, gneiss, mica schist, syenite, hornblende rocks, chloritic schists and other crystalline rocks were formed.* But to pursue further an inquiry into the geological structure of the State would be foreign to this brief historical sketch of Wisconsin. The subject is ably treated of in the geological reports before referred to.

The actual mineral resources of Wisconsin remain very largely to be developed, its useful mineral material comes under the head of metallic ores and non-metallic substances. Of the first class are the ores of lead, zinc, iron and copper; of the second class are the principal substances found in brick-clay, kaolin, cement rock, limestone for burning into quick lime, limestone for flux, glass-sand, peat and building stone. In Wisconsin lead and zinc are found together; the former has been utilized since 1826, the latter since 1860. The counties of La Fayette, Iowa and Grant—the southwestern counties of the State—are known as the “lead region.” All the lead and zinc obtained in Wisconsin are from these counties. The lead ore is of one kind only—that known as galena. A large amount is produced yearly from the various mining districts in the lead region. The number of pounds raised from single crevices has often been several hundred thousand. The zinc ores were formerly rejected as useless, but their value is, beyond doubt, very great, and they will be a source of wealth to the lead region for a long time to come, as they are now extensively utilized. Iron mining in the State is yet in its infancy. Numbers of blast furnaces have sprung up in the eastern portion, but these smelt Michigan ores almost entirely. The several ores in Wisconsin are red hematite's, brown hematite's, magnetic ores and specular hematite's; the first are found in Dodge county; the second in Portage, Wood and Juneau; the two last in Bayfield, Ashland, Lincoln and Oconto counties.

The thirteenth administration (C. C. Washburn, governor) ended with the year 1873, the republican party in the State being defeated for the first time since the commencement of Randall's administration. The session of the Legislature of 1874 was a noted one for the passage of the “Potter Law,” limiting the compensation for the transportation of passengers, classifying freight, and regulating prices for its carriage on railroads within Wisconsin. Three railroad commissioners were to be appointed by the governor; one for one year, one for two years, and one for three years, whose terms of office should commence on the 14th day of May, and the governor, thereafter, on the first day of May, of each year, should appoint one commissioner for three years. Under this law the governor appointed J. H. Osborn, for three years; George H. Paul, for two years; and J. W. Hoyt, for one year. Under executive direction, this commission inaugurated its labors by compiling, classifying, and putting into convenient form for public use for the first time, all the railroad legislation of the State. In 1876 this board was abolished and a railroad commissioner, to be appointed by the governor every two years, was to take its place. This latter office was made elective in 1881. The commissioners who have held office under these various laws are; John W. Hoyt, from

April 29, 1874, to March 10, 1876; George H. Paul, from April 29, 1874, to March 10, 1876; Joseph H. Osborn, from April 9, 1874, to March 10, 1876; Dana C. Lamb, from March 10, 1876, to Feb. 1, 1878; A. J. Turner, from Feb. 1, 1878, to Feb. 15, 1882; N. P. Haugen, from Feb. 15, 1881, and now in office. The "Potter Law" was resisted by the railroad companies, but ultimately the complete and absolute power of the people, through the Legislature, to modify or altogether repeal their charters was fully sustained by the courts both of the State and the United States. The necessity for railroads in Wisconsin began to be felt while yet it was an appendage of Michigan territory. Great advantages were anticipated from their construction. There was a reason for this. Explorers had published accounts of the wonderful fertility of Wisconsin's soil, the wealth of its broad prairies and forest openings, and the beauty of its lakes and rivers. From 1836, with the hope of improving their condition, thousands of the enterprising yeomanry of New England, New York and Ohio started for the territory. Germans, Scandinavians, and other Nationalities, attracted by the glowing accounts sent abroad, crossed the ocean on their way to the new world; steamers and sail-craft laden with families and their household goods left Buffalo and other lake ports, all bound for Wisconsin. With the development of the agricultural resources of the territory, grain raising became the most prominent interest, and as the settlements extended back from the lake shore the difficulties of transportation of the products of the soil were seriously felt. The expense incurred in moving a load of produce seventy or eighty miles to a market town on the lake shore frequently exceeded the gross sum obtained for the same. All goods, wares and merchandise, and most of the lumber used were hauled by teams from Lake Michigan. To meet the great want, better facilities for transportation railroads were an indispensable necessity. Between the years and 1841, the territorial Legislature of Wisconsin chartered several railroad companies, but with the exception of the Milwaukee & Waukesha Railroad Company, incorporated in 1847, none of the corporations thus created took any particular shape. There are now in Wisconsin the following railroads, costing, in round numbers, $150,000,000: Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul; Chicago & Northwestern; Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha; Milwaukee, Lake Shore Western; Wisconsin Central; Green Bay & Minnesota; Green Bay, Winona & St. Paul; Wisconsin & Minnesota; Chippewa Falls & Western; Fond du Lac, Amboy & Peoria; Prairie du Chien & McGregor; Milwaukee & Northern; Chippewa Falls & Northern, and Wisconsin & Michigan. Other lines are still needed, and present lines should be extended by branch roads. The questions, as we have seen, upon which great issues have been raised between railway corporations in Wisconsin and the people, are now happily settled by securing to the latter their rights, and the former, under the wise and conciliatory policy pursued by their managers, are assured of the safety of their investments. An era of good feeling has succeeded one of distrust and antagonism. The people must use the railroads, and the railroads depend upon the people for sustenance and protection.

In 1874 the Wisconsin commission for the purpose of fish culture was organized. The next year, by reason of State aid, the commission was enabled to commence work. In 1876 was completed the purchase of grounds, the erection of the buildings, and the construction of the ponds (seven in number) of the Madison hatchery, situated in the town of Fitchburg, Dane county. A temporary hatching house was continued for some time in Milwaukee, for the hatching of spawn of the white fish and lake trout. The commission was re-organized in 1878, the number of the members being increased from four to seven. Appropriations by the Legislature have been continued, and the work promises favorable results to the State.

Under an act of 1875 an Industrial School for girls was organized in Milwaukee, where buildings have been erected, capable of accommodating 150 inmates. Its proper subjects are:

(1.) Viciously inclined girls under sixteen, and boys under ten years of age; (2.) The stubborn and unruly, who refuse to obey their proper guardians; (3.) Truants, vagrants and beggars; (4.) Those found in circumstances of manifest danger of falling into habits of vice and immorality; (5.) Those under the above ages who have committed any offense punishable by fine or imprisonment in adult offenders. Although the school was founded by private charity, and is under the control of a self-perpetuating board of managers, it is incorporated and employed by the State for the custody, guardianship, discipline and instruction of the aforementioned children. In default of responsible and efficient guardianship, they are treated as the minors and wards of the State, and by it are committed to the guardianship of this board of ladies during minority.

The application of Miss Lavinia Goodell for admission to the bar of Wisconsin, was rejected by the supreme court at its January term, 1876; but as a law subsequently passed the Legislature, making ladies eligible to practice in the several courts of the State, she was, upon a second application, admitted.

By an act approved March 13, 1876, a State board of health was established, the appointment of a superintendent of vital statistics provided for, and certain duties assigned to local boards of health. The State board was organized soon after, seven persons having been appointed by the governor as its members. And here it is proper to say a word as to the health of Wisconsin. "When we compare the general death-rate of Wisconsin with that of the other States of the Union, we find that it compares most favorably with that of Vermont, the healthiest of the New England States. The United States census of 1850, 1860 and 1870, gives Wisconsin ninety-four deaths to 10,000 of the population, while it gives Vermont 101 to every 10,000 of her inhabitants. The census of 1870 shows that the death-rate from consumption in Minnesota, Iowa, California and Wisconsin are alike. These four States show the lowest death-rate among the States from consumption, the mortality being thirteen to fourteen per cent. of the whole death-rate. Climatologically considered, then, there is not a more healthy State in the Union than the State of Wisconsin. But for health purposes something more is requisite than climate. Climate and soil must be equally good. Men should shun the soil, no matter how rich it be, if the climate is inimical to health, and rather choose the climate that is salubrious, even if the soil is not so rich. In Wisconsin, generally speaking, the soil and climate are equally conducive to health, and alike good for agricultural purposes."*

There was in Wisconsin a general feeling of patriotism (if the acts of its citizens, both native and foreign born, are to be taken as an indication of their attachment to their country), manifested throughout the centennial year, 1876. A board of State centennial managers was provided for by the Legislature, to represent Wisconsin at the Philadelphia exhibition, and $20,000 appropriated for their use, to make there a proper exhibition of the products, resources and advantages of the State. Under a law of this year, three revisers, afterward increased to five, were appointed to revise the statutes of the State. The result was a large volume, ably collated, known as the Revised Statutes of 1878, which was legalized by act of the June session of the Legislature of that year. On the 19th of October, 1880, Chief Justice Edward G. Ryan departed this life, in the seventieth year of his age. He was buried in Milwaukee, with honors becoming the position held by him at the time of his death. His successor, as previously stated, is Chief Justice Orsamus Cole.

By an act of the Legislature of 1881, a board of supervision of Wisconsin charitable, reformatory and penal institutions was founded. The boards of trustees by which these institutions had been governed since their organization were abolished by the same law. The board of supervision consists of five members, who hold their office for five years, and who are appointed by the governor, the Senate concurring. The board acts as commissioners of lunacy, and has full power to investigate all complaints against any of the institutions under its control, to send for books and papers, summon, compel the attendance of, and swear witnesses. The powers delegated to this board are so extraordinary, and its duties so manifold, that a recital of them will be found of interest. They are as follows:

(1.) To maintain and govern the Wisconsin State Hospital for the Insane, the Northern Hospital for the Insane, the Wisconsin State Prison, the Wisconsin Industrial School for Boys, the Wisconsin Institution for the Education of the Blind, and the Wisconsin Institution for the Education of the Deaf and Dumb; and such other charitable and penal institutions as may hereafter be established or maintained by the State. (2.) To carefully supervise and direct the management and affairs of said institutions, and faithfully and diligently promote the objects for which the same have been established. (3) To preserve and care for the buildings, grounds and all property connected with the said institutions. (4.) To take and hold in trust for the said several institutions any land conveyed or devised, or money or property given or bequeathed, to be applied for any purpose connected therewith, and faithfully to apply the same as directed by the donor, and faithfully to apply all funds, effects and property which may be received for the use of such institutions. (5.) To make on or before October 1 in each year, full and complete annual inventories and appraisals of all the property of each of said institutions, which inventories and appraisals shall be recorded, and shall be so classified as to separately show the amount, kind and value of all real and personal property belonging to such institutions. (6.) To make such by-laws, rules and regulations, not incompatible with law, as it shall deem convenient or necessary for the government of the said institutions and for its own government, and cause the same to be printed. (7.) To visit and carefully inspect each of said institutions as often as once in each month, either by the full board or by some member thereof, and ascertain whether all officers, teachers, servants and employees in such institutions are competent and faithful in the discharge of their duties, and all inmates thereof properly cared for and governed, and all accounts, account books and vouchers properly kept, and all the business affairs thereof properly conducted. (8.) To fix the number of subordinate officers, teachers, servants and employees in each of said institutions, and prescribe the duties and compensation of each, and to employ the same upon the nomination of the respective superintendents and wardens. (9.) To promptly remove or discharge any officer, teacher or employee in any of said institutions, who shall be guilty of any malfeasance or misbehavior in office, or of neglect, or improper discharge of duty. (10.) To annually appoint for the Wisconsin State Hospital for the Insane and for the Northern Hospital for the Insane, for each, a superintendent, one assistant physician, a matron, a steward and a treasurer; and for the Institution for the Education of the Blind, and the Institution for the Education of the Deaf and Dumb, and the Industrial School for Boys, for each, a superintendent, a steward, a treasurer, and all necessary teachers; and for the State prison, a warden, a steward and a treasurer, who shall be the officers of said institutions respectively and whose duties shall be fixed by said board, except as herein otherwise provided. (11.) To maintain and govern the school, prescribe the course of study and provide the necessary apparatus and means of instruction for the Institution for the Education of the Blind, and for the Institution for the Education of the Deaf and Dumb. (12.) To prescribe and collect such charges as it may think just, for tuition and maintenance of pupils not entitled to the same free of charge, in the Institution for the Education of the Blind and in the Institution for the Education of the Deaf and Dumb. (13.) To fix the period of the academic year, not less than forty weeks, and prescribe the school terms in the Institution for the Education of the Blind and the Institution for the Education of the Deaf and Dumb. (14.) To confer, in its discretion, upon meritorious pupils, such academic and literary degrees as are usually conferred by similar institutions, and grant diplomas accordingly, in the Institution for the Education of the Blind and in the Institution for the Education of the Deaf and Dumb.

On the 20th of April, 1883, a commissioner was appointed by the governor, for two years, in accordance with the provisions of an act passed by the Legislature of that year creating a bureau of labor statistics. The object of this office, now filled by Frank A. Flower, is to collect manufacturing and labor statistics, report violations of laws for benefit of artisans, and generally to show the manufacturing condition and resources of the State.

In her political divisions Wisconsin has copied, to a considerable extent, from some of her sister States. These divisions are counties, towns, cities and incorporated villages. The county government is in charge of a county board of supervisors, consisting of the chairman of each town board, a supervisor from each ward of every city, and one from each incorporated village. The county officers are : Clerk, treasurer, sheriff, coroner, clerk of circuit court, district attorney, register of deeds, surveyor, and one or two superintendents of schools, all elected biennially. There are sixty-five counties in the state. The government of the towns is in charge of a town board of supervisors. The other officers are clerk, treasurer, assessors, justices of the peace, overseers of highways and constables. The government of cities depends upon charters granted by the State Legislature. Generally, there is a mayor, common council, clerk, treasurer, attorney, chief of police, fire marshal and surveyor. Incorporated villages are governed by a president and six trustees. The other officers are clerk, treasurer, supervisor, marshal and constable, and sometimes a justice of the peace or police justice.

The constitution of Wisconsin, adopted by the people in 1848, is still "the supreme law of the State ;" but it has several times been amended, or had material additions made to it:

(1.) Article V, section 21, relating to the pay of the members of the Legislature. This was amended in 1867.

(2.) Article VI, sections 5 and 9, relating to the salaries of the governor and lieutenant-governor. This was amended in 1869.

(3.) Article I, section 8, relating to grand juries. This was amended in 1870.

(4.) Article IV, sections 31 and 32, relating to special legislation. These sections were added in 1871.

(5.) Article XI, section 3, relating to municipal taxation. This was amended in 1874.

(6.) Article VII, section 4, relating to the number and term of the judges of the supreme court. This was substituted for the original section in 1877.

(7.) Article VIII, section 2, relating to claims against the State. This was amended in 1877.

(8.) Article IV, sections 4, 5, 11 and 21, relating to biennial sessions, and a change in salaries and perquisites of members of the Legislature. These were thus amended in 1881

(9). Article III, section 1, relating to residence of voters in election districts some time before the election, and to registration of voters in cities and villages. Amended to this effect in 1882.

(10.) Article VI, section 4, article VII, section 12, and article XIII, section 1, all relating to biennial elections. Amended to this effect in 1882.*

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY, WISCONSIN.

CHAPTER I.

AREA, POSITION AND SURFACE FEATURES:

Before entering upon a consideration of the history of Green county, past and present, it is a matter of importance to understand its area and geographical position; also, its general surface features. We begin with its:

AREA.

Green is properly considered one of the average counties of Wisconsin as to size, it having a total area of 578 square miles; or, to be more specific, it contains 870,360.99 acres of land. It lies in a square form, extending twenty-four miles east and west, and the same distance north and south.

Green county contains sixteen congressional townships of land.* These townships are described by the United States surveys as follows:

Township 1 north, of range 6 east. Township 2 north, of range 6 east. Township 3 north, of range 6 east. Township 4 north, of range 6 east. Township 1 north, of range 7 east. Township 2 north, of range 7 east. Township 3 north, of range 7 east. Township 4 north, of range 7 east. Township 1 north, of range 8 east. Township 2 north, of range 8 east. Township 3 north, of range 8 east. Township 4 north, of range 8 east. Township 1 north, of range 9 east. Township 2 north, of range 9 east. Township 3 north, of range 9 east. Township 4 north, of range 9 east.

The following are the number of acres of land in each surveyed township in Green county:

*Properly speaking, a township is an area of about 36 square miles (or sections of land) as surveyed by the United States; while a town is an area of any designated extent, forming an organized civil division of a county. This distinction should always be maintained in Wisconsin, and is so carried out in this history; although many are in the habit of calling a township a town; and sometimes a town is spoken of as a township.

Why the several townships are numbered as given in the text (and as seen on all maps of Green county) will be fully explained in a subsequent chapter of this history.

In each full township, as every reader knows, there are thirty-six sections of land. Now, as a section contains 640 acres, the whole number of acres in the county, if each section contained exactly its complement, would be 868,640; but, in the aggregate, they over-run 1,720.99 acres. Ten of the townships of the county, it will be noticed, contain less than the full number of 23,040 acres in each; while six have more than that number in their several areas.

GEOGRAPHICAL POSITION.

Green county has a position immediately north of the Illinois line, it being in the Southern tier of counties of the State. In this tier are the counties of Kenosha, Walworth, Rock, Green, La Fayette and Grant. Green county is bounded on the north by the county of Dane; on the east by Rock; on the south by the State of Illinois; and on the west by the counties of La Fayette and Iowa. Its eastern boundary line is, in a straight direction, eighty miles west of Lake Michigan; its western boundary line is due east of the Mississippi, at the nearest point, forty miles. Across the State line in Illinois, the counties that bound Green are Stephenson and Winnebago.

SURFACE FEATURES.

The entire county is rolling or undulating, and fully one-half is covered with timber, which, aside from the forests in the south and southwestern part, is mostly openings, that were originally very beautiful and valued as choice farming lands. In the northwestern part, the surface is broken; and this is the roughest portion of the county. In the central, western, northern, eastern and southeastern parts extensive prairies exist. Originally, the southwestern part of the county was covered with heavy forests, abounding in black walnut, oak, maple, basswood and ash of the choicest quality for manufacturing purposes. To some extent, these forests have yielded to the advancing husband man, but large quantities of valuable timber still remain. Nearly all the timber found in other parts of the county is burr oak and only useful for fuel. Occasionally, however, a square mile or so of heavy timber is found in various parts of the county, which yields valuable wood.

PRINCIPAL STREAMS.

The principal streams of Green county are the Sugar and Pecatonica rivers. Sugar river, in two principal branches, has its rise in Dane county. Its sources are in the towns of Verona, Cross Plains, Springdale, Blue Mounds and Primrose in that county. The two main branches unite on section 28, in the town of Montrose, forming the main stream, which, after a southeasterly course of about three miles, leaves the county on section 35, in the town last mentioned and enters Green county on Section 2, in the town of Exeter. After passing through that section and those numbered 11, 14, 23, 24 and 25, it crosses into the town of Brooklyn, at the southwest corner of section 19. Taking a southerly course through sections 30 and 31, in that town, it passes into the town of Albany near the center of the north line of section 6. Its course is now southeasterly to the center of section 16, through those numbered 6, 5, 8 and 9. From the center of section 10, its general trend is southerly, draining sections 21, 28 and 33, and leaving the town at the southwest corner of section 34. Its ingress into the town of Decatur is on section 3, passing through that section and those numbered 10, 15, 14, 23, 26 and 35, into the town of Spring Grove at the corner of section 3, whence it runs across Section 2 into section 1; then, after touching 11, passes southeasterly through section 12 and across the northeast corner of 13, leaving the town and county from that section and flowing into the county of Rock, on section 18, in the town of Avon.

The course of Sugar river through Rock county is southeast, leaving it on section 36, in the town of Avon, when it crosses the State line into Illinois, in the county of Winnebago, discharging itself in that county, into the Pecatonica river. The principal branches of Sugar river in Green county flow into the parent stream from the west. They are the Little Sugar river, Little Jordan creek, Reeder's Branch and Spring creek. These tributaries, with the main stream, and a number of small branches which flow into the river on the east side, carry off the superabundant waters from nearly two-thirds of the county, draining, as they do, the towns of New Glarus, Exeter, Brooklyn, Albany, Mt. Pleasant, Washington, Sylvester, Decatur, Spring Grove and the northeast portion of Jefferson.

There is a ridge which passes east and west through Iowa county about on the line of Dodgeville, the county seat. This divide is known as the military road or ridge. All of that county lying south of this elevation, is drained by affluents of the Pecatonica. These affluents flowing southward from many points, form the main stream in the county of La Fayette. The river traverses the county last mentioned from northwest to southeast, nearly from corner to corner in a winding course through seven towns, until it crosses into the county of Green, on section 6, in the town of Cadiz. The Pecatonica has a serpentine course in this town, passing, respectively, in greater or less distances, through sections 8, 5, 8, '7, 18, 17, 16, 21, 20, 29, 28, 82 and 33, leaving the town and, county from :the southwest corner of the last mentioned section and crossing into the State of Illinois, in the county of Stephenson, emptying, finally, into Rock river at Rockton, in Winnebago county. In the west, southwest and southern parts of the county, many streams have their sources all flowing in a west or southwest direction to the Pecatonica. These, with the main stream, furnish the drainage for a little over one-third the entire county. The names of the principal affluents of the Pecatonica, in Green county, are Richland creek, Honey creek and Skinner creek.

THE PECATONICA COUNTRY.

[BY W. H. SMITH, 1837.]

A small branch of the Pecatonica runs through ravine or narrow meadow at Mineral Point, in a southern course, receiving in its way many fine springs, until it unites about five miles below the town with the main branch of the same river, about two miles above the furnace and establishment of Richard McKim, Esquire, to which he has given the name of New Baltimore. His smelting furnace, saw-mill, workmen's houses, and his mansion, are situate on the western bank of the Pecatonica, which is here a considerable stream; a mile west of New Baltimore, flows another large branch, on which is built Kindle's grist-mill. The natural meadow at New Baltimore, and for several miles above, is unrivaled for fertility of soil, and beauty of scenery, not only in its own features, but in the general character of the hills and bluffs bounding the low land. The broad, deep and clear Pecatonica, winds its way through the wide expanse of low and level prairie or meadow, covered with high grass, and composed of a soil which is complained of by cultivators as being too rich for any small grain, but which is unrivaled for the production of corn, potatoes, pumpkins, and all esculents. This meadow extends from the borders of Diamond Grove near Col. Bequette's, widening in its course southeastward, and bearing the several branches of the Pecatonica on its bosom, as low down as the uncton of the eastern branch, near the old Indian town of "Wiota," in the neighborhood of the diggings of Col. William L. Hamilton, formerly of New York, but for some years a Wisconsin

*The writer of this article gives the name of the river as 'Pecatonica or Pee-ke-tol-i-ka.'

pioneer. From Wiota the river, I am informed, is navigable, and indeed boats have been laden with lead and sent from New Baltimore, and from the Cedar Bluffs, about a mile below, by Mr. Charles Bracken. This is the most extensive range of fine meadow which I have visited; it is about thirty-five miles from Diamond Grove to the forks at Wiota, and a more delightfully beautiful and rich body of land is not to be desired, than the country through which the Pecatonica flows.

In the immediate neighborhood of the Cedar Bluffs, about three miles from New Baltimore, is a small village called the Willow Springs. Here are three or four dwellings and the store of Mr. Dillon; an old smelting furnace is also here, now disused, as it was built on the first plan called "log and ash furnace." This crude manner of smelting lead by the earlier settlers, has given way to the improved cupola and oven furnace, and the blast furnace.

A great public road from Mineral Point to Gratiots' Grove passes by the Willow Springs, and this will always be a main road through this part of the territory, in its principal direction, with perhaps a few changes in parts, where experience will correct early adoptions of convenience.

Leaving the Willow Springs, and passing in a northern direction over a high prairie with oak openings, about three miles, the country becomes highly interesting. Here are to be found many farms in the best and most profitable state of cultivation. Farm-houses and barns and stables, with other out-houses, announce a good settlement, and that the farmer not only knows how to live, but does live well. The kindness and hospitality which I experienced during several days residence and excursions in this delightful section of the country, will be held by me in heartfelt recollection. I need only mention the names of Messrs. Charles and John Bracken, and Major John P. Sheldon, in whose families I found myself at home, to justify my feelings. Not only in their domestic circles, intelligent conversation, good collections of books and weekly receipts of news from the far east, did we find (Dr. Smith and myself) intellectual luxuries which were the more grateful because unexpected, but the readiness with which we were accompanied in our excursions through the country by these gentlemen, gave us not only the means and comforts of traveling, but the information, without which, as strangers, we should have been greatly deficient.

On the subject of attentions and hospitalities received by my son and myself during our stay in the country, and in very many excursions through it, I should be wanting not only in correct feelings of recognition of, but also in respect to, the many friends and acquaintances which we formed.

Delicacy alone forbids me to speak publicly of the kindnesses we have at all times and in all places experienced. Prairie du Chien, Parish's, Messer Grove, Helena, Dodge's Grove, Mineral Point, New Baltimore, and other places, live as bright as bright spots on memory. The inhabitants and the inmates of those places named will duly appreciate the motives by which I am actuated when I forbear to say more.

It is worthy of remark that in all places where I have been in Wisconsin—in the comfortable dwelling house in the town, in the snug and neat farm house, in the log cabin—I have always found books and newspapers—of books, many standard and historical works, together with the new novels; of newspapers, those of New York, Baltimore, Washington and Philadelphia were common, and generally the State papers of the former home of the Wisconsin emigrant. Amongst the literary papers I often found the excellent publications of our friends Godey and Alexander, of Philadelphia; the Saturday News is much liked.

From the farm of Charles Bracken the road to Mineral Point passes over a part of the extensive prairie which reaches to the Blue Mounds, and on this road and near it there are numerous valuable lead diggings, particularly those of Messrs. Bracken. South of Bracken's the main road to Dixon's Ferry, in Illinois, passes several excellent and well improved farms, particularly that of Major Sheldon. A mile or two south of Sheldon's we enter a fine body of woodland, called the Indian Reservations, surveyed for the half-breeds, but not, as it is said, in conformity with the treaty, and consequently the surveys will be lifted and relocated.* These tracts are in number, in this neighborhood, forty, of a mile square each, of course here is, in one body, 25,600 acres of the finest timber land and arable soil in the Wisconsin land district. This land will, no doubt, be in market shortly, and the farmer's attention deserves to be turned to this part of the country. Claimants by improvement are already making their locations in these reservations, but the land having been reserved and never offered for sale by the government, I think the existing pre-emption laws will not reach the cases of settlements on them made at this day, and such locations may be of no avail.

Passing through this well timbered country for about seven miles, the union of two branches of the Pecatonica at a point of land high and covered with wood, overlooking the beautiful natural meadow before described, is located the village of Otterbourne. This location is excellent; the advantages of wood, water, public roads, most excellent land and delightful scenery give promise that Otterbourne will in time prosper—at any rate, it deserves to become a town; independent of the localities named, there is an excellent saw-mill and all convenient buildings within a few hundred yards of the newly laid out town. This saw-mill has fine water power and abundance of timber in the neighborhood. Water powers for a grist-mill can be easily obtained here, and as far as my judgment goes, nature has done as much for this mill site as for any I have seen in this district. With such advantages, if a few good mechanics, blacksmiths, shoemakers, tailors, carpenters, stone masons and laborers would seek their good, they may obtain town lots here at a very low rate, and the village of Otterbourne might thus spring immediately into life.

About seven miles below Otterbourne, on the Pecatonica river, a beautiful and advantageous site has been selected for a town; it has been laid off in lots, and is called "Gratiot." At this point there is a saw-mill and small gristmill, designated as Sheldon's mills, although the grist-mill was built by the late Col. Henry Gratiot. This location possesses many advantages, there being a large body of good prairie land near it yet unsold, and a considerable tract of timber land is also adjacent. This spot, by a great bend in the Pecatonica river, is rendered the nearest point on that river to Galena, to which place there is already an excellent road the whole distance to within three or four miles of Galena, being on a prairie ridge. The proprietors of the mills contemplate erecting, during the next year, a stone grist-mill in addition to the one now in operation; the water-power for the works is furnished by Wolf creek, which empties into the Pecatonica at this place.

The Pecatonica country is one of the best watered sections I have seen; the various branches traverse delightful prairies and rich bottom lands, over a wide extent of country. Fine water powers are numerous on these branches; and on the union of the east and west branches, a few miles below "Hamilton," at Wiota, the old Indian town of Winnoshek, a chief of the Winnebagoes, a noble river is formed. This stream, after receiving Sugar river, empties into Rook river a few miles below the territorial line, in Winnebago Co., Ill. The improvement of the rapids of Rock river, for which an appropriation of $100,000 has been lately made by the Illinois Legislature, will go far to render this river perfectly safe for steamboat navigation. The general government owes this section of country efficient aid, as a matter of general importance more than of local appropriation.

WATER—POWERS.

A ridge divides Green county from northwest to southeast. The county is, in fact, supplied with a perfect network of streams, which reach out, like silver threads, to beautify, gladden, refresh and fertilize it, in all its parts. These creeks are not well supplied with fish, although their waters are pure and clear. They have sufficient fall to afford good water-powers, which have, to a great extent been utilized. These water courses are fed from springs which rise in the high grounds mostly. Over the entire county, on nearly every stream, water-powers of varied importance, exist, of which the early settlers availed themselves by erecting mills for sawing lumber, as early as 1840, in several parts of the county, followed soon after by flouring mills; so that, from the early settlement of the county, its water-powers have been utilized to the extent demanded by its people.

The Soil.—The soil of Green county, generally, is a rich loam, with a clay subsoil, which gives ample security against leaching, and consequent loss of fertility. It is deep and enduring in the prairie, more shallow in the openings, and somewhat sandy in the northeastern part of the county.

The foregoing being a general account of the surface features of the county, we close the description and chapter with the following:

I.

Bird's-Eye Views.—"While there are a considerable number of acres of, level lands in the eastern and southern portions of the county, the surface, for the most part, is gently rolling, rising, however, in the northern and western sections of the county, into high and bluff hills. In the southern and eastern sections, the soil is of a rich, black loam, with a large admixture of vegetable mould; however, on the extreme eastern border, a narrow belt of land is found where the soil is a light, sandy loam. The soil of the timbered lands in the west part is of a deep clay loam, and produces abundantly, when cultivated, all variety of crops. One of the great advantages of Green county, is the extent and distribution of timber—timber and prairie, prairie and timber, everywhere. The largest tracts are in the southern part, where is to be found maple, hickory, walnut, basswood, ash and many varieties of oak. The land being rolling, the whole county is almost without marshes."

II.

"The surface of the county is undulating. Prof. J. D. Whitney, in the State Geological Report for 1862, has called attention to the fact that while the whole northwest is characterized by three divisions of surface—the bottom land, the bluffs that shut it in, and the upland or prairie, the surface of the lead region has certain peculiarities of its own, which are principally due to erosion by its streams. There is, in this section, a rapid alternation of bluffs and valleys. The valleys branch again, and again, in every direction, and their width is usually in proportion to the size of the streams that wander through them. The conformations of surface in southwestern Wisconsin present, therefore, a marked contrast to the comparatively unbroken level of the southeastern part of the State. Green county partakes of the peculiarities of both regions, and may be regarded as the connecting link between them. Near its western boundary the hills are many, and the valleys are narrow; but, in the interior of the county, the valleys along the small streams grow so much wider than those in the lead region that the bottom land of Sugar river is as wide as that of the Mississippi; and the undulations of the surface gradually grow longer and gentler, until, a little before the eastern border of the county is reached, the surface becomes a level prairie.

CHAPTER II.

TOPOGRAPHY AND GEOLOGY.

Lead has been found so far east in Green county that we may consider the whole of it as lying in the "Lead Region." It will be profitable, in this chapter, to begin with

I.—TOPOGRAPHY.

Unlike most regions which nature has selected for the reception of metallic ores and useful minerals, the Lead Region bears no evidences of any sudden disturbances, or violent action of physical laws. The effects produced by igneous and eruptive agencies are wanting. Faults and dislocation of strata are nowhere found. The only irregularities are slight upheavals, or bending of the strata (and these never of great extent) producing changes of but a few feet from the normal dip.

Between the geological condition and the general surface contour of the country, there is no direct correlation. The existence of a hill or valley on the surface is not due to a subterranean elevation or depression of the surface, as is by many supposed; and whatever irregularities exist, must be chiefly attributed to the milder natural agencies now constantly at work,—such as running water, frost, winds, etc., acting through an immensely long period of time.

Drainage.—The most marked and persistent feature of the Lead Region is the long dividing ridge, or water-shed, which, commencing near Madison, in Dane county, continues almost directly west to the Blue Mounds, a distance of about twenty miles. Here it takes a slight bend to the southwest for fifteen miles until it reaches Dodgeville, where it resumes its westerly course until it terminates in the bluffs at the confluence of the Wisconsin and Mississippi rivers. Its total length is about eighty-five miles. Two points are noticeable: one is, its gentle uniform directness of outline (it being subject to but few and unimportant flexures); and the other is its parallelism with the Wisconsin river so long as the latter holds an approximately westerly course—the summit of the ridge being always about fifteen miles from the river.

The divide maintains an average elevation of about 600 feet above Lake Michigan and is seldom less than 500, or more than 700, except at the Blue Mounds, where it gradually rises east and west for several miles, until it attains an elevation at the west mound of 1,151 feet. This, however, is an extreme case, and in fact, the only marked exception to its general level. In the town of Mount Hope, Grant county, a slight decrease of elevation commences and continues to the western end of the divide, where the elevation is about 430 feet, at a point within a mile of both the Mississippi and Wisconsin rivers.

There are two main branches or sub-divisions of the water-shed. Of these, the western is the ridge which separates the waters that flow into the Platte and Fever rivers from those which flow into the Pecatonica. It leaves the main divide in the town of Wingville, Grant county, and passing through the towns of Belmont and Shullsburg, in Iowa county, in a southeasterly direction, passes out of the State in the town of Monticello, in the same county. This ridge is not so conspicuous as the main water-shed either for the directness of its course or the uniformity of its elevation. The most con spicuous points on it are the Platte Mounds, which appear from a distance very high, but are, in reality only relatively so—their actual elevation being only about 700 feet above Lake Michigan. The ridge appears to slope somewhat, in its approach to Illinois—its average elevation there being about 500 feet.

The easterly sub-division, and the one especially of interest to the people of Green county, is that which separates the waters of the Pecatonica and Sugar rivers. It may be said to begin at the Blue Mounds, or a couple of miles east of them, and pursuing quite a devious course through the town of Primrose, in Dane county, and of Washington and Monroe, in Green, it crosses the State line in the town of Jefferson. This ridge, which presents a conspicuous figure in the surface contour of Green county, is characterized by a much greater want of uniformity in its general course, and by its irregular elevation. It is much narrower than either the main ridge or the western spur, already described, more abrupt in its slopes, and contains quite a large number of hills and low places, especially in the towns of Primrose and Perry, in Dane county and in those of York and New Glarus in the county of Green, in which towns, the streams head within comparatively short distances of each other, on opposite sides of the water-shed.

Streams—The present situations of the streams in the Lead Region was probably never modified or influenced by drift or glacial agents. It follows then that the location of streams not only in Green county but in the others of the Lead Region, must have depended on the natural configuration of the country, and the superior advantages of certain strata in certain positions, predisposing them to become the beds of streams. Other things being equal, surface waters would naturally form a channel first in the more soft and easily erosible strata lying along the line of strike of some soft formation and would cause a river to conform its channel to its out-cropping edge. Simultaneously, its tributaries would shape their channels, approximately at right-angles to the river, under the following conditions: When the general slope and drainage of the country is not contrary to the geological dip of the formations; which, in the Lead Region, does not appear ever to have been the case. The tributaries on one side of the river thus formed, would conform themselves to the natural dip of the underlying strata, sloping toward the main river, and would be found wherever there were depressions, or irregularities in the surface suitable to their formation. These would, at their inception, approximate to their final length and course, and future changes in them would be confined to the deeper erosion of their beds and widening of their valleys; the formation of lateral branches; the division of the head of the stream into several smaller sources; and, finally, the gradual recession of all the subordinate parts.

With the tributaries on the other side of the principal river, a different order would prevail, as regards their position and growth. They would at first be the merest rivulets and increase only from erosion; and their beds would lie across the edges of the strata. There would be only a very limited extent of country tributary to the river on this side—the great volume of its water being derived from the tributaries of the other side. The dividing ridge would thus be very near the river, and a second set of long streams, tributary to some other river, would here take their rise and flow away.

In the course of time, the main river would slowly cut its way through the soft formation in which it had its original bed, into and through those which underlaid it. This might at first be accompanied by a slight recession parallel to the line of strike; such a movement, however, could not be of long duration, but would become less as the valley became deeper; because any such recession would necessitate the removal of all the overlying formations. Finally, the small streams flowing across the strata would cut their valley back from the river;

the dividing ridge would recede and their sources would, from the position of the strata, be in steep and precipitous ravines. Such in brief, appears to be the theory of the formation of streams in the Lead Region and of course in Green county, of which region the county forms a part.

Diminution of Streams.—In comparing the streams in Green county and in other counties of the Lead Region, at present, with those recorded in the government surveys, it will be found that many of the smaller ones are entirely dry and others nearly so. Numerous springs which formerly furnished an abundant supply of water, are now dry and have been replaced by wells, sunk to obtain water from a deeper stratum.

The larger streams of the Lead Region contain a much smaller amount of water than heretofore. Some places can be found where mills, formerly operated by water-power, have been abandoned on account of a diminished supply, or absolute failure, of water.

This diminution is not confined to surface water, springs, streams, and the like, but it is true, to a greater or less extent, of all the mining ground of the Lead Region. In many instances, this circumstance alone has led to the re-opening and profitable working of mines which years before had been abandoned on account of too much water—with ore “going down” in the crevices.

It is probable that cultivation of the land is the chief cause of this decrease, as a much greater amount of surface is thus exposed, and evaporation takes place more rapidly and in larger quantities. Removal of the timber is, without doubt, another cause of this decrease. The soil of the timbered land contains more moisture than that of the prairie; and, in all countries, the removal of the timber has always been followed by a marked decrease of the water supply. This was notably the case in the Harts mountains of Prussia after the fir and hemlock were removed. When the mountain sides were again covered by indigenous trees that had been planted by order of the government, their growths found to be attended by an increase of water in the streams and springs.*

Springs and Wells.—The Lead Region (and Green county as a portion of it) is one of the best watered tracts in the State. Springs are very numerous, both about the sources of the streams and frequently in their banks. They are found in all the geological formations in such portions of the country as are not liberally supplied by nature with springs, water is easily and abundantly obtained by means of wells. Their average depth is about twenty-five feet; this, however, depends chiefly on the locality in which they are sunk—those on the ridges and prairies being deeper than the rest. Wells are sometimes obtained by drilling, such borings being chiefly confined to the prairies. They are then furnished with a wind-mill pump and supply an abundance of clear water for stock and farm purposes.

Nearly all the water in the Lead Region, whether in springs or wells, holds in solution a small portion of lime and magnesia, and a still smaller quantity of sodium, iron, alumina and silica. The presence of these salts usually gives the water what is called a hard taste, which is more noticeable in the limestone than in the sandstone springs, and not infrequently induces people to believe them possessed of medical properties.

The following analysis, which is believed to be an average sample of the quality of the water in Green and the other counties of the Lead Region, is inserted to show the small amount of foreign substances found. The water analyzed was taken from a well a short distance northwest of the incorporated village of Brodhead. One gallon, United States standard measure, of this water, was found to contain of solid salts, 13.2720 grains, as follows:

Prairie and Forest.—The prairie area of the Lead Region is comparatively small and seems to be chiefly a continuation of the great prairies of Illinois. The most extensive prairie is that found in the southern part of Grant and La Fayette counties, comprising the towns of Jamestown and Hazel Green in the first mentioned county, and of Benton, New Diggings, Shullsburg, Seymour, Monticello and Gratiot, in the last. From this prairie, there is a branch extending in a northwestern direction (corresponding to the eastern sub-division of the water-shed previously alluded to), until it unites with the main water-shed; here it branches east and west. The western extension forms a prairie in the towns of Glen Haven, Patch Grove, Little Grant and some parts of Fennimore and Wingville, in the county of Grant. The eastern prairie follows the main divide already described, the prairie being from six to ten miles in width. Between the east and west branches of the Pecatonica, there is a prairie, including most of the towns of Waldick, in Iowa county. and of Fayette and Wiota in La Fayette county. In Green county, the principal prairie is found in the towns of Monroe, Clarno, Sylvester and Washington.

We have thus given, in brief, a description of the prairie land of the Lead Region, including Green county. There exist small, isolated patches of timber, in this area, as well as small prairies or openings in the remainder of the country under consideration—not included in the prairie area and which is mostly timbered land. The original area of prairie appears, from the government surveys, to have been somewhat greater than what would be assigned to it at present. Now (1884), the original forests of large timber have been mostly cut down, except about the Wisconsin river bluffs, such timber as is now found being a second growth of black oak, white oak, burr oak, maple, hickory, poplar and elm, the trees being of small size, seldom more than a foot in diameter.

II.—SURFACE GEOLOGY.

Before entering upon a consideration of the geological formations of the Lead Region it is thought proper to call the attention of the reader to its surface geology.

Soil and Subsoil.—The quality of the soil of the lead region (and, of course, of Green county, of which it is a part) is chiefly dependent on the character of the subjacent formations. The subsoil appears to be derived directly from the decay and disintegration of the strata, of which it is the residuum. South of the principal watershed the subsoil is clay, almost without exception, having a thickness of from three to six feet, depending on the configuration of the underlying rock formation. This is the average thickness on comparatively level ground; on side hills it is usually much thinner, the greater part having been washed down into the valleys below.

The amount of lime, magnesia and alkaline earths in the subsoil and soil together with the vegetable mole in the latter, constitutes a soil which, in its virgin state, is unsurpassed for richness and fertility. The number of successive wheat crops which, in years past, were raised without regard to rotation, on some of the prairie farms, attest its native strength; as also the marked decline in fertility of the soil when this has been done shows the inevitable retribution which follows the practice. The exceptions to the clay soil in Green county will be hereafter mentioned; so also as to the transportation of the component materials of the soils.

Peat.—While on the subject of surface soil and subsoil, it is proper to mention two places—both in Green county—which afford the only approach to peat yet known in the lead region. One of these is situated on Jordan creek, on the east half of sections 21 and 28, in township 2 north, of range 6 east (town of Jordan), and comprises from 150 to 200 acres. The other locality is on the Little Sugar river, near the center of section 11, in township 3 north, of range 7 east (town of Washington). As the conditions under which they exist are similar, one description will answer for both.

The turf is underlaid by an impervious stratum of blue clay, which holds the water and nourishes a vegetable growth about four feet thick, which, in this vicinity, is known as peat. When cut and dried it burns similarly to peat, but with so large a residuum of clay, sand and ashes as to render it unfit for economic purposes.

Brick Clay.—Clay suitable for making brick is found in many parts of Green and adjoining counties; but, in the city of Monroe, there is found a clay having a peculiarity not noticeable elsewhere; two kinds of brick are made from the same kind of clay. One is a red brick similar to all common red brick; the other is a cream colored brick of very handsome appearance, closely resembling the Milwaukee brick. The difference in color is due to the difference in burning—the red color being caused by a greater and long continued heat. The origin of the clay of which the brick is made is a matter of some doubt: It does not have exactly the appearance of a drift clay; and, if not, its situation indicates that it must have undergone some subsequent re-arrangement.

Glacial Drift.—The lead region is a driftless tract of country; not a single boulder, pebble or clay of foreign origin being found within its limits, except in three or four isolated cases. The northern boundary line of the driftless region lies far to the north of the lead region. The eastern line is in Green county; it commences on the west side of the Pecatonica river, crossing the State line at the southwest corner of the town of Cadiz, which is also the southwest corner of the county. From this point it proceeds almost in a straight line to the city of Monroe. Thence north, it runs along the dividing ridge between the Pecatonica and Sugar rivers, until about two miles south of New Glarus, where it takes a northeasterly course and passes out of the county about a mile west of Belleville, in Dane county. The course thus indicated is its present line, as shown by erratic boulders lying upon the surface. If the drift deposits originally extended farther westward, no trace thereof now remains. East of the line described, boulders are found in all parts of the county with more or less frequency. The boundary line, where boulders are now found, does not appear to conform at all to the surface features, but crosses the valleys of the streams and the ridges between them with equal impartiality.

The different kinds of rock found in the drift are so numerous that it would require quite a catalogue to enumerate them all. It will be sufficient to state that the great bulk of them are granite, metamorphic or trappean—the most frequent being the varieties of granite and gneiss, and next to them the trappean rocks. Chioritic rocks and those of a schistose structure are also quite numerous. In addition to these, there are, in certain places, beds of gravel, sand and clay.

The distribution of the boulders does not appear to be very regular in Green county; in fact the whole of the county verges so near the western boundary of the drift, that comparatively small deposits were made here; which are quite insufficient to exemplify any general laws of distribution. No difference is observable in their frequency between the eastern line of the county and the western line of the drift. The boulders are of various sizes from a few inches to two or three feet in diameter and are always rounded and worn smooth. They are frequently found quite numerous in one place, and then scattered along at very distant intervals, on the same kind of ground, but do not exhibit any distinctive morainic appearance.

Gravel beds are not very frequent, although they are found in several places in the county. There is one situated very near the boundary of the drift, on the northwest quarter of section 4, in township 1 north, of range 7 east (town of Clarno), where there is a bed of gravel about eight feet thick, underlaid by a bed of stratified sand and clay about four feet thick. This sand is very fine, and has just enough clay mixed with it to make a good article of moulding sand for iron foundries; it would give a fine impression and make a smooth casting. A similar bed is seen about two miles east of the preceding, on the southwest quarter of section 2, in township 1 north, of range 7 east, (town of Clarno), where the drift sand and gravel have accumulated to a thickness of about twelve feet. Another bed, like the other two, is in existence on the northwest quarter of section 2, in township 1 north, of range 7 east, (town of Clarno). There are several other beds in various portions of the county.

The amount of drift clay in this county is comparatively small, it probably having been dissolved out and washed away from the greater portion of the surface. It is to be found however; and particularly on the northwest quarter of section 25, in township 3 north, of range 7 east, (town of Washington), where a well has been sunk in the drift. There is here a thickness of about twenty feet of slate-colored clay, full of small pebbles.

III.—GEOLOGICAL FORMATIONS.

The geological formations underlying Green county are: (I.) the Potsdam sandstone; (II.) the Lower Magnesian limestone; (III.) St. Peters sandstone; (IV.) Trenton (Buff and Blue) limestone; and (V.) Galena limestone. It is proposed, in this connection, before describing the geographical boundaries, lithological characteristics and paleontology of these formations in Green county, to give a brief history of their origin:

I.—Potsdam Sandstone.

After the great Archaean upheaval, there followed a long period, concerning which very little is known—a lost interval in geological history. It is only certain that immense erosion of the Archaean strata took place, and that in time the sea advanced upon the island, eroding its strata and redepositing the wash and wear beneath its surface. The more resisting beds withstood this advance, and formed reefs and rocky islands off the ancient shore, about whose bases the sands and sediments accumulated, as they did over the bottom of the surrounding ocean. The breakers dashing against the rocky cliffs, brought down masses of rock, which imbedded themselves in the sands, or were rolled and rounded on the beach, and at length were buried, in either case, to tell their own history, when they should be again disclosed by the ceaseless gnawings of the very elements that had buried them. In addition to the accumulations of wash and wear that have previously been the main agents of rock formations, abundant life now swarms in the ocean, and the sands become the great cemetery of its dead. Though the contribution of each little being was small, the myriad millions the waters brought forth, yielded by their remains, a large contribution to the accumulating sediments. Among plants there were sea-weeds, and among animals, protozoans, radiates, mollusks and articulates, all the subkingdoms except the vertebrates. Among these the most remarkable, both in nature and number, were the trilobites, who have left their casts in countless multitudes in certain localities. The result of the action of these several agencies was the formation of extensive beds of sandstone, with interstratified layers of limestone and shale. These surrounded the Archaean nucleus on all sides, and reposed on its flanks. On the Lake Superior margin the sea acted on the copper and iron-bearing series, which are highly ferruginous, and the result was The red Lake Superior sandstone. On the opposite side of the island, the wave action was mainly upon quartzite's, porphyries and granites and resulted in light-colored sandstones. The former is confined to the immediate vicinity of Lake Superior; the latter occupies a broad, irregular belt bordering on the Archaean area on the south, and, being widest in the central part of the State, is often likened to a rude crescent. It will be understood from the foregoing description, that the strata of this formation lies in a nearly horizontal position, and repose unconformably upon the worn surface of the crystalline rocks. The close of this period was not marked by any great upheaval; there was no crumbling or metamorphism of the strata, and they have remained to the present day very much the same as they were originally deposited, save a slight arching upward in the central portion of the State. The beds have been somewhat compacted by the pressure of superincumbent strata and solidified by the cementing action of calcareous and ferruginous waters, and by their own coherence, but the original character of the formation, as a great sand-bed, has not been obliterated. It still bears the ripple-marks, cross-lamination, worm-burrows, and similar markings that characterize a sandy beach. Its thickness is very irregular owing to the unevenness of its Archaean bottom, and may be said to range from 1,000 feet downward. The strata slope gently away from the Archaean core of the State and underlie all the latter formations, and may be reached at any point in southern Wisconsin by penetrating to a sufficient depth, which can be calculated with an approximate correctness. As it is a water-bearing formation, and the source of fine artesian wells, this is a fact of much importance. The interbedded layers of limestone and shale, by supplying impervious strata, very much enhance its value as a source of fountains.

11.—Lower Magnesian Limestone.

During the previous period, the accumulation of sandstone gave place for a time to the formation of limestone, and afterward the deposit of sandstone was resumed. At its close, without any very remarked disturbance of existing conditions, the formation of limestone was resumed, and progressed with little interruption till a thickness ranging from fifty to 250 feet was attained. This variation is due mainly to irregularities of the upper surface of the formation, which is undulating, and in some localities may appropriately be termed billowy, the surface rising and falling 100 feet in some cases, within a short distance. This, and the preceding similar deposit, have been spoken of as limestone simply, but they are really Dolomites, or Magnesian limestone's, since they contain a large proportion of carbonate of magnesia. This rock also contains a notable quantity of silicia, which occurs disseminated through the mass of rock; or, variously, as nodules or masses of chert; as crystals of quartz, filling or lining drusy cavities, forming beautiful miniature grottoes; as the nucleus of oolitic concretions, or as sand. Some argillaceous matter also enters into its composition, and small quantities of the ores of iron, lead and copper, are sometimes found, but they give little promise of value. The evidences of life are very scanty. Some sea-weeds, a few mollusks, and an occasional indication of other forms of life, embrace the known list, except at a few favored localities where a somewhat ampler fauna is found. But it is not, therefore, safe to assume the absence of life in the depositing seas, for it is certain that most limestone has originated from the remains of animals and plants that secrete calcareous material, and it is most consistent to believe that such was the case in the present instance, and that the distinct traces of life were mostly obliterated. This formation occupies an irregular belt skirting the Potsdam area. It was, doubtless, originally a somewhat uniform band swinging around the nucleus of the state already formed, but it has since been eroded by streams to its present jagged outline.

III.—St. Peter's Sandstone.

At the close of this sandstone-making period there appears to have been an interval of which we have no record, and the next chapter of the history introduces us to another era of sand accumulation. The work began by the leveling up of the inequalities of the surface of the Lower Magnesian limestone, and it ceased before that was entirely accomplished in all parts of the State, for a few prominences were left projecting through the sand deposits. The material laid down consisted of a siliceous sand, of uniform, well-rounded—doubtless well-rolled—grains. This was evidently deposited horizontally upon the uneven limestone surface, and so rests in a sense unconformably upon it. Where the sandstone abuts against the sides of the limestone prominences, it is mingled with material derived by wave action from them, which tells the story of its formation. But aside from these and other exceptional impurities, the formation is a very pure sandstone, and is used for glass manufacture. At most points the sandstone has never become firmly cemented and readily crumbles, so that it is used for mortar the simple handling with pick and shovel being sufficient to reduce it to a sand. Owing to the unevenness of its bottom, it varies greatly in thickness, the greatest yet observed being 212 feet, but the average is less than 100 feet. Until recently, no organic remains had ever been found in it, and the traces now collected are very meager indeed, but they are sufficient to show the existence of marine life, and demonstrate that it is an oceanic deposit. The rarity of fossils is to be attributed to the porous nature of the rock, which is unfavorable to their preservation. This porosity, however, subserves a very useful purpose, as it renders this pre-eminently a water-bearing horizon, and supplies some of the finest artesian fountains in the State, and is competent to furnish many more. It occupies but a narrow area at the surface, fringing that of the Lower Magnesian limestone on the south.

IV.—Trenton Limestone.

A slight change in the oceanic conditions caused a return to limestone formation, accompanied with the deposit of considerable clayey material, which formed shale. The origin of the limestone is made evident by a close examination of it, which shows it to be full of fragments of shells, corals, and other organic remains, or the impressions they have left. Countless numbers of the lower forms of life flourished in the seas, and left their remains to be comminuted and consolidated into limestone. A part of the time the accumulation of clayey matter predominated, and so layers of shale alternate with the limestone beds, and shaly leaves and partings occur in the limestone layers. Unlike the calcareous strata above and below, a portion of these are true limestone with less quantities of other metals. The formation abounds in fossils, many of them well preserved, and, from their great antiquity, they possess uncommon interest. All the animal sub-kingdoms, except vertebrates, are represented. The surface area of this rock borders the St. Peter's sandstone, but, to avoid too great complexity on the map, it is not distinguished from the next formation to which it is closely allied. Its thickness reaches 120 feet.

It here appropriate to consider the geographical boundaries, lithological characteristics, and paleontology of the several formations in Green county, in the same order as has been followed in giving the history of their origin.

*Potsdam Sandstone.—This formation is not exposed anywhere in Green county; but south of the Wisconsin river, it is found as the bed rock of Otter, Mill and Blue' Mounds creeks and their various tributaries, as far south as township 7, of the various ranges. Here it disappears owing to the southerly dip of the formation, and the sudden rise of the country to the south. This explains why it nowhere appears in Green county. The valley of the Wisconsin river lies in this sandstone, forming a very level plain, from two to three miles wide and extending from Sauk City to a point about four miles above the mouth of the river. Good natural exposures are seen in the bluffs on each side of the river, in which the various strata may be traced uninterruptedly for miles.

*Because of the Potsdam sandstone being an underlying formation of Green county, though not exposed anywhere, so far as is known, within its limits, It is thought best to give its geographical boundaries, etc., In the Lead Region.

The sandstone beds of the Potsdam are usually composed of a very soft and friable sand frequently crumbling readily between the fingers, especially if it is white. The upper beds are more frequently white than the others, although white beds are not uncommon in all parts of the formation. In general, the lower beds are yellow or brownish in color. The great inequality in the hardness of the several strata of the Potsdam is frequently the cause of the formation of terraces by erosion, which are often a conspicuous feature of the valleys in the vicinity of the Wisconsin river.

South of the Wisconsin river, about the headwaters of Blue Mounds creek and Mill creek, the upper bed of the Potsdam consists of a red and very ferruginous sandstone, often containing seams of iron ore and iron concretions. The coloring matter appears to be partially soluble, and, becoming washed out by the rain, colors the soil in some places to a considerable extent.

The fossil remains of this formation seem to be chiefly confined to the calcareous strata and argillaceous shale's. These remains consist chiefly of Lingula Aurora and Dicellocyphelus Minnesotensis,—the former being quite small and usually having the shell remaining; sometimes, however, the shells have been ground up so that only a few fragments are found, disseminated through the shale's. The trilobites are seldom or never found entire, but usually the cephalic portion, the pygidium, or still smaller fragments. The various sandstone beds of the Potsdam are usually unfossiliferous. The upper bed of sandstone seldom contains anything but Scolithus, which, in some localities, is very numerous.

This fossil is also frequently found in all the sandstone beds.

Lower Magnesian Limestone.—South of the Wisconsin river and north of the main watershed, the Lower Magnesian limestone occupies a tract of land lying about the heads of all the smaller tributary streams, although seldom found so far back as their springs. Passing down any of the streams, we gradually pass below its surface, and its outcrops are seen gradually higher in the hills, until, on reaching the Wisconsin river, it forms the cap of all the bluffs from Sauk City to Boscobel, usually appearing in bold and rugged cliffs, lending a very picturesque effect to the scenery of the river. It forms also the valley of the Mississippi as far south as Glen Haven where it passes under the surface. Passing south of the divide which separates the waters which flow into the Wisconsin from the Pecatonica, it is found in the branches of the latter stream as far north as the north line of township 5, in ranges 5 and 6 east. Proceeding westward, it is not again encountered until the Platte and Grant rivers are reached, where it is found as the bed-rock of those streams; and, in township 5 north, of range 3 west, it covers a large portion of the township.

In Green county, there is but one exposure of the formation. It is in the valley of the Sugar river, about three miles above Brodhead. It commences a short distance north of the center of section 15, in township 2 north, of range 9 east, (town of Decatur), where it has a width of about half a mile. In passing into township 3, in the same range (town of Albany) it widens to nearly two miles. It then becomes narrower; attains its greatest elevation above the river at the village of Albany; and finally disappears beneath the surface of the river about a mile and a half above that place.

After passing through the transition beds separating it from the Potsdam sandstone, the Lower Magnesian assumes all the qualities characterizing dolomite. It is very hard, compact, and close-grained, of a grayish-white color.

Beds of flint or chert are contained in all the strata, irrespective of geological position, differing, however, considerably from the flint found in the Galena limestone, in that they are more regularly segregated, forming layers by themselves, and are not so promiscuously distributed through the formation.

The flint of the Lower Magnesian limestone is much whiter and more liable to decomposition than that of the Galena. There are also geodes and cavities lined with drusy quartz-crystals, which have never been seen in the Galena limestone, but are very abundant in the Lower Magnesian. The crystals are of many colors—white, yellow and rose color predominating and often affording beautiful cabinet specimens.

The Lower Magnesian is a formation of extremely variable thickness; the greatest known in the lead region is about 250 feet; this, however, is seldom seen. This formation is characterized by the extreme rarity of its organic remains. The few fossils seen have been found imbedded in the drusy quartz with which the formation abounds and usually in the form of casts. Some, however, have been found in the limestone.

St. Peter's Sandstone.—The formation known as the St. Peter's sandstone is found in the valleys of the Grant, Platte and Pecatonica rivers and their tributaries. In Green county, it forms the valley of the Sugar river and its branches, this valley being, in many places, as wide as that of the Mississippi. North of the dividing ridge it is found about the headwaters of the streams which flow into the Wisconsin, having its northern outcrop usually within two or three miles of the river and as far east as Boscobel forming a portion of the bluffs which inclose the river valley.

The St. Peters sandstone differs from the Potsdam sandstone in that it contains no beds of limestone or shale's stratified with it, but presents at any given locality a homogeneous structure through its entire thickness. Its color varies from snow white, through all the shades of yellow, to a very dark red, and in texture, from friable crumbling sand, to compact and fine-grained stone. Beneath the microscope, the particles of sand appear rounded and water-worn. The same color and texture usually exist through the entire thickness at any given place.

The St. Peters formation frequently impresses upon the surface of the country an appearance of terraces, although no traces of terraces, such as are formed in river valleys by changes of level, have anywhere been observed. This is most readily seen in those districts where it becomes the surface rock over any extended portion of country.

The exposures of St. Peter's are very frequent in Green county, where, in addition to the continuous exposures, small hills are frequently seen with flat tops, which have been denuded nearly down to the formation under consideration.

The varying hardness of the upper bed of the St. Peters, some portions, especially the white, being quite soft and friable, and others nearly as hard as quartzite, due, perhaps, to its greater or less impregnation with iron, appear to have caused an unequal resistance to disintegration, which has resulted in the formation of knobs, as they are called. These are isolated pillars of sandstone, which shoot up in picturesque castellated forms, frequently exposing the entire thickness of the formation and forming very conspicuous objects in the landscape.

The peculiarity of the hardness of the upper beds of the St. Peters proves of great assistance in tracing the outlines of the formation, in determining its thickness and in detecting irregularities in the surface contour. This formation differs very much in its thickness in different localities, although this does not appear to be the case so much in the Lead Region as near the northern outcrop of the formation, where it is in some places as thin as forty feet, and in others, not more than a mile or two distant, it is 10' or even 150 feet thick, depending, seemingly, on the varying thickness of the underlying Lower Magnesian limestone. The layers consist of subordinate parts of very various lamination, dipping in various directions.

There are several points in the lead region, where slight upheavals of the formation appear to have taken place. The sandstone on the small branch on sections 35 and 36, in township 2 north, of range 6 east, (town of Jordan, Green county), slopes gently toward Skinner creek, which appears to lie in a slight depression or synclinal valley. Passing over the ridge between Skinner and Jordan creeks, a slight anticlinal ridge is seen by means of observations on the top of the St. Peters, which is exposed in numerous small dry runs. The top of the formation is found to be thirty feet higher on the ridge than at either of the creeks. Although disturbances of this kind are extremely rare and infrequent, yet in this case, as in a few others, the variations from the normal dip are too plain to be mistaken.

The St. Peters sandstone seems everywhere to be perfectly destitute of organic remains. The only indication of metal seen in this formation is the presence of small concretions of sandstone, cemented by a ferruginous substance. This is clue to the decomposition of iron pyrites or marcasite, as is proved by its existence in various stages of decay. These concretions are not confined to any particular part of the formation, but are much more abundant in the upper beds. They are frequently perfectly spherical, and, when they occur in the dark colored sandstone, are often surrounded by a white ring about half an inch in width, from which the coloring matter seems to have been absorbed. They have been noticed with more or less frequency in various places. They can be seen in abundance in the road near the center of section 3, in township 1 north, of range 6 east (town of Cadiz, Green county). The lower bed is full of irregular cavities and small round holes about one-fourth of an inch in diameter. The upper bed of the sandstone is colored green by some salt of iron, and in it is a earn of green and ferruginous matter.

It is a peculiarity of this formation that the stone hardens on exposure to the weather. In examining any natural exposure, it is found to consist of an outer indurated shell and an inner and softer sandstone. This is a valuable quality, causing it to be easily quarried and dressed, and enabling it afterward to withstand the influences of the weather. In addition to this, it is easy to find almost any color that may be desired.

Trenton (Buff and Blue) Limestone's.—It will not be necessary to enter into a detailed description of the ground covered by this formation. It is sufficient to say that it is always found between the lowest bed of the Galena limestone hereafter to be described, and the top of the St. Peters sandstone, and having an average thickness of about fifty feet.

The Blue limestone is remarkable as being the purest in the Lead Region, and the nearest approach to the Trenton limestone of the eastern States, both in its lithological and paleontological characteristics. A very noticeable feature is its marked division into two parts; one very heavy-bedded, in layers of two or three feet thick, known as the glass rock, which constitutes the lower half; and the other, thin bedded, in layers of two or three inches, graduating sometimes without much change into thin bedded Galena limestone above. It is at this point that the stratum of carbonaceous shale occurs, which is the line of demarcation between the Blue and Galena limestone's, and as such, is an unfailling guide. It varies very much in its thickness, being from a quarter of an inch to a foot or more, but wherever a good exposure of the two formations is seen, it has uniformly been found.

East of range 8 east (that is, east of a north and south line drawn twelve miles west of the east boundary lines of the counties of Iowa and Lafayette) the presence of the Blue limestone is nowhere so clearly marked as west of this line. It is usually recognized by the outcropping of a quantity of highly fossiliferous fragments scattered through the soil, having a worn and bleached appearance. East of range 3, the fossiliferous Blue limestone has not been found; hence, none has been discovered in Green county which lies still farther eastward. It is replaced by a yellowish limestone, containing but very few fossils and in all respects similar to the Buff limestone. The thickness between the Galena limestone and St. Peters sandstone remains as usual about fifty feet.

There are two exceptions to the foregoing general statement. A short distance south of the center of section 18, in township 1 north, of range 6 east (town of Cadiz, Green county), the Blue limestone re-appears in its full thickness, with all its characteristic fossils, but only covering a small area of ground. The second exception is situated on the southeast quarter of section 11, in township 3 north, of range 7 east (town of Mt. Pleasant, in Green county). It is known as the Marble Quarry, so named on account of the fine polish which may be given to the stone. The Blue limestone has here the same thickness, both of the thin and thick beds, as in the western part of the Lead Region. All the characteristic fossils are present, and in short, it presents all the usual lithological appearances. It appears to have been deposited in a basin-shaped depression, as the top of St. Peters is found to be much lower here than any where in the vicinity. Although separated many miles from other outcrop of the Blue limestone, it is evident that it was deposited under the same conditions, as in other localities. It makes a good article of burning-lime. It takes a high polish, equal to marble, although large pieces can not be obtained.

The Blue and Buff limestone are the lowest formations in which any ores are found in sufficient quantities to repay mining in the Lead Region. Large bodies of lead ore have from time to time been taken from this formation, but it seems to be more especially productive of zinc, both as carbonate and sulphuret. Organic remains are found in the greatest profusion and in a very fine state of preservation, the rock in many places being entirely composed of them. In the Buff limestone, they usually occur as casts.

Galena Limestone's.—The Galena limestone is by far the most important in respect to its metallic wealth of all the formations before considered. In it are contained all the mines of the southern and western parts of the Lead Region; and whenever mining has been carried on in the underlying Trenton limestone's, lead is usually present in the overlying Galena. This limestone is the prevailing surface rock in the Lead Region. Its northern outcrop conforms closely to the main water-shed, being parallel to, and always within a few miles north of it. Its surface area is given as follows for each range in the Lead Region:

Range 1	West -----	176	Square Miles.

The Galena limestone is almost invariably a very compact, hard, crystalline rock, of a yellowish gray color, with numerous small cavities, sometimes filled with a softer material and sometimes lined with small crystals of calcite. The upper portion is usually thick-bedded and free from flints, the layers being from one to four feet thick, while the lower portion almost invariably consists of several feet of layers from one to two inches thick. Good exposures of parts of this formation are frequently to be met with; it may be seen in cliffs and ledges on nearly all the streams in the Lead Region. It always weathers irregularly in these natural exposures, leaving the surface full of small cavities due to the removal of the softer parts.

The formation is characterized by layers of flints, which, however, are not constant in their occurrence in the same beds at different localities. In some places, there are several beds of flints, which seem to be connected with the openings, and serve as a guide to them, while in others they are either entirely absent or occupying very different geological positions. The flints are sometimes found in separate layers, deposited conformably in the rock and often in irregular pieces distributed through the strata. They seem to be confined principally to the middle and lower parts of the formation although not entirely absent from any part.

The Galena limestone is, in many places successfully quarried as a building stone. This is chiefly the case in the southern and western parts of the region where the Bluff limestone or St. Peters sandstone cannot be obtained. The chief objection to it is the frequency of cavities and soft places in it which render it difficult to dress, and cause it to weather irregularly. For foundations, or any work where beauty of finish is not the chief object, it is a good and durable stone. The organic remains of the Galena limestone are quite abundant, but do not exist in such profusion as in the Blue limestone.

We have before remarked that the clay soils and sub-soils of the Lead Region appear to consist chiefly of those portions of the overlying Galena limestone and earthy Cincinnati shales which being insoluble in water were not removed by the gradual process of denudation.

Exceptions to the clay soil, usually found in the country covered by the Galena limestone, are found in the eastern part of La Fayette, and frequently in Green county, where the soil is quite sandy, owing to the disintegration of calcareous sand layers frequently found there in that formation. A few localities are cited below where the sand is so abundant that the formation might be considered a sandstone were it not for the occasional outcrops of Galena limestone in place. In the western part of the town of Jordan, Green county, (township 2 north, of range 6 east), on sections 2, 11 and 14, the ridges have a great deal of sand contained in the soil. The roads are frequently sandy, similar to those in a sandstone formation. Lying entirely without the drift, this circumstance led to a search for and discovery of the original beds.

At the village of Martin, on the southeast quarter of section 32, in township 1 north, of range 6 east (town of Cadiz, Green county), on the Pecatonica river, at the saw-mill, is a large stone quarry, of which the upper portion consists of Galena limestone in thin beds, containing considerable calcareous sand between the layers. The sand here is found in place.

On the ridge near the quarter-post on sections 29 and 32, in township 2 north, of range 6 east (town of Jordan), a great deal of sand is to be seen at an elevation of 150 feet above the top of the St. Peters; numerous concretions of iron are also to be found, similar to those usually found in the upper bed of that formation. East of the center of section 34, in township 3 north, of range 6 east (town of Adams), is another sandy ridge.

The agencies of the glacial period do not appear to have had anything to do with transporting the component materials of the soil; and, although a slight transportation has taken place, it is always merely local. For instance, in the valleys of the creeks which lie in the St. Peters sandstone, the soil is usually a rich clay loam, richer, in fact, than that of the adjacent ridges, because the best parts of the upland soils have been washed down and distributed over the surface of the valley.

LEAD MINES IN GREEN COUNTY.

Moses Strong, in "Geology and Topography of the Lead Region," in Vol. II. of "Geology of Wisconsin," says:

"These [near Monroe] are the most easterly diggings in the lead region, and are chiefly interesting for that reason. They are situated about three miles and a half north of the city of Monroe. At present only two parties are at work:

"T. H. White & White—Situated on the northeast quarter of section 14, in township 2

north, of range 7 east [town of Monroe]. The ore is found here in a flat sheet, accompanied by pipe clay, about twenty-three feet below the surface. The general course of the sheet is northwest and southeast, and produces only lead ore. The ground is quite free from water. The present parties have been working here six years, during which period they have produced 90,000 pounds of lead ore.

"Frame & Company—Situated on the southeast quarter of section 10, in township 2 north, of range 7 east [town of Monroe], on the land of Henry Wilber. This is an east and west range, about half a mile northeast of the preceding. It was discovered in 1844, and has been proved for a distance of 700 feet. The lead ore is found in both vertical crevices and flat openings. There appear to be three principal vertical crevices, connected in places by horizontal sheets. They were worked by John Monahan from 1870 to February, 1872, chiefly in the winter season, during which time he produced 50,000 pounds. Mr. Frame took the ground in 1874, and produced 4,000 pounds in the first six months. The production since then could not be ascertained. The ground is quite dry, and the workings are about fifty feet below the surface. It is not probable that any extensive deposits exist in this vicinity. The ground appears rather to be such as, by careful working, will afford moderate wages to a few persons.*

*Mr. Strong's observations were made in 1873.

CHAPTER III

ABORIGINES OF GREEN COUNTY

As early as the year 1615, Samuel Champlain, while among the Huron Nation, at the head of the Georgian bay, in Canada, had heard of a tribe of Indians living many leagues beyond Lake Huron called the Fire Nation, or more accurately the Prairie Nation, better known at a later date as the Mascoutin's. Their homes were upon the Fox river, of Green bay (where they had a village); and their territory extended southeastward, it is believed, as far as the site of the present city of Chicago. Their most northern village is thought to have been located within what are now the limits of Green Lake Co., Wis._somewhere on Fox river between the present Berlin and Lake Puckaway. The nearest tribe to the Mascoutin's down Fox river was the Winnebago, whose ancient seat was on the borders of the lake which now bears their name. In the immediate neighborhood of the Mascoutin's, but up the river as is supposed, were located the Miami's and the Kickapoo. So far as is known, the valley of the Wisconsin river below the "portage" (now Portage, Columbia Co., Wis.) was without inhabitants. The time we are now speaking of was before the year 1634—before any white man had set foot upon the soil of any portion of what is now the State of Wisconsin. It was a number of years subsequent to the date just mentioned, before the Sacs and Foxes made their appearance upon Fox river. Having thus described the inhabitants to the northward and northeastward of what is now Green county at the earliest known period, let us turn our attention to the tribe believed to have been the occupiers of this immediate section of country, 250 years ago.

There is a map extant, dated 1632, made by Samuel Champlain. On this map a Nation is located where was "a. quantity of buffaloes." This Nation is conjectured to have been the Illinois. These Indians occupied the country to the southward—the territory now constituting the State of Illinois; at least the northern portions of it, extending some distance into the present State of Wisconsin and including what is now Green county. The tribe of the Illini (or Illinois) was afterward driven beyond the Mississippi, but subsequently returned to the river which still bears their name. But their hold upon the territory so far north as the southern part of the present Wisconsin, was undoubtedly very weak at that period, and doubtless was soon entirely lost. The Mascoutin's and their kindred, the Kickapoo and Miami's, emigrated south, and the whole region between the Fox and Wisconsin rivers on the north, and the Rock river on the south, including the present Green county, was taken possession of by

I.—THE SACS AND FOXES.

The Sacs and Foxes came from the east to Fox river and then moved westward to the Wisconsin. Of all the tribes who have inhabited this State, they are the most noted. The Sacs were sometimes called Sauk's or Saukies, and the Foxes were frequently known as the Outagamies. They are of the Algonquin family, and are first mentioned in 1665, by Father Allouez, but as separate tribes. Afterward, however, because of the identity of their language and their associations, they were and still are considered one Nation. In December, 1669, Allouez found upon the shores of Green bay a village of Sacs, occupied also by members of other tribes, and early in 1670 he visited a village of the same Indians located upon the Fox river of Green bay, at a distance of four leagues from its mouth. Here a device of these Indians for catching fish arrested the attention of the missionary. "From one side of the river to the other," he writes, "they made a barricade, planting great stakes, two fathoms from the water, in such a manner that there is, as it were, a bridge above for the fishes, who by the aid of a little bow-net, easily take sturgeons and all other kinds of fish which this pier stops, although the water does not cease to flow between the stakes." When the Jesuit father first obtained, five years previous, a knowledge of this tribe, they were represented as savage above all others, great in numbers, and without any permanent dwelling place. The Foxes were of two stocks—one calling themselves Outagamie or Foxes, whence our English name; the other, Musquakiuk, or men of red clay, the name now used by the tribe. They lived in early times with their kindred the Sacs east of Detroit, arid, as some say, near the St. Lawrence. They were driven west, and settled at Saginaw, a name derived from the Sacs. Thence they were forced by the Iroquois to Green Bay; but were compelled to leave that place and settle on Fox river.

Allouez, on the 24th of April, 1670, arrived at a village of the Foxes, situated on Wolf river, a northern tributary of the Fox. "The Nation," he declares, "is renowned for being numerous; they have more than 400 men bearing arms; the number of women and children is greater on account of polygamy, which exists among them—each man having commonly four wives, some of them six, and others as high as ten." The missionary found that the Foxes had retreated to those parts to escape the persecutions of the Iroquois. Allouez established among these Indians his Mission of St. Mark, rejoicing in the fact that in less than two years he had baptized "sixty children and some adults." The Foxes, at the summons of De la Barre, in 1684, sent warriors against the Five Nations. They also took part in Denonville's more serious campaign; but soon after became hostile to the French. As early as 1693 they had plundered several on their way to trade with the Sioux, alleging that they were carrying arms and ammunitions to their ancient enemies, frequently causing them to make portages to the southward in crossing from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi. Afterward they became reconciled to the French; but the reconciliation was of short duration. In 1712 Fort Detroit, when defended by only a handful of men was attacked by them in conjunction with the Mascoutin's and Kakapo's. However, in the end, by calling in friendly Indians, the garrison not only protected themselves but were enabled to act on the offensive, destroying the greater part of the besieging force.

The Nation continued their ill will to the French. The consequence was that their territory in 1716 had been invaded and they were seduced to sue for peace. But their friendship was not of long continuance. In 1718 the Foxes numbered 500 men and "abounded in women and children." They are spoken of at that date as being very industrious, raising large quantities of Indian corn. In 1728 another expedition was sent against them by the French. Meanwhile the Menomonee's had also become hostile; so, too, the Sacs, who were now the allies of the Foxes. The result of the enterprise was an attack upon and the defeat of a number of the Menomonee's; the burning of the wigwams of the Winnebago's (after passing the deserted village of the Sacs upon the Fox river), that tribe, also, at this date being hostile; and the destruction of the fields of the Foxes. They were again attacked in their own country by the French in 1780, and defeated. In 1734 both the Sacs and Foxes came in conflict with the same foe; but this time the French were not as successful as on previous expeditions. In 1736 the Sacs and Foxes were "connected with the government of Canada"; but it is certain they were far from being friendly to the French.

The conflict between France and Great Britain, commencing in 1754, found the Sacs and Foxes allied with the former power, against the English, although not long previous to this time they were the bitter enemies of the French. At the close of that contest, so disastrous to the interests of France in North America, these tribes readily gave in their adhesion to the conquerors, asking that English traders might be sent them. The two Nations, then about equally divided, numbered, in 1761, about 700 warriors. Neither of the tribes took part in Pontiac's war, but they befriended the English. The Sacs had emigrated farther to the westward; but the Foxes, at least a portion of them, still remained upon the waters of the river of Green bay which perpetuates their name. A few years later, however, and the former were occupants of the upper Wisconsin; also to a considerable distance below the portage, where their chief town was located; also spreading over the region now including Green county; so that this immediate country was peculiarly Sac territory. Further down the stream just mentioned was the upper village of the Foxes, while their lower one was situated near its mouth at the site of the present city of Prairie du Chien. At this date, 1766, and even later, what is now Green county was within the territory claimed as theirs. Gradually, however, they retreated down the Mississippi until, before the close of the century, all their possessions in what is now Wisconsin was in the extreme southwest. They no longer had their hunting grounds to the northward of the Wisconsin river. Another tribe, had, as it were, crowded them out.

During the War of the Revolution the Sacs and Foxes continued the firm friends of the English. In 1804 they ceded their lands south of the Wisconsin river to the United States; so that they no longer were owners of any lands within this State. From that date, therefore, these allied tribes cannot be considered as belonging to the Indian Nations of Wisconsin. They were generally friendly to Great Britain during the War of 1812—15, but they soon made peace with the United States after that contest ended. A striking episode in their subsequent history is the Black Hawk War, which will be narrated in a subsequent chapter. The exact date of the Foxes leaving the Wisconsin river country is unknown. They sold the prairie at the mouth of that stream to some Canadian-French traders, in 1781, and subsequently vacated their village. Probably about the beginning of the present century they had abandoned this region as their home, although they long after visited it for the purposes of trade.

WHY THE FOX INDIANS LEFT THE LOWER WISCONSIN.

[BY JONATHAN CARVER.]

On the 8th of October [1766] we got our canoes in to the Ouisconsin [Wisconsin] river, which at this place is more than 100 yards wide and the next day arrived at the great town of the Saukies. This is the largest and best built Indian town I ever saw. It contains about ninety houses, each large enough for several families. These are built of hewn plank, neatly joined and covered with bark, so compactly as to keep out the most penetrating rains. Before the doors are placed comfortable sheds, in which the inhabitants sit, when the weather will permit, and smoke their pipes. The streets are regular and spacious, so that it appears more like a civilized town than the abode of savages. The land near the town is very good. On their plantations, which lie adjacent to their houses, and which are neatly laid out, they raise quantities of Indian corn, beans, melons, etc., so that this place is esteemed the best market for traders to furnish themselves with provisions of any within 800 miles of it.

The Saukies can raise about 300 warriors, who are generally employed every summer in making excursions into the territories of the Illinois and Pawnee Nations, from whence they return with a great number of slaves. But those people frequently retaliate, and, in their turn, destroy many of the Saukies, which I judge to be the reason why they increase no faster.

Whilst I stayed here I took a view of some mountains, [Blue Mounds], that lay about fifteen miles to the southward, and abounded in lead ore. I ascended one of the highest of these, and had an extensive view of the country. For many miles nothing was to be seen but lesser mountains, which appeared at a distance like haycocks, they being free from trees. Only a few groves of hickory and stunted oaks, covered some of the valleys.

So plentiful is lead here that I saw large quantities of it lying about the streets in the town belonging to the Saukies, and it seemed to be as good as the produce of other countries. On the 10th of October we proceeded down the river, and the next day reached the first town of the Outagamie's. This town contained about fifty houses, but we found most of them deserted, on account of an epidemical disorder that had lately raged among them, and carried off more than one-half of the inhabitants. The greater part of those who survived had retired into the woods to avoid the contagion.

On the 15th we entered that extensive river, the Mississippi. The Ouisconsin, from the carrying place to the part where it falls into the Mississippi, flows with a smooth but strong current; the water of it is exceedingly clear, and through it you may perceive a fine and sandy bottom, tolerably free from rocks. In it are a few islands, the soil of which appeared to be good, though somewhat woody. The land near the river also seemed to be, in general, excellent; but that at a distance is very full of mountains, where, it is said, there are many lead mines.

About five miles from the junction of the rivers I observed the ruins of a large town, in a very pleasing situation. On inquiring of the neighboring Indians why it was thus deserted, I was informed that, about thirty years ago, the Great Spirit appeared on the top of a pyramid of rocks, which lay at a little distance from it toward the west, and warned them to quit their habitations; for the land on which they were built belonged to him, and he had occasion for it. As a proof that he, who gave them these orders, was really the Great Spirit, he further told them that the grass should immediately spring up on those very rocks from whence he now addressed them, which they knew to be bare and barren. The Indians obeyed, and soon after discovered that this miraculous alteration had taken place. They showed me the spot, but the growth of the grass appeared to be no ways supernatural. I apprehended this to have been a stratagem of the French or Spaniards to answer some selfish view; but in what manner they effected their purpose I know not. This people, soon after their removal, built a town on the bank of the Mississippi, near the mouth of the Ouisconsin, at a place called by the French Les Prairies Des Chiens, which signifies the Dog Plains; it is a large town and contains about 300 families; the houses are well built, after the Indian manner, and pleasantly situated on a very rich soil, from which they raise every necessary of life in great abundance. I saw here many horses of a good size and shape. This town is a great mart, where all the adjacent tribes, and even those who inhabit the most remote branches of the Mississippi, annually assemble about the latter end of May, bringing with them their furs to dispose of to the traders. But it is not always that they conclude their sale here; this is determined by a general council of the chiefs, who consult whether it would be more conducive to their interests to sell their goods at this place, or carry them on to Louisiana or Michilimackinac; according to the decision of this council, they either proceed farther or return to their different homes.

The Mississippi, at the entrance of the Ouisconsin, near which stands a mountain of considerable height, is about half a mile over; but opposite to the last mentioned town, it appears to be more than a mile wide and full of islands, the soil of which is extraordinarily rich and but thinly wooded.

CONCERNING THE FOX INDIANS.

[BY SCHOOLCRAFT, 1820.]

The first we hear of these people [the Foxes] is from early missionaries of New France, who call them, in a list drawn up for the government in 1736, "Gens du Sang" and Miskaukis. The latter I found to be the name they apply to themselves. We get nothing, however, by it. It means red earth, being a compound from misk-wau, red, and aukie, earth. They are a branch of the great Algonquin family. The French, who formed a bad opinion of them as their history opened, bestowed on them the name of Renouard, from which we derive their long standing popular name. Their traditions attribute their origin to eastern portions of America. Mr. Gates, who acted as my interpreter and is well acquainted with their languages and customs, informs me that their traditions refer to their residence on the north banks of the St. Lawrence, near the ancient cataraqui. They appear to have been a very erratic, spirited, warlike and treacherous tribe, dwelling but a short time at a spot, and pushing westward as their affairs led them, till they finally reached the Mississippi, which they must have crossed after 1766, for Carver found them living in villages on the Wisconsin. At Saginaw they appeared to have formed a fast alliance with the Sauk's, a tribe to whom they are closely allied by language and history. They figure in the history of Indian events about old Michilimackinac, where they played pranks under the not very definite title of Muscodainsug, but are first conspicuously noted while they dwelt on the river bearing their name, which falls into Green bay, Wisconsin.* The Chippewa's, with whom they have strong affinity of language, call them Outagamie, and ever deemed them a sanguinary and unreliable tribe. The French defeated them in a sanguinary battle at Butte de Mort, and by this defeat drove them from Fox river.

Their present numbers cannot be accurately given. I was informed that the village I visited contained 250 souls. They have a large village at Rock Island, where the Foxes and Sauk's live together, which consists of sixty lodges, and numbers 300 souls. One-half of these may be Sauk's. They have another village at the mouth of Turkey river; altogether they may muster from 460 to 500 souls. Yet, they are at war with most of the tribes around them, except the Iowa's, Sauk's and Kickapoos. They are engaged in a deadly and apparently successful war against the Sioux tribes. They recently killed nine men of that Nation, on the Terre Blue river, and a party of twenty men are now absent, in the same direction, under a half-breed named Morgan. They are on bad terms with the Osages and Pawnees, of the Missouri, and not on the best terms with their neighbors, the Winnebago's

I again embarked at 4 o'clock A. M. (8th). My men were stout fellows, and worked with hearty will, and it was thought possible to reach the prairie during the day by hard and late pushing. We passed Turkey river at 2 o'clock, and they boldly plied their paddles, sometimes animating their labors with a song; but the Mississippi proved too stout for us, and sometime after night-fall we put ashore on an island, before reaching the Wisconsin.

In ascending the river this day, I observed the pelican, which exhibited itself in a flock standing on a low sandy spot of an island. this bird has a clumsy and unwieldy look, from the duplicate membrane attached to its lower mandible, which is constructed so as when inflated to give it a bag-like appearance. A short sleep served to restore the men, and we were again in our canoes the next morning (9th) before I could certainly tell the time by my watch. Daylight had not yet broke when we passed the influx of the Wisconsin, and we reached the prairie under a full chorus and landed at 6 o'clock.

WAR BETWEEN THE SACS AND FOXES AND THE SIOUX.

[I.—BY MRS. H. S. BAIRD, OF GREEN BAY.]

During the first half of the present century, there existed between different Indian tribes of the north and west, a succession of sanguinary wars. The conflicts between the contending parties were marked by the characteristic traits of cruelty and ferocity of a barbarous race. The tribes engaged in these hostilities were the Sioux, Chippewa, Sacs, Foxes and Winnebago's. Their battles were not always fought in their own country, nor on their own lands. Whenever and wherever a hostile party met, a contest was sure to be the result; and many incidents connected with this warfare were observed by the early settlers of Wisconsin, one of which I witnessed, and will relate.

In the month of May, 1830, with my family, I visited Prairie du Chien, on the Mississippi; we were guests of the late Joseph Rolette, then a trader, and agent of the American Fur Company. One evening, a few days after our arrival, we were startled by hearing the continual and successive reports of fire-arms, apparently on the Mississippi below. The firing continued for an hour or more, and was succeeded by sounds of Indian drums and savage yells, with an occasional discharge of guns.

The family having retired at the usual time, were aroused from their slumbers about midnight by hearing foot-steps on the piazza, conversation in the Indian language, and finally by knocking on the door and window shutters. Mr. Rolette immediately arose and went out to ascertain the cause of the disturbance, when he was informed that a bloody battle had been fought, and the visitors were the victors, and had called up their trader to inform him of their victory, and to obtain necessary spirit water to celebrate the glorious event in regular savage style. Their wants were supplied, of course, when they took their leave, but not to sleep; neither could we sleep, as the warriors kept up through the night a most horrible powwow, enlivened by savage yells, all plainly within our hearing.

In the morning we heard the particulars of the savage fight, and during the day witnessed one of the most disgusting and revolting exhibitions that human beings could display.

On the day before the battle, or rather massacre, a war party of some twenty or twenty-five Sioux encamped on an island opposite Prairie du Chien. They were there joined by few Menomonee's, who volunteered to assist their friends, the Sioux. It appears that the latter had previously received information that on that day a party of Sacs and Foxes, their inveterate enemies, would leave their village, situated on the Mississippi, some distance below Prairie du Chien, intending to visit the latter place; and that they would encamp for the night at a regular camping ground, near the mouth of the Wisconsin river.

In the afternoon of that day, the Sioux war party embarked in several canoes, and descended the river. Arriving near the spot where they knew their intended victims would encamp, they drew their canoes on land, and carefully hid them in the thick woods, and then selected a spot covered with a dense growth of bushes, and within a short gun-shot of the landing place on the camping ground. Here, with true Indian cunning, they lay in ambush, awaiting the arrival of the unsuspecting Sacs and Foxes. No fire was made, and the stillness of death reigned in the forest. Nor had they long to wait for the arrival of their foes.

Between sunset and dark, the party, in three or four canoes, arrived at the fatal landing place, and disembarked. It consisted of eighteen persons, one old chief, one squaw, one boy about fourteen years old and fifteen warriors. Upon landing, the party commenced unloading the canoes. The concealed war party remained perfectly quiet, scarcely breathing, so that their victims might be completely surprised. After all had landed, and while carrying their effects on shore, leaving their guns and war-clubs in the canoes, the party in ambush bounded to their feet, with a horrible yell, and fired a murderous volley at the surprised party, by which all fell except one man and the boy. The former reached a canoe, seized a loaded gun, and discharged it, mortally wounding one of the Sioux; but the poor Sac was soon dispatched, and the only one of the eighteen who survived was the boy, who happened to be in a canoe. He seized a paddle, pushed into the stream, and made his escape down the swift current of the river.

After the massacre, all who yet breathed were dispatched, and horribly mutilated. Hands, feet, fingers, ears and scalps were cut off, and more horrible still, the heart of the aged chief was cut from his breast, and all taken by the victors as trophies of the bloody conflict.

On the day succeeding the murder, the victorious party assembled, and accompanied by a few squaws, paraded the streets of Prairie du Chien, with the monotonous sounding drum and rattle, and displaying on poles the scalps and dismembered human fragments taken from the bodies of their victims. The whole party was painted with various colors, wore feathers, and carried their tomahawks, war-clubs and scalping-knives. Stopping in front of the principal houses in the village, they danced the war-dance and scalp-dance, ending with yells characteristic of incarnate devils.

The mangled limbs were still fresh and bleeding; one old squaw had carried on a pole the entire hand, with a long strip of skin from the arm of one of the murdered men, elevated above her head, the blood trickling down upon her hair and face, while she kept up the death-song, and joined in the scalp-dance. After this exhibition, which lasted two or three hours, the warriors went to a small mound, about 200 yards from

Mr. Rolette's residence, and in plain sight made a fire and roasted the heart of the old murdered chief, and then divided it into small pieces among the several warriors, who devoured it, to inspire them with courage, and "make their hearts glad."

The whole scene was shocking and disgusting in the extreme, and such a one, we hope, never again will be witnessed in a civilized community.

The incidents just related occurred in a town containing a civilized (?) population of 600 or 800 inhabitants, under the walls of the U. S. garrison, and within musket shot of the fort. Neither civil nor military authorities made any effort to prevent the exhibition of the revolting and savage trophies of the sanguinary battle. In the afternoon, the party of Sioux warriors embarked in their canoes and ascended the Mississippi, on their return to their own village, leaving on the minds and memories of those who witnessed these horrible and frantic orgies recollections not soon to be forgotten.

II.—BY JAMES H. LOCKWOOD.

In 1830 a party of Sauk's and Foxes killed some Sioux, on or about the head-waters of Red Cedar river, in the now State of Iowa; and the same season a band of Fox Indians, who resided about where Dubuque now is, had occasion to visit Prairie du Chien on business with the agent, whom they had previously informed that they would arrive on a certain day. An Indian called the Kettle was their chief. It was generally believed that John Marsh gave the Sioux information of the coming of the Foxes, and of the time they were expected; and on the morning of the day appointed for the arrival of the Foxes at Prairie du Chien, a small war party of young Sioux made their appearance here, and joined by a few of the Menomonee young men, proceeded down the Mississippi to the lower end of the Prairie du Pierreaux, some twelve or fifteen miles below Prairie du Chien, where a narrow channel of the Mississippi runs close to that end of the prairie, fringed with small trees, bushes and grass. They knew the custom of the Indians in going up stream to avail themselves of all such side channels, as there was less current in them than in the broad river; and secreting themselves among the bushes, trees and grass, awaited their unsuspecting victims. When the Foxes came within point blank shot, they all fired upon them, killing their chief Kettle and several others. The Foxes finding their chief killed, returned down the river to carry the news of their misfortunes to the tribe, while the Sioux and Menomonee's returned home with the tidings of their victory and to dance over it. They passed through Prairie du Chien, and remained a short time here, but for some unaccountable reason no notice whatever was taken of it.

The signs of several war parties of the Foxes were reported to have been seen on the opposite side of the river during the year; but they effected nothing until sometime, I think, in June, 1831, when a considerable number of Menomonee's had collected at Prairie du Chien, and encamped on an island near the eastern shore of the Mississippi, about one-fourth of a mile from the old Fort Crawford. They had obtained whisky enough for all to get socially drunk upon—and it is rare to find a Menomonee who will not get drunk when he has a chance—and they had carried their revels far into the night, until men, women and children were beastly drunk. About two hours before day a Fox war party, that had been watching their movements, fell upon them in that helpless state and killed about thirty of them. By this time some of the more sober of them were aroused, and commenced firing upon the Foxes, who fled down the river, pursued a short distance by the Menomonee's.

Thomas P. Burnett, the sub-Indian agent, was sleeping with me in my store. It being very warm weather, we had made a bed of blankets on the counter, when about two hours before daylight we were awakened by the cries of a Menomonee woman at the store door. We let her in, when she told us of the disaster to the Menomonee's. Mr.

Burnett took my horse and went to inform Gen. Street, the Indian agent, who lived about four miles above this, and who arrived about daylight and gave the first information to the fort. Although there had been a great firing of guns and hallooing among the Indians, the sentinels had reported nothing of it to the officers; but on hearing of the affair, the commandant immediately dispatched a company of men in boats after the Foxes, but they did not overtake them. The government demanded of the Sauk's to deliver up the perpetrators of this deed. The Foxes fled to the Sauk's, and their chief, Kettle, being dead, they remained among and amalgamated with them, and have not since continued a separate Nation or tribe. I have always believed this to be the origin of the Black Hawk War. There were, I suppose, other causes of discontent, but I believe that this transaction was the immediate cause of the movements of Black Hawk.

III.—BY JOHN H. FONDA.

The same year, 1830, the Fox and Sauk Indians killed some Sioux, at the head of Cedar river, in Iowa. Capt. Dick Mason* started with a number of troops for the scene of disturbance, and I went along as guide. We arrived at the place of the fight, found everything quiet and all we did was to turn about and go back the way we came.

Soon after, the Sioux and a number of Menomonee's attacked a party of Sauk's and Foxes at Prairie du Pierreux and killed some ten Indians, among whom was Kettle, the great Fox chief†.

The Sauk's and Foxes were coming up to a treaty unarmed, and the Sioux, made aware of this through their runners, got the Menomonee's and laid in ambush on the east shore. The unsuspecting Foxes were fired into from the ambuscade and their best warriors lost their scalps.

*Richard B. Mason, a native of Virginia, was a 1st. Lieutenant in 1817, captain in 1819; served in the Black Hawk War; major of dragoons in 1833, Lieutenant-colonel in 1836 and colonel in 1846. He commanded the forces in California and was ex-officio governor 1847-48; brevetted brigadier-general and died at Jefferson Barracks, Mo., July 25, 1850.

After the fight the Menomonee's and Sioux came up here to have a dance over the scalps. The Indians presented a horrid appearance. They were painted for war and had smeared themselves with blood and carried the fresh scalps on poles. Some had cut off a head and thrust a stick in the throttle and held it on high; some carried a hand, arm, leg or some other portion of a body, as trophies of their success. They commenced to dance near the mound over the slough, but Col. Taylor soon stopped that by driving them across the main channel on to the islands, where they danced until their own scalps went to grace the wigwams of the Sauk's and Foxes.

In April, of 1831, I was in the hospital at Fort Crawford, when, through the influence of Col. Taylor and Dr. Beaumont, I got my discharge. When I was convalescent, which was about June, a war party of Sauk and Fox Indians came up from their part of the country to the bluff north of Bloody Run, from where they watched the Menomonee's, who were encamped on an island opposite Prairie du Chien, a little north of the old fort. One night the Menomonee camp was surprised by the Sauk and Fox war party, and all in the camp killed except an Indian boy, who picked up a gun and shot a Fox brave through the heart and escaped. After massacring, scalping and mutilating the bodies, the Fox Indians got into canoes and paddled down the river past the fort, singing their war songs and boasting of their exploits. Soldiers were sent to punish them, but I believe they failed to catch them. In the morning I helped to bury those killed. There were twenty-seven bodies, all killed with the knife and tomahawk, except the Fox brave shot by the boy. They were buried in three graves on the landing below the present Fort Crawford, and until within a few years the spot was marked by a small muslin flag kept standing by the few Menomonee's who lingered in this vicinity; but nothing is now left to preserve the graves from sacrilege, and soon the iron horse will course o'er the bones of those red men, long since gone to their happy bunting grounds.

After the Menomonee massacre, a warrior of that tribe was found in the old Catholic graveyard and buried. He had no wounds and it is thought that when the Foxes attacked the Indians on the island, he got away and ran so fast that he had to lean against the wall to rest, and that he rolled over and died.

The Indian agency was removed this year to Yellow River and the Rev. Mr. Lowrey appointed agent. It was afterwards removed to Fort Atkinson, Iowa. The mission buildings can be seen now on Yellow river, about five miles from its mouth.

II.—THE WINNEBAGOES.

The Nation which displaced the Sacs and Foxes upon the Wisconsin river and its contiguous territory, including what is now Green county, was the Winnebago. It is now 250 years since the civilized world began to get a knowledge of the Winnebago's—the "men of the sea," as they were called, pointing, possibly, to their early emigration from the shores of the Mexican gulf, or the Pacific. The territory now included within the limits of Wisconsin, and so much of the State of Michigan as lies north of Green bay, Lake Michigan, the Straits of Mackinaw and Lake Huron were, in early time, inhabited by several tribes of the Algonquin race, forming a barrier to the Dakotas, or Sioux, who had advanced eastward to the Mississippi. But the Winnebago's, although one of the tribes belonging to the family of the latter, had passed the great river, at some unknown period, and settled upon Winnebago lake. Here, as early as 1634, they were visited by John Nicolet, an agent of France, and a treaty concluded with them.* Little more was heard of the Winnebago's for the next thirty-five years, when, on the 2d of December, 1689, some of that Nation were seen at a Sac village on Green bay, by Father Allouez.

As early at least as 1670, the French were actively engaged among the Winnebago's trading. "We found affairs," says one of the Jesuit missionaries, who arrived among them in September of that year, "we found affairs there in a pretty bad posture, and the minds of the savages much soured against the French, who were there trading; ill-treating them in deeds and words, pillaging and carrying away their merchandise in spite of them, and conducting themselves toward them with insupportable insolences and indignities. The cause of this disorder," adds the missionary, "is that they had received some bad treatment from the French, to whom they had this year come to trade, and particularly from the soldiers, from whom they pretended to have received many wrongs and injuries. It is thus made certain that the arms of France were carried into the territory of the Winnebago's over 200 years ago.

The Fox river of Green bay was found at that date a difficult stream to navigate. Two Jesuits who ascended the river, in 1670, had "three or four leagues of rapids to contend with, when they had advanced one day's journey from the head of the bay, more difficult than those which are common in other rivers, in this, that the flints, over which they had to walk with naked feet to drag their canoes, were so sharp and so cutting, that one has all the trouble in the world to hold one's self steady against the great rushing of the waters. At the falls they found an idol that the savages honored; never failing, in passing, to make him some sacrifice of tobacco, or arrows, or paintings, or other things, to thank him that, by his assistance, they had, in ascending, avoided the dangers of the waterfalls which are in this stream; or else, if they had to ascend, to pray him to aid them in this perilous navigation. The missionaries caused the idol to be lifted up by the strength of the arm, and cast into the depths of the river, to appear no more to the idolatrous savages."

The Winnebago's, by this time, had not only received considerable spiritual instruction from the Jesuit fathers, but had obtained quite an insight into the mysteries of trading and trafficking with white men; for, following the footsteps of the missionaries, and sometimes preceding them, were the ubiquitous French fur traders. It is impossible to determine precisely what territory was occupied by the Winnebago's at this early date, farther than that they lived near the head of Green bay.

A direct trade with the French upon the St. Lawrence was not carried on by the Winnebago's to any great extent until the beginning of the eighteenth century. As early as 1679, an advance party of LaSalle had collected a large store of furs at the mouth of Green bay, doubtless in a traffic with this tribe and others contiguous to them; generally, however, the surrounding Nations sold their peltries to the Ottawa's, who disposed of them, in turn to the French. The commencement of the eighteenth century found the Winnebago's firmly in alliance with France, and in peace with the dreaded Iroquois. In 1718, the Nation numbered 600. They had moved from the Fox river to Green bay. They were afterward found to have moved up Fox river, locating upon Winnebago lake, which lake, was their ancient seat, and from which they had been driven either by fear or the prowess of more powerful tribes of the west and southwest. Their intercourse with the French was gradually extended and generally peaceful, though not always so, joining with them, as did the Menomonee's, in their wars with the Iroquois, and subsequently in their conflicts with the English, which finally ended in 1760.

When the British, in October, 1761, took possession of the French post, at the head of Green bay, the Winnebago's were found to number 150 warriors only; their nearest village being at the lower end of Winnebago lake. They had in all not less than three towns. Their country, at this period, included, not only that lake, but all the streams flowing into it, especially Fox river; afterward extended to the Wisconsin and Rock rivers. They readily changed their course of trade—asking now of the commandant at the fort for English traders to be sent among them. In the Indian outbreak under Pontiac, in 1763, they joined with the Menomonee's and other tribes to befriend the British garrison at the head of the bay, assisting in conducting them to a place of safety. They continued their friendship to the English during the revolution, by joining with them against the colonies, and were active in the Indian war of 1790—4, taking part in the attack on Fort Recovery, upon the Maumee, in the present State of Ohio, in 1793. They fought also on the side of the British in the War of 1812—15, aiding, in 1814, to reduce Prairie du Chien. They were then estimated at 4,500. When, in 1816, the government of the United States sent troops to take possession of the Green bay country, by establishing a garrison there, some trouble was anticipated from these Indians, who, at that date, had the reputation of being a bold and warlike tribe. A deputation from the Nation came down Fox river and remonstrated with the American commandant at what was thought to be an intrusion. They were desirous of knowing why a fort was to be established so near them. The reply was that, although the troops were armed for war if necessary, their purpose was peace. Their response was an old one: "If your object is peace, you have too many men; if war, you have too few." However, the display of a number of cannon, which had not yet been mounted, satisfied the Winnebago's that the Americans were masters of the situation and the deputation gave the garrison no further trouble.

On the 3d of June, 1816, at St Louis, the tribe made a treaty of peace and friendship with the general government; but they continued to levy tribute on all white people who passed up Fox river. English annuities also kept up a bad feeling. At this time a portion of the tribe was living upon the Wisconsin river, away from the rest of the Nation, which was still seated upon the waters flowing into Green bay. In 1820 they had five villages on Winnebago lake and fourteen on Rock river. In 1825 the claim of the Winnebago's was an extensive one, so far as territory was concerned. Its southeast boundary stretched away from the source of Rock river, to within forty miles of its mouth, in Illinois, where they had a village. On the west it extended to the heads of the small streams flowing into the Mississippi. To the northward, it reached Black river and the Upper Wisconsin, in other words, to the Chippewa territory, but did not extend across Fox river, although they contended for the whole of Winnebago lake.

This brings the narrative of this Nation down to

"THE WINNEBAGO WAR"

During the winter of 1825—6, there were confined in the guard house of Fort Crawford, at Prairie du Chien, because of some alleged dishonest act, two Winnebago Indians. In October, 1826, the fort was abandoned and the garrison removed to Fort Snelling. The commandant took with him the two Winnebago's. During the spring of 1827, the reports about the two Indians, around Prairie du Chien, was to the effect that they had been killed. It was soon apparent that a spirit of enmity between the tribe and the settlers in southwestern Wisconsin was effectually stirred up. In addition to this, were the daily encroachments of miners in the Lead Region; for these miners had, by this time, overrun the mining country from Galena to the Wisconsin river. Finally the difficulties led to an open rupture.

MURDER OF GAGNIER AND LIPCAP.

On the 28th of June, 1827, two Winnebago Indians, Red Bird and We Kaw, and three of their companions, entered the house of Rigeste Gagnier, about two miles from Prairie du Chien, where they remained several hours. At last when Mr. Gagnier least expected it, Red Bird leveled his gun and shot him dead on his hearthstone. A person in the building by the name of Lipcap, who was a hired man, was slain at the same time by We-Kaw. Madam Gagnier turned to fly with her infant of eighteen months. As she was about to leap through the window, the child was torn from her arms by We-Kaw, stabbed, scalped and thrown violently on the floor as dead. The murderer then attacked the woman, but gave way when she snatched up a gun that was leaning against the wall, and presented it to his breast. She then effected her escape. Her eldest son, a lad of ten years, also shunned the murderers, and they both arrived in the village at the same time. The alarm was soon given; but, when the avengers of blood arrived at Gagnier's house, they found in it nothing living but his mangled infant. It was carried to the village, and, incredible as it may seem, it recovered.

A WINNEBAGO DEBAUCH.

Red Bird and his companions immediately proceeded from the scene of their crime to the rendezvous of their band. During their absence, thirty-seven of the warriors who acknowledged the authority of Red Bird, had assembled with their wives and children, near the mouth of the Bad Ax river, in what is now Vernon county. They received the murderers with joy and loud approbations of their exploit. A keg of liquor which they had secured was set abroach, and the Indians began to drink and as their spirits rose, to boast of what they had already done and intended to do. They continued their revel for two days, but on the third the source of their excitement gave out—their liquor was gone. They were, at about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, dissipating the last fumes of their excitement in the scalp-dance, when they descried one of the keel-boats, which had a few days before passed up the river with provisions for the troops at Fort Snelling, on her return, in charge of Mr. Lindsay.

Forthwith a proposal to take her and massacre the crew was made and carried by acclamation. They counted on doing this without risk, for they had examined her on her way up and supposed there were no arms on board. But in this they were mistaken as the sequel shows.

FIRST BATTLE OF BAD AX.

There were indications of hostilities on the part of the Sioux on the upper Mississippi, and the boats when they left Fort Snelling had been supplied with arms. In descending the river they expected an attack at Wabashaw, where the Sioux were dancing the war dance, and hailed their approach with insults and menaces, but did not offer to attack the boats, or obstruct their passage. The whites now supposed the danger over, and, a strong wind at that moment beginning to blow up stream, the boats parted company. So strong was the wind that all the force of the sweeps could scarcely stem it; and by the time the foremost boat was near the encampment, at the mouth of the Bad Ax, the crew were very willing to stop and rest. One or two Frenchmen, or half-breeds, who were on board, observed hostile appearances on shore, and advised the rest to keep the middle of the stream with the boat, but their counsel was disregarded. They urged the boat directly toward the camp with all the force of the sweeps. There were sixteen men on deck.

The men were rallying their French companions on their apprehensions, as the boat approached the shore; but when within thirty yards of the bank, suddenly the trees and rocks rang with the blood-chilling, ear-piercing tones of the war whoop, and a volley of rifle balls rained upon the deck. happily, the Winnebago's had not yet recovered from the effects of their debauch, and their arms were not steady. One man only fell. He was a little Negro named Peter. His leg was dreadfully shattered and he afterward died of the wound. A second volley soon came from the shore; but, as the men were lying at the bottom of the boat, they all escaped but one, who was shot through the heart. Encouraged by the non-resistance, the Winnebago's rushed to their canoes with intent to board. The boatmen having recovered from their first panic, seized their guns and the savages were received with a severe discharge. In one canoe two savages were killed with the same bullet and several wounded. The attack was continued until night, when one of the party named Mandeville, who had assumed command, sprang into the water, followed by four others, who succeeded in setting the boat afloat, and then went down the stream.

Thirty-seven Indians were engaged in this attack, which may be called the first "Battle of Bad Ax;" the second being fought just below this point, five years after, between the Americans and Indians of another tribe, of which an account will be given in another chapter. Of the Winnebago's seven were killed and fourteen wounded. They managed to put 693 shots into and through the boat. Two of the crew were killed outright, and four wounded—two mortally. The presence of mind of Mandeville undoubtedly saved the rest, as well as the boat. Mr. Lindsay's boat, the rear one, did not reach the mouth of the Bad Ax until midnight. The Indians opened fire upon her, which was promptly returned. Owing to the darkness no injury was done to the boat, and she passed safely on. Considering the few that were engaged in the attack on the first boat and in its defense, the contest was indeed a spirited and sanguinary one.

GREAT ALARM UPON THE BORDER.

Great was the alarm at Prairie du Chien when the boats arrived there. The people left their houses and farms and crowded into the dilapidated fort. An express was immediately sent to Galena and another to Fort Snelling, for assistance. A company of upwards of 100 volunteers soon arrived from Galena, and the minds of the inhabitants were quieted. In a few days four imperfect companies arrived from Fort Snelling. The consternation of the people of the lead mines was great, and in all the frontier settlements. This portion of the country then contained, as is supposed, about 5,000 inhabitants—that is south of the Wisconsin river and at Prairie du Chien, and extending into Illinois. A great many of these fled from their homes.

ARRIVAL OF GOVERNMENT TROOPS.

On the 1st of September, 1827, Major William Whistler, with government troops arrived at the portage (now Portage, Columbia Co., Wis.), and while there an express arrived from Gen. H. Atkinson, announcing his approach, and directing him to halt and fortify himself and wait his arrival. The object of the joint expedition of Gen. Atkinson from Jefferson barracks below St. Louis, and of Major Whistler from Fort Howard, at Green Bay, was to capture those who had committed the murders at Prairie du Chien, and put a stop to any further aggression. And this march of the two into the Winnebago country from opposite directions was well calculated to over-awe the disaffected among the Winnebago's. These Indians were soon advised that the security of their people lay in the surrender of the murderers of the Gagnier family. Accordingly, Red Bird and We-Kaw were surrendered up to Major Whistler at the portage, and the Winnebago war was ended. The two Indians were taken to Prairie du Chien for safekeeping, to await their trial in the regular courts of justice for murder.

TRIAL AND CONVICTION OF THE MURDERERS.

The next spring (1828), Red Bird, We-Kaw and another Winnebago prisoner were tried at Prairie du Chien, before Judge James Duane Doty, who went from Green Bay there for that purpose. They were found guilty and sentenced to death. Red Bird died in prison. A deputation of the tribe went to Washington to solicit from the President of the United States, John Quincy Adams, a pardon for the others. President Adams granted it on the implied condition that the tribe would cede the lands then the possession of the miners, in the Lead Region, to the General Government.* The Winnebago's agreed to this. Madame Gagnier was compensated for the loss of her husband and the mutilation of her infant. At the treaty with the Winnebago's held at Prairie du Chien in 1829, provision was made for two sections of land to her and her two children. The United States agreed to pay her the sum of $50 per annum for fifteen years, to be deducted from the annuity of the Winnebago's.

DE-KAU-RAY'S IMPRISONMENT.

In closing this account of the "Winnebago War" we give an anecdote, which places the Winnebago character in an amiable light. The militia of Prairie du Chien, immediately after the affair of the boats at the mouth of the Bad Ax river, seized an old Winnebago chief named De-kau-ray and four other Indians. The chief was informed that if Red Bird was not given up within a certain time he and the others were to die in his place. This, De-kau-ray steadfastly believed. A messenger, a young Indian, was sent to inform the tribe of the state of affairs, and several days had elapsed and no information was received of the murderers. The dreadful day was near at hand, and De-kau-ray, being in bad health, asked permission of the officer to go to the river and indulge in his long-accustomed habit of bathing in order to improve his physical condition, upon which Col. Snelling told him that if he would promise on the honor of a chief that he would not leave town, he might have his liberty and enjoy all his privileges until the day appointed for his execution. Accordingly he first gave his hand to the colonel, thanking him for his friendly offer, then raised both hands aloft, and, in the most solemn adjuration, promised that he would not leave the bounds prescribed, and said if he had a hundred lives he would sooner lose them all than forfeit his word. He was then set at liberty. He was advised to flee to the wilderness and make his escape. "Do you think," said he, "I prize life above honor?" He then complacently remained until nine days of the ten which he had to live had passed, and still nothing was heard of the murderers or of their being apprehended. No alteration could be seen in the countenance of the chief. It so happened that on that day Gen. Atkinson arrived with his troops from Jefferson barracks, and the order for the execution was countermanded and the Indians permitted to return to their homes.

WM. J. SNELLING ON THE WINNEBAGO WAR.

No tribe considers revenge a more sacred duty than the Winnebago's. It was their ancient custom to take five lives for one, and it is notorious on the frontiers, that no blood of theirs has been shed, even in modern days, that has not been fully avenged. They used, too, to wear some part of the body of a slain enemy about them as a testimony of prowess. We well remember a grim Winnebago, who was wont to present himself before the whites, who passed the portage of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, with a human hand hanging on his breast. He had taken it from a Yankee soldier at Tippecanoe.

It was not difficult to stir up such a people to hostility, and, moreover, circumstances favored the designs of the Dakotas. There is, or was, a village of Winnebago's on the Black river not far from the Dakota town of which Wa-ba-shaw is chief. The two tribes are descended from the same stock, as their languages abundantly prove, and the claims of common origin have been strengthened by frequent intermarriages. Now, it happened, that at the time when Too-pun-kah Zeze was put to death at Fort Snelling, the Red Bird was absent from his Winnebago village, on an expedition against the Chippewa's. He returned unsuccessful, and, consequently, sullen and malcontent. Till this time he had been noted among his tribe for his friendly disposition towards the "men with hats," as the Indians call the whites, and among the traders, for his scrupulous honesty.

However, this man, from whom no white person beyond the frontier would have anticipated injury, was easily induced to commit a bloody and unprovoked outrage.

Certain Dakota ambassadors arrived at the Red Bird's village, with a lie in their mouths. "You have become a by-word of reproach among us," said they; "you have just given the Chippewa's reason to laugh at you, and the Big Knives also laugh at you. Lo! while they were among you they dared not offend you, but now they have caused Wa-man-goos-ga-ra-ha, and his companion to be put to death, and they have cut their bodies into pieces not bigger than the spots in a bead garter." The tale was believed, and a cry for vengeance arose throughout the village. It was decided that something must be done, and the Dakota envoys promised to lend a helping hand.

A few days before two keel-boats had ascended the river, laden with provisions for the troops at Fort Snelling. They passed the mouth of Black river with a full sheet, so that a few Winnebago's, who were there encamped, had some difficulty in reaching them with their canoes. They might have taken both boats, for there were but three fire-locks on board; nevertheless they offered no injury. They sold fish and venison to the boatmen, on amicable terms, and suffered them to pursue their journey unmolested. We mention this trifling circumstance, merely because it was afterwards reported in the St. Louis papers, that the crews of these boats had abused these Winnebago's shamefully, which assuredly was not the case. The wind died away before the boats reached the village of Wa-ba-shaw, which is situated on the west bank of the Mississippi, twelve or fifteen miles above the mouth of the Black river. Here the Dakotas peremptorily commanded them to put ashore, which they did. No reason was assigned for the order. Upwards of 500 warriors immediately crowded on board. A passenger who was well acquainted with the Dakotas observed that they brought no women with them as usual; that they were painted black, which signifies either grief or hostility; that they refused to shake hands with the boatmen, and that their speech was brief and sullen. He instantly communicated his observation to Mr. Lindsay, who commanded the boats, and advised him to push on, before the savages should have discovered that the party were wholly unarmed. Lindsay, a bold-hearted Kentuckian, assumed the tone of command, and peremptorily ordered the Dakotas ashore. They, probably, thought that big words would be seconded with hard blows, and complied. The boats pushed on, several Indians pursued them along the shore for several miles, with speech of taunt and defiance, but they offered no further molestation.

The Dakota villages higher up showed much ill-will, but no disposition, or rather no courage, to attack. Altogether appearances were so threatening that on his arrival at Fort Snelling, Mr. Lindsay communicated what he had seen to the commanding officer, and asked that his crew should be furnished with arms and ammunition. The request was granted; his thirty-two men were provided with thirty-two muskets, and a barrel of ball cartridges. Thus secured against attack, the boats commenced the descent of the river.

In the meanwhile the Red Bird had cogitated upon what he had heard, every tittle of which he believed, and had come to the conclusion that the honor of his race required the blood of two Americans at least. He, therefore, got into his canoe with Wekaw, or the Sun, and two others, and paddled to Prairie du Chien. When he got there he waited upon Mr. Boilvin in the most friendly manner, and begged to be regarded as one of the staunchest friends of the Americans. The venerable agent admitted his claims, but absolutely refused to give him any whisky. The Winnebago chief then applied to a trader in the town, who, relying on his general good character, did not hesitate to furnish him with an eight gallon keg of spirits, the value of which was to be paid in furs in the succeeding autumn.

There was an old colored woman in the village, whose five sons had never heard that they were inferior beings, either from the Indians or the Canadian French. Therefore, having never considered themselves degraded, they were not degraded; on the contrary, they ranked with the most respectable inhabitants of the place. We knew them well. One of them was the village blacksmith; the others were substantial farmers. Their father was a Frenchman, and their name was Gagnier.

One of these men owned a farm three miles from Prairie du Chien, where he lived with his wife, who was a white woman, two children and a hired man named Lipcap. Thither the Red Bird repaired with his three companions, sure of a fair reception, for Registre Gagnier had always been noted for his humanity to the poor, especially the Indians.

Registre Gagnier invited his savage visitors to enter, hung the kettle over the fire, gave them to eat and smoked the pipe of peace with them. The Red Bird was the last man on earth whom he would have feared; for they were well acquainted with each other and had reciprocated good offices. The Indians remained several hours under Gagnier's hospitable roof. At last, when the farmer least expected it, the Winnebago chief leveled his gun and shot him down dead on his hearth-stone. Lipcap was slain at the same instant by We-kaw. Madame Gagnier turned to fly with her infant of eighteen months. As she was about to leap through the window, the child was torn from her arms by We-kaw, stabbed, scalped and thrown violently on the floor as dead. The murderer then attacked the woman; but gave way when she snatched up a gun that was leaning against the wall and presented it to his breast. She then effected her escape. Her eldest son, a lad of ten years, also shunned the murderers, and they both arrived in the village at about the same time. The alarm was soon given; but when the avengers of blood arrived at poor Registre Gagnier's house, they found in it nothing living but his mangled infant. It was carried to the village, and, strange as it may seem, recovered.*

The Red Bird and his companions immediately proceeded from the scene of their crime to the rendezvous of their band. During their absence, thirty-seven of the warriors, who acknowledged the authority of Red Bird, had assembled, with their wives and children, near the mouth of Bad Ax river. They received the murderers with exceeding great joy, and loud approbation of their exploit. The keg of liquor was immediately set afloat, the red men began to drink, and, as their spirits rose, to boast of what they had already done, and intended to do. Two days did they continue to revel; and on the third the source of their excitement gave out. They were, at about 4 in the afternoon, dissipating the last fumes of their excitement in the scalp dance, when they descried one of the keel-boats before mentioned approaching. Forthwith a proposal to take her and massacre the crew was made and carried by acclamation. They counted upon doing this without risk; for they had examined her on the way up, and supposed that there were no arms on board.

Mr. Lindsay's boats had descended the river together as far as the village of Wa-ba-shaw, where they expected an attack. The Dakotas on shore were dancing the war-dance, and hailed their approach with insults and menaces; but did not, nevertheless, offer to obstruct their passage. The whites now supposed the danger over, and a strong wind at that moment beginning to blow up stream, the boats parted company. That which sat deepest in the water had the advantage of the under current, and, of course, gained several miles in advance of the other. So strong was the wind that all the force of sweeps could scarcely stem it, and, by the time the foremost boat was near the encampment, at mouth of the Bad Ax, the crew were very willing to stop and rest. One or two Frenchmen, or half breeds, who were on board, observed hostile appearances on shore, and advised the rest to keep the middle of the stream; but their counsel was disregarded. Most of the crew were Americans, who, as usual with our countrymen, combined a profound ignorance of Indian character with a thorough contempt for Indian prowess. They urged the boat directly toward the camp, with all the force of the sweeps. There were sixteen men on deck. It may be well to observe here, that this, like all keel-boats used in the Mississippi valley, was built almost exactly on the model of the Erie and Middlesex canal boats.

The men were rallying their French companions on their apprehensions, and the boat* was within thirty yards of the shore, when suddenly the trees and rocks rang with the blood-chilling, ear-piercing tones of the war-whoop, and a volley of rifle balls rained upon the deck. Happily, the Winnebago's had not yet recovered from the effects of their debauch, and their arms were not steady. One man only fell by their fire. He was a little Negro named Peter. His leg was dreadfully shattered, and he afterwards died of the wound. Then Peter began to curse and swear, d——g his fellows for leaving him to be shot at like a Christmas turkey; but finding that his reproaches had no effect, he also managed to drag himself below. All this passed in as little time as it will take to read this paragraph.

Presently a voice, hailed the boat in the Sac tongue, demanding to know if the crew were English? A half-breed Sac, named Beauchamp, answered in the affirmative. "Then," said the querist, "come on shore, and we will do you no harm, for we are your brethren, the Sacs." "Dog," retorted Beauchamp, "no Sac would attack us thus cowardly. If you want us on shore, you must come and fetch us."

*This advance boat was the Oliver H. Perry, according to Smith's History of Wisconsin.

With that, a second volley came from the shore; but as the men were now lying prone in the bottom of the boat, below the water line, they all escaped but one. One man, an American named Stewart, fell. He had risen to return the first fire, and the muzzle of his musket protruding through a loop-hole, showed some Winnebago where to aim. The bullet struck him under the left arm, and passed directly through his heart. He fell dead, with his finger on the trigger of his undischarged gun. It was a hot day, and before the fight was over, the scent of the gunpowder could not overpower the stench of the red puddle around him.

The Winnebago's encouraged by the nonresidence, now rushed to their canoes, with intent to board. One venerable old man endeavored to dissuade them. He laid hold on one of the canoes, and would, perhaps, have succeeded in retaining it; but in the heat of his argument, a ball from the boat hit him in the middle finger of the peace-making hand. Very naturally enraged at such unkind treatment from his friends, he loosed the canoe, hurried to his wigwam for his gun, and took an active part in the remainder of the action. In the meanwhile, the white men had recovered from their first panic, and seized their arms. The boarders were received with a very severe discharge. In one canoe, two savages were killed with the same bullet. Their dying struggles upset the canoe, and the rest were obliged to swim on shore, where it was sometime before they could restore their arms to fighting order. Several more were wounded, and those who remained unhurt, put back, satisfied that a storm was not the best mode of attack.

Two, however, persevered. They were together in one canoe, and approached the boat astern, where there were no holes through which the whites could fire upon them. They soon leaped on board. One seized the long steering oar, or rudder. The other jumped upon deck, where he halted, and discharged five muskets, which had been left there by the crew, fled below through the deck into the bottom of the boat. In this manner he wounded one man very severely. After this exploit, he hurried to the bow, where he seized a long pole, and with the assistance of the steersman, succeeded in grounding the boat on a sand-bar, and fixing her fast under the fire of his people. The two Winnebago boatmen then began to load and fire, to the no small annoyance of the crew. He at the stern was soon dispatched. One of the whites observed his position through a crack, and gave him a mortal wound through the boards. Still, he struggled to get overboard, probably to save his scalp. But his struggles were feeble, and a second bullet terminated them before he could effect his object. After the fight was over, the man who slew him took his scalp.

The bow of the boat was open, and the warrior there still kept his station, out of sight, excepting when he stooped to fire, which he did five times. His third shot broke the arm, and passed through the lungs, of the brave Beauchamp. At this sight, one or two began to speak of surrender. "No, friends," cried the dying man; "you will not save your lives so. Fight to the last; for they will show no mercy. If they get the better of you, for God's sake throw me overboard. Do not let them get my hair." He continued to exhort them to resistance as long as his breath lasted, and died with the words "fight on," on his lips. Before this time, however, his slayer had also taken his leave of life. A sailor, named Jack Mandeville, shot him through the head, and he fell overboard, carrying his gun with him.

From that moment Mandeville assumed the command of the boat. A few had resolved to take the skiff, and leave the rest to their fate. They had already cast off the rope. Jack interposed, declaring that he would shoot the first man, and bayonet the second, who would persevere. They submitted. Two more had hidden themselves in the bow of the boat, out of sight, but not out of danger. After a while the old tar missed them, sought them, and compelled them by threats of instant death, enforced by pricks of his bayonet, to leave their hiding place, and take a share in the business in hand. Afterwards they fought like bull dogs. It was well for them that Mandeville acted as he did; for they had scarcely risen when a score of bullets, at least, passed through the place where they had been lying.

After the two or three first volleys the fire had slackened, but it was not, therefore, the less dangerous. The Indians had the advantage of superior numbers, and could shift their positions at pleasure. The whites were compelled to lie in the bottom of the boat, below the water mark, for its sides were without bulwarks. Every bullet passed through and through. It was only at intervals, and very warily, that they could rise to fire; for the flash of every gun showed the position of the marksman, and was instantly followed by the reports of two or three Indian rifles. On the other hand they were not seen, and being thinly scattered over a large boat, the Winnebago's could but guess their positions. The fire, was therefore, slow; for none on either side cared to waste ammunition. Thus, for upwards of three hours, the boatmen lay in blood and bilge-water deprived of the free use of their limbs, and wholly unable to extricate themselves.

At last, as the night fell, Mandeville came to the conclusion that darkness would render the guns of his own party wholly useless, while it would not render the aim of the Winnebago's a jot less certain. He, therefore, as soon as it was dark, stoutly called for assistance, and sprang into the water. Four more followed him. The balls rained around them, passing through their clothes; but they persisted, and the boat was soon afloat. Seeing their prey escaping, the Winnebago's raised a yell of mingled rage and despair, and gave the whites a farewell volley. It was returned, with three hearty cheers, and ere a gun could be re-loaded, the boat had floated out of shooting distance.

For half the night, a wailing voice, apparently that of an old man, was heard, following the boat, at a safe distance, however. It was conjectured that it was the father of him whose body the boat was bearing away. Subsequently inquiry proved this supposition to be correct.

Thirty-seven Indians were engaged in this battle, seven of whom were killed, and fourteen were wounded. They managed to put 693 balls into and through the boat. Two of the crew were killed outright, two mortally, and two slightly wounded. Jack Mandeville's courage and presence of mind undoubtedly saved the rest, as well as the boat; but we have never heard that he was rewarded in any way or shape.

Mr. Lindsay's boat, the rear one, reached the month of the Bad Ax about midnight. The Indians opened a fire upon her, which was promptly returned. There was a light on board, at which the first gun was probably aimed, for that ball only hit the boat. All the rest passed over harmless in the darkness.*

Great was the alarm at Prairie du Chien when the boats arrived there. The people left their houses and farms, and crowded into the dilapidated fort. Nevertheless, they showed much spirit, and speedily established a very effective discipline. An express was immediately sent to Galena, and another to Fort Snelling, for assistance. A company of upwards of 100 volunteers soon arrived from Galena, and the minds of the inhabitants were quieted.

In a few days, four imperfect companies of the 5th Infantry arrived from Fort Snelling. The commanding officer ordered a march on the Red

*It is stated in Neill's Minnesota, that among the passengers on Lindsay's boat was Joseph Snelling, a talented son of the Colonel, who wrote a story of deep interest, based on the facts narrated. This we presume was William J. Snelling, the writer of this narrative. As for the date of the attack on these keel boats, Judge Lockwood gives it at June 26th, which Neill follows; Gen. Smith, on Judge Doty's authority, we presume, says the 30th. Whatever was the real date, one thing is quite certain, that the murder of Gagnier's family and the boat attack, transpired the same day, and the next day the first of the keel boats arrived at Prairie du Chien, increasing the war panic among the people.

Bird's village; but as the volunteers refused to obey, and determined to return home, he was obliged to countermand it.

The consternation of the people of the lead mines was great. Full half of them fled from the country. Shortly after, however, when Gen. Atkinson arrived with a full regiment, a considerable body of volunteers joined him from Galena, and accompanied him to the portage of Wisconsin, to fight with or receive the submission of the Winnebago's.

The Red Bird there appeared, in all the paraphernalia of an Indian chief and warrior, and surrendered himself to justice, together with his companions in the murder of Gagnier, and one of his band, who had taken an active part in the attack on the boats. They were incarcerated at Prairie du Chien. A dreadful epidemic broke out there about this time, and he died in prison. He knew that his death was certain, and did not shrink from it.

In the course of a year, the people of the lead mines increased in number and in strength and encroached upon the Winnebago lands. The Winnebago's complained in vain. The next spring, the murderers of Methode, and the other Indian prisoners, were tried, convicted, and sentenced to death. A deputation of the tribe went to Washington to solicit their pardon. President Adams granted it, on the implied condition that the tribe would cede the lands then in possession of the miners. The Winnebago's have kept their word—the land has been ceded, and Madame Gagnier has been compensated for the loss of her husband, and the mutilation of her infant. We believe that she received, after waiting two years, the magnificent sum of $2,000.*

We will close this true account of life beyond the frontier, with an anecdote which places the Winnebago character in a more amiable light than anything already related. The militia of Prairie du Chien, immediately after the affair of the boats, seized the old chief De-Kau-Ray—the same who has already been mentioned. He was told that if the Red Bird should not be given up within a certain time, he was to die in his stead. This he steadfastly believed. Finding that confinement injured his health, he requested to be permitted to range the country on his parole. The demand was granted. He was bidden to go whither he pleased during the day, but at sunset he was required to return to the fort on pain of being considered an old woman. He observed the condition religiously. At the first tap of the retreat, De-Kau-ray was sure to present himself at the gate; and this he continued to do till Gen. Atkinson set him at liberty.

*At the treaty held at Prairie du Chien with the Winnebago's, in 1829, provision was made for two sections of land to Therese Gagnier and her two children, Francois and Louise; and for the United States to pay Therese Gagnier the sum of $50 per annum for fifteen years, to be deducted from the annuity to said Indians.

AN INCIDENT OF "THE WINNEBAGO WAR."

The following incident, found in the Western Courier, published at Ravenna, Ohio, Feb. 26, 1830, was read by the secretary at a meeting of the Wisconsin Historical Society, in December, 1862:

"There is no class of human beings on earth who hold a pledge more sacred and binding, than do the North American Indians. An instance of this was witnessed during the Winnebago war of 1827, in the person of De-Kau-Ray, a celebrated chief of that Nation, who, with four other Indians of his tribe, was taken prisoner at Prairie du Chien Col. Snelling, of the 5th regiment of Infantry, who then commanded that garrison, dispatched a young Indian into the Nation, with orders to inform the other chiefs of De-Kau-Ray's band, that unless those Indians who were the perpetrators of the horrid murders of some of our citizens, were brought to the fort and given up within ten days, De-Kau-Ray and the other four Indians, who were retained as hostages, would be shot at the end of that time. The awful sentence was pronounced in the presence of De-Kau-Ray, who, thought proclaiming his own innocence of the outrages which had been committed by others of his Nation, declared that he feared not death, though it would be attended with serious consequences, inasmuch as he had two affectionate wives, and a large family of small children, who were entirely dependent on him for their support; but, if necessary, he was willing to die for the honor of his Nation.

"The young Indian had been gone several days, and no intelligence was yet received from the murderers. The dreadful day being near at hand, and De-Kay-Ray being in a bad state of health, asked permission of the colonel to go to the river to indulge in his long-accustomed habit of bathing in order to improve his health. Upon which, Col. Snelling told him if he would promise, on the honor of a chief, that he would not leave the town, he might have his liberty and enjoy all his privileges, until the day of the appointed execution. Accordingly, he first gave his hand to the colonel, thanking him for his friendly offer, then raised both his hands aloft, and in the most solemn adjuration, promised that he would not leave the bounds prescribed, and said if he had a hundred lives he would sooner lose them all than forfeit his word, or deduct from his proud Nation one particle of its boasted honor. He was then set at liberty. He was advised to flee to the wilderness and make his escape. "But no," said he, "do you think I prize life above honor? or, that I would betray confidence reposed in me, for the sake of saving my life?" he then complacently remained until nine days of the ten which he had to live had elapsed, and nothing heard from the Nation with regard to the apprehension of the murderers, his immediate death became apparent; but no alteration could be seen in the countenance of the chief. It so happened that on that day Gen. Atkinson arrived with his troops from Jefferson barracks, and the order for the execution was countermanded, and the Indians permitted to repair to their homes."

GEN. CASS ON THE WINNEBAGO OUTBREAK, 1827

In a speech, Gen. Lewis Cass, at Burlington Iowa, in June, 1855, made the following reference to the Winnebago outbreak in 1827:

"Twenty-eight years have elapsed," said the venerable statesman, "since I passed along the borders of this beautiful State. 'Time and chance happen to all men,'" says the writer of old; and time and chance have happened to me, since I first became identified with the west. In 1827 I heard that the Winnebago's had assumed an attitude of hostility toward the whites, and that great fear and anxiety prevailed among the border settlers of the northwestern frontier. I went to Green Bay, where took a canoe with twelve voyageurs and went up the Fox river and passed over the portage into the Wisconsin. We went down the Wisconsin until we met an ascending boat in the charge of Ramsay Crooks, who was long a resident of the northwest. Here we ascertained that the Winnebago's had assumed a hostile attitude, and that the settlers of Prairie du Chien were apprehensive of being suddenly attacked and massacred. After descending about seventy miles further, we came in sight of the Winnebago camp. It was situated upon a high prairie, not far from the river, and as he approached the shore he saw the women and children running across the prairie, in an opposite direction, which he knew to be a bad sign. After reaching the shore he went up to the camp. At first the Indians were sullen, particularly the young men. He talked with them awhile, and they finally consented to smoke the calumet. He afterwards learned that one of the young Indians cocked his gun, and was about to shoot him, when he was forcibly prevented by an old man, who struck down his arm. He passed down to Prairie du Chien, where he found the inhabitants in the greatest state of alarm. After organizing the militia, he had to continue his voyage to St. Louis. He stopped at Galena. There were then no white inhabitants on either bank of the Mississippi, north of the Missouri line. Arrived at St. Louis, after organizing a force under Gen. Clark and Gen. Atkinson, he ascended the Illinois in his canoe, and passed into Lake Michigan without getting out of it. The water had filled the swamps at the head of Chicago river, which enabled the voyageurs to navigate his canoe through without serious difficulty. Where Chicago now is he found two families, one of which was that of his old friend Kinzie. This was the first and last time he had been at Burlington. New countries have their disadvantages of which those who come at a later day know little. Forty years ago flour sold at $2 a barrel, and there were hundreds of acres of corn in the west that were not harvested. The means of transportation were too expensive to allow of their being carried to market."

GEN. DODGE TO GEN. ATKINSON.

GALENA, AUG. 26, 1827,

DEAR GENERAL:—Capt. Henry, the chairman of the committee of safety, will wait on you at Prairie du Chien, before your departure from that place. Capt. Henry is an intelligent gentleman, who understands well the situation of the country. The letter accompanying Gov. Cass' communication to you has excited in some measure the people in this part of the country. As the principal part of the efficient force is preparing to accompany you on your expedition up the Ouisconsin, it might have a good effect to send a small regular force to this part of the country, and in our absence they might render protection to this region.

I feel the importance of your having as many mounted men as the country can afford, to aid in punishing those insolent Winnebago's who are wishing to unite, it would seem, in common all the disaffected Indians on our borders. From information received last night, some straggling Indians have been seen on our frontier.

Your friend and obedient servant,

H. DODGE.

TO GEN. H. ATKINSON, Prairie Du Chien,

There has repeatedly, during the past dozen or fifteen years, appeared in the papers an article purporting to be An Indian's Race for Life. It stated, that soon after the Winnebago difficulties in 1827, that a Sioux Indian killed a Winnebago Indian while out hunting near the mouth of Root river; that the Winnebago's were indignant at the act, and 2,000 of them assembled at Prairie du Chien, and demanded of Col. Taylor, commanding there, the procurement and surrender of the murderer. An officer was sent to the Sioux, and demanded the murderer, who was given up; and finally was surrendered to the Winnebago's, on condition that he should have a chance for his life—giving him ten paces, to run at a given signal, and twelve Winnebago's to pursue, each armed only with a tomahawk and scalping knife—but he out ran them all and saved his life.

H. L. Dousman and B. W. Brisbois, have always declared that no such incident ever occurred there, and that there is "not one word of truth in the statement." This note is appended here that future historians of our State may understand that it is only a myth or fanciful story.

DANIEL M. PARKINSON'S RECOLLECTIONS OF
"THE WINNEBAGO WAR."

In the year 1822 considerable excitement was created in relation to the lead mines near Galena, and a number of persons went there from Sangamon county, among whom was Col. Ebenezer Brigham now of Blue Mounds, Dane Co., Wis. In 1826 the excitement and interest relative to the lead mine country became considerably increased, and in 1827, it became intense, equaling almost anything pertaining to the California gold fever. People from almost all portions of the Union inconsiderately rushed to the mining region.

With Col. William S. Hamilton, James D. Brerits and two others, I arrived at Galena on the 4th of July, 1827, and on the same day arrived also a boat from St. Peter's, which had been attacked by the Indians a short distance above Prairie du Chien, bringing on board one man killed and two men wounded. In the encounter with the Indians they killed two of them. Upon the reception of the alarming intelligence of the attack on this boat and also upon some of the inhabitants near Prairie du Chien and the reports being spread over the country, a scene of the most alarming and disorderly confusion ensued—alarm and consternation were depicted in every countenance—thousands flocking to Galena for safety, when in fact it was the most exposed and unsafe place in the whole country. All were without arms, order or control. The roads were lined in all directions with frantic and fleeing men, women and children expecting every moment to be overtaken, tomahawked and scalped by the Indians. It was said, and I presume with truth, that the encampment of fugitives at the head of Apple river on the first night of the alarm was four miles in extent and numbered 3,000 persons.

In this state of alarm, confusion and disorder it was extremely difficult to do anything; almost every man's object was to leave the country, if possible. At length a company of riflemen was raised at Galena, upon the requisition of Gov. Cass of Michigan, who arrived there on the second day after the alarm. This company was commanded by Abner Fields, of Vandalia, Ill., as captain and one Smith and William S. Hamilton as lieutenants, and was immediately put in motion for Prairie du Chien, by embarking on board the keel-boat, Maid of Feure River. On our way up the river, I acted as sergeant of the company, and we made several reconnoitering expeditions into the woods near the river, where Indian encampments were indicated by the rising of smoke. In these reconnoissance's we run the hazard of some danger, but fortunately all the Indians that we met were friendly disposed, and did not in the least sympathize with those who had made hostile demonstrations.

When we arrived at Prairie du Chien we took possession of the barracks, under the prior orders of Gov. Cass, and remained there for several days until we gave way to Col. Snelling's troops who arrived from Fort Snelling. While we remained there, a most serious difficulty occurred between Col. Snelling, of the regular army, and Capt. Fields and Lieut. Smith of our volunteers, which eventuated in Lieut. Smith sending Col. Snelling a challenge and Capt. Fields insisted upon doing so likewise, but Col. Hamilton and I at length dissuaded him from it. Col. Snelling declined accepting Lieut. Smith's challenge, and immediately sent a corporal with a file of men to arrest Mr. Scott, the bearer of Smith's communication. The volunteers refused to surrender Scott into the hands of the guard, but Col. Hamilton wrote a note to Col. Snelling stating, in effect, that Scott should immediately appear before him. Accordingly Col. Hamilton and I conducted Mr. Scott into the presence of Col. Snelling, who interrogated him as to his knowledge of the contents of Lieut. Smith's communication; and upon Mr. Scott's assuring the colonel that he was entirely ignorant of the subject-matter, he was dismissed.

Col. Snelling then addressed the volunteers in a pacific and conciliatory manner, which seemed to dispose of the matter amicably; but the colonel, nevertheless, refused to furnish us with any means of support or any mode of conveyance back to Galena—as the boat in which we came, returned there immediately after our arrival. But for the noble generosity of Mr. Lockwood, who kindly furnished us with a boat and provisions, we would have been compelled to have made our way back to Galena on foot, or the best we could without provisions. During our entire stay at the garrison, we received the kindest treatment and most liberal hospitality at the hands of Mr. Lockwood. At the time of our arrival at Prairie du Chien, the citizens had in their custody as hostages for the good conduct of their Nation, three Indians, one of whom was the well-known chief De-Kau-Ray. He disclaimed on the part of his Nation as a whole, any intention to engage in hostilities with the whites; he was, however, retained some time as a hostage before being released.

During our absence, another volunteer company was raised, commanded by Gen.

Dodge, who was constantly in the field with his mounted force, keeping in check the approach of the enemy. During his rangings, he took young Win-ne-shiek, son of the chief Win-ne-shiek, who was detained as a hostage for some time. No farther disturbances of a serious character took place that season; and in the succeeding autumn, Gen's. Atkinson and Dodge held a council or treaty with the Winnebago's. After this we had no more Indian troubles till 1832.

JAMES B. LOCKWOOD'S ACCOUNT OF
"THE WINNEBAGO WAR."

In the winter of 1825—26, the wise men at Washington took it into their heads to remove the troops from Fort Crawford to Fort Snelling, and abandon the former. This measure was then supposed to have been brought about on the representation of Col. Snelling of Fort Snelling, who disliked Prairie du Chien for difficulties he had with some of the principal inhabitants. During the winter there were confined in the guard-house at Fort Crawford two Winnebago Indians, for some of their supposed dishonest acts; but what they were charged with, I do not now recollect. At that time, as already mentioned, our mails from St. Louis, the east and south, came via Springfield to Galena, and the postmaster at Prairie du Chien sent to Galena for the mails of that place and Fort Snelling. An order would frequently arrive by steamboat countermanding a previous order for the abandonment of the fort, before the arrival of first order by mail, and this matter continued during the summer of 1826, and until October, when a positive order arrived, directing the commandant of Fort Crawford to abandon the fort, and proceed with the troops to Fort-Snelling; and if he could not procure transportation, to leave the provisions, ammunition and fort in charge of some citizen.

But a few days previous to this order, there had been an alarming report circulated, that the Winnebago's were going to attack Fort

Crawford, and the commandant set to work repairing the old fort, and making additional defenses. During this time the positive order arrived, and the precipitancy with which the fort was abandoned during the alarm was communicated to the Indians through the half-breeds residing at or visiting the place, which naturally caused the Winnebago's to believe that the troops had fled through fear of them. The commandant took with him to Fort Snelling the two Winnebago's confined in Fort Crawford, leaving behind some provisions, and all the damaged arms, with a brass swivel and a few wall pieces, in charge of John Marsh, the then sub-agent at this place.

The Winnebago's, in the fall of 1826, obtained from the traders their usual credit for goods, and went to their hunting grounds; but early in the winter a report became current among the traders that the Winnebago's had heard a rumor that the Americans and English were going to war in the spring; and hence they were holding councils to decide upon the course they should adopt, hunting barely enough to obtain what they wanted to subsist upon in the meantime.

Mr. Brisbois said to me several times during the winter, that he feared some outrages from the Winnebago's in the spring, as from all he could gather they were bent on war, which I ought to have believed, as Mr. Brisbois had been among them engaged in trade over forty years. But I thought it impossible that the Winnebago's, surrounded, as they were by Americans, and troops in the country, should for a moment seriously entertain such an idea. I supposed it a false alarm, and gave myself very little uneasiness about it; but in the spring, when they returned from their hunts, I found that they paid much worse than usual, although they were not celebrated for much punctuality or honesty in paying their debts. It was a general custom with the traders, when an Indian paid his debts in the spring pretty well, on his leaving, to let him have a little ammunition, either as a present or on credit. A Winnebago by the name of Wah-wah-peckah, had taken a credit from me, and paid me but a small part of it in the spring; and when I reproached him, he was disposed to be impudent about it; and when his party were about going, he applied to me as usual for ammunition for the summer, and insisted upon having some, but I told him if he had behaved well, and paid me his credit better, that I would have given him some, but that he had behaved so bad that I would not give him any, and he went away in a surly mood.

A man by the name of Methode, I think, a half-breed of some of the tribes of the north, had arrived here, sometime in the summer of 1826, with his wife, and, I think, five children; and, sometime in March of 1827, he went with his family, up the Yellow or Painted Rock creek, about twelve miles above the Prairie, on the Iowa side of the Mississippi river, to make sugar. The sugar season being over, and he not returning, and hearing nothing from him, a party of his friends went to look for him, and found his camp consumed, and himself, wife and children burned nearly to cinders, and she at the time enceinte. They were so crisped and cindered that it was impossible to determine whether they had been murdered and then burned, or whether their camp had accidentally caught on fire and consumed them. It was generally believed that the Winnebago's had murdered and burnt them, and Red Bird was suspected to have been concerned in it; but I am more inclined to think, that if murdered by Indians, it was done by some Fox war party searching for Sioux.

In the spring of this year, 1827, while a Chippewa chief called Hole-in-the-day, with a part of his band, visited Fort Snelling on business with the government, and while under the guns of the fort, a Sioux warrior shot one of the Chippewa's. The Sioux was arrested by the troops, and confined in the guard-house. The Chippewa's requested Col. Snelling to deliver the Sioux to them, to be dealt with after their manner; to which he agreed, provided they would give him a chance to run for his life. To this they acceded. The Sioux was sent outside of the fort, while the Chippewa's were armed with tomahawks and war clubs. He was to be allowed a fair start, and at a signal started, and one of the swiftest of the Chippewa's armed with a club and tomahawk after him, to overtake and kill him if he could, which he soon effected, as the Sioux did not run fast, and when overtaken made no resistance. The Winnebago's bearing a rumor of this, got the news among them that the two Winnebagoes confined there [for the murder of Methode and family] had been executed.

During the spring of 1827, the reports about the Winnebago's bore rather a threatening aspect; but, as I said before, situated as they were I did not believe they would commit any depredations. Under this belief, and having urgent business in New York to purchase my goods, I started for that city on the 25th of June; it then took about six months to go any return. Mine was the only purely American family at the Prairie, after the garrison left. There was Thomas McNair, who had married a French girl of the Prairie, and John Marsh, the sub-Indian agent, who had no family, and there were besides three or four Americans who had been discharged from the army. Without apprehension of danger from the Indians, I left my family, which consisted of Mrs. Lockwood, and her brother, a young man of between sixteen and seventeen years of age, who was clerk in charge of the store, and a servant girl belonging to one of the tribes of New York civilized Indians settled near Green Bay.

I started to go by way of Green bay and the lakes for New York, in a boat up the Wisconsin, and down the Fox river to Green Bay; thence in a vessel to Buffalo, and down the canal to Albany, and thence by steamboat to New York city. About 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the first day's journey up the Wisconsin, I came to an island where were sitting three Winnebago's smoking, the oldest called Wah-wah-peck-ah, who had a credit of me the fall previous and had paid but little of it in the spring; the other two were young men not known to me by name. They had some venison hanging on a pole, and we stopped to purchase it. As I stepped on shore I discovered an appearance of cold reserve unusual in Indians in such meetings, and as I went up to them I said, 'bon jour' the usual French salutation, which they generally understood; but Wah-wah-peckah said that he could not say 'bon jour' to me. Upon which I took hold of his hand and shook it, asking him why he would not say, 'bon jour' to me? He inquired what the news was. I told him I had no news. He told me that the Winnebago's confined at Fort Snelling had been killed. I assured him that it was not true, that I had seen a person lately from that fort, who told me of the death of the Sioux, but that the Winnebago's were alive. He then gave me to understand that if such was the case, it was well; but if the Winnebago's were killed, they would avenge it. I succeeded in purchasing the venison, giving them some powder in exchange, and as I was about to step on board of my boat, Wah-wah-peck-ah wanted some whisky, knowing that we always carried some for our men.

I directed one of the men to give them each a drink, which 'Wah-wah-peck-ah refused, and taking up the cup that he had by him, he showed by signs that he wanted it filled; and believing that the Indians were seeking some pretense for a quarrel as an excuse for doing mischief, I thought it most prudent under the circumstances to comply.

There were among the boats' crew some old voyageurs, well acquainted with Indian manners and customs, who, from the conduct of these Indians, became alarmed. We, however, embarked, watching the Indians, each of whom stood on the bank with his gun in his hand. As it was late in the day, we proceeded a few miles up the river and encamped for the night.

As soon as the boat left the island, the three Indians each got into his hunting canoe, and the two young Indians came up on either side opposite the bow of the boat, and continued thus up the river until we encamped while Wah-wah-peck-ah kept four or five rods behind the boat. They encamped with us, and commenced running and playing with the men on the sand beach; and after a little the young Indians proposed to go hunting deer by candlelight, and asked me to give them some candles to hunt with, which I did, with some ammunition, and they promised to return with venison in the morning. After they had gone, Wah-wah-peck-ah proposed also to go hunting, and begged some candles and ammunition, but remained in camp over night. Morning came, but the young Indians did not return, and I saw no more of them, in the morning, after Wah-wah-peck-ah had begged something more, he started, pretending to go down the river, and went as we supposed; but about an hour afterward, as we were passing on the right of the upper end of the island on which we had encamped, I saw Wah-wah-peck-ah coming up on the left. He looked very surly, and we exchanged no words, but we were all satisfied that he was seeking some good opportunity to shoot me, and from the singular conduct of the Indians, I and my men were considerably alarmed. But about 9 o'clock in the morning, meeting a band of Indians from the portage of Wisconsin, who appeared to be glad to see me, and said they were going to Prairie du Chien, my fears with those of the men were somewhat allayed. I wrote with my pencil a hasty line to my wife, which the Indians promised to deliver, but they never did, as they did not go there.

This day, the 26th of June, we proceeded up the Wisconsin without seeing any Indians until we came near Prairie du Baie, when an Indian alone in a hunting canoe, came out of some nook and approached us. He was sullen, and we could get no talk out of him. We landed on Prairie du Baie, and he stopped also; and a few moments thereafter, a canoe of Menomonee's arrived from Prairie du Chien, bringing a brief note from John Marsh, saying the Winnebago's had murdered a man of mixed French and Negro blood, named Rijeste Gagnier, and Solomon Lipcap, and for me, for God's sake, to return. I immediately got into the canoe with the Menomonee's, and directed my men to proceed to the portage, and if I did not overtake them to go on to Green Bay. I proceeded down the river with the Menomonee's, and when we had descended to the neighborhood where we had fallen in with the Indians the day before, we met Wah-wah-peck-ah coming up in his hunting canoe alone, having with him his two guns. He inquired if I was going to the Prairie. I told him I was. He then told me that the whisky at the Prairie was shut up, but did not tell me of the murders, and asked me that should he come to the Prairie whether I would let him have some whisky? I told him I certainly would if he brought some furs, not wishing then to make any explanation, or to enter into any argument with him.

About this time, we heard back of an island, and on the southern shore of the Wisconsin, the Winnebago's singing their war songs and dancing, with which I was familiar; and so well satisfied was I that Wah-wah-peck-ah was only seeking a favorable opportunity to shoot me, that if I had had a gun where he met us, I believe that I should have shot him. After talking with him the Menomonee's moved down the river, and arrived at the mouth of the Wisconsin about dark without seeing any more Winnebago's. It was so dark that the Menomonee's thought that we had better stop until morning, and we accordingly crawled into the bushes without a fire and fought mosquitoes all night, and the next morning, the 27th, proceeded to the Prairie. I went to my house and found it vacant, and went to the old village where I found my family and most of the inhabitants of the Prairie, assembled at the house of Jean Brunet, who kept a tavern. Mr. Brunet had a quantity of square timber about him, and the people proposed building breast-works with it.

I learned on my arrival at the Prairie that on the preceding day, the 26th, Red Bird, who when dressed, always wore a red coat and called himself English, went to my house with two other Indians, and entering the cellar kitchen, loaded their guns in the presence of the servant girl, and went up through the hall into Mrs. Lockwood's bedroom where she was sitting alone. The moment the Indians entered her room she believed they came to kill her, and immediately passed into and through the parlor, and crossed the hall into the store to her brother, where she found Duncan Graham, who had been in the country about forty years as a trader, and was known by all the Indians as an Englishman. He had been a captain in the British Indian department during the War of 1812, and a part of the time was commandant at Prairie du Chien. The Indians followed Mrs. Lockwood into the store, and Mr. Graham by some means induced them to leave the house.

They then proceeded to McNair's Coulee, about two miles from the village, at the lower end of Prairie du Chien, where lived Rijeste Gagnier; his wife was a mixed blood of French and Sioux extraction, with two children; and living with him was an old discharged American soldier by the name of Solomon Lipcap. The Winnebago's commenced a quarrel with Gagnier and finally shot him, I believe, in the house. Lipcap, at work hoeing in the garden near the house, they also shot. During the confusion, Mrs. Gagnier seized a gun, got out at the back window with her boy about three years old on her back, and proceeded to the village with the startling news. The cowardly Indians followed her a part of the way, but dared not attack her. On her arrival at the village a party went to the scene of murder, and found and brought away the dead, and the daughter of Mr. Gagnier, about one year old, whom the mother in her fright had forgotten. The Indians had scalped her and inflicted a severe wound in her neck, and left her for dead, and had thrown her under the bed, but she was found to be still alive. She got well, and arriving at womanhood got married, and has raised a family of children; she is yet alive and her eldest daughter was but recently married.

The people had decided not to occupy the old fort, as a report had been circulated that the Indians had said that they intended to burn it if the inhabitants should take refuge there. During the day of the 27th, the people occupied themselves in making some breast-works of the timber about Mr. Brunet's tavern getting the swivel and wall pieces from the fort, and the condemned muskets and repairing them, and concluded they would defend themselves, each commanding, none obeying, but every one giving his opinion freely.

About sunset one of the two keel-boats arrived that had a few days previously gone to Fort Snelling with supplies for the garrison, having on board a dead Indian, two dead men of the crew and four wounded. The dead and wounded of the crew were inhabitants of Prairie du Chien who had shipped on the up-bound trip. They reported that they had been attacked the evening before, about sunset, by the Winnebago Indians,* near the mouth of Bad Ax river, and the boat received about 500 shots, judging from the marks on its bow and sides. The Indians were mostly on an island on the west of the channel, near to which the boat had to pass, and the wind blowing strong from the east drifted the boat towards the shore, where the Indians were, as the steering oar had been abandoned by the steersman. During this time, two of the Indians succeeded in getting on board of the boat. One of them mounted the roof, and fired in from the fore part; but he was soon shot and fell off into the river. The other Indian took the steering oar and endeavored to steer the boat to the island. He was also shot and brought down in the boat where he fell. During all this time the Indians kept up a hot fire. The boat was fast drifting towards a sand bar near the shore, and they would all have been murdered had it not been for the brave, resolute conduct of an old soldier on board, called Saucy Jack (his surname I do not remember), who during the hottest of the fire, jumped over at the bow and pushed the boat off, and where he must have stood the boat was literally covered with ball marks, so that his escape seemed a miracle. They also reported that early the day before the attack, they were lashed to the other boat drifting, and that they had grounded on a sand bar and separated, since which time they had not seen or heard anything of the other boat, and thought probably that it had fallen into the hands of the Indians.

*Ex-Gov. Reynolds, of Illinois, in his volume of his Life and Times, thus states the immediate cause of this attack. That somewhere above Prairie du Chien on their upward trip, they stopped at a large camp of Winnebago Indians, gave them some liquor freely and got them drunk, when they forced six or seven squaws, stupefied with liquor, on board the boats, for corrupt and brutal purposes, and kept them during their voyage to Fort Snelling and on their return. When the Winnebago Indians became sober, and fully conscious of the injury done them, they mustered all their forces, amounting to several hundred and attacked the foremost of the descending boats in which their squaws were confined. But this story has since been proven to be without foundation.

This created an additional alarm among the inhabitants. The same evening my boat returned, the men becoming too much alarmed to proceed. That night sentinels were posted by the inhabitants within the breast-works, who saw, in imagination, a great many Indians prowling about in the darkness; and in the morning there was a great variety of opinion as to what was best to be done for the safety of the place, and appearances betokened a great deal of uneasiness in the minds of all classes.

On the morning of the 28th I slept rather late, owing to the fatigue of the preceding day. My brother-in-law awakened me and told me the people had got into some difficulty, and that they wished me to come out and see if I could not settle it. I went out on the gallery, and inquired what the difficulty was; and heard the various plans and projects of defense proposed by different persons. Some objected to staying in the village and protecting the property of the villagers while theirs, outside the village, was equally exposed to the pillage of the Indians. Others were for remaining and fortifying where they were, and others still urged the repairing of the old fort. As the eminence on which my house stood overlooked the most of the prairie, some were for concentrating our people there and fortifying it. After hearing these different projects, I addressed them something as follows: "As to your fortifying my house, you can do so, if it is thought best, but I do not wish you to go there to protect it; I have abandoned it, and if the Indians burn it, so be it; but there is one thing, if we intend to protect ourselves from the Indians, we must keep together, and some one must command."

Some one then nominated me as commander, but I said: "No, I would not attempt to command you, but here is Thomas McNair, who holds from the governor a commission of captain over the militia of this place and has a right to command; if you will agree to obey him implicitly, I will set the example of obedience to his orders, and will, in that case, furnish you with powder and lead as long as you want to shoot (I being the only person having those articles in the place), but unless you agree to obey McNair, I will put my family and goods into my boats and go down the river, as I will not risk myself with a mob under no control." Upon this they agreed to acknowledge Mr. McNair as commander, and I was satisfied that he would take advice upon all measures undertaken. Joseph Brisbois was lieutenant, and Jean Brunet was ensign, both duly commissioned by the governor. Capt. McNair ordered a move of all the families, goods, with the old guns, to the fort, and it was near sunset before we had all got moved there.

About that time we discovered the skiff of the other keel-boat coming around a point of an island near Yellow river, about three miles distant but we could not discover whether they were white men or Indians in the canoe, and of course it created an alarm, but in a few moments thereafter, the keel-boat hove in sight and the alarm ceased. It soon arrived, reporting that they had received a few shots in passing the places where the other boat had been attacked, but had received no injury. On this boat Joseph Snelling, son of Col. Snelling, returned to Prairie du Chien. Joseph Snelling and myself acted as supernumeraries under Capt. McNair. The government of Fort Crawford was conducted by a council of the captain and those who acted under him. It was immediately resolved to repair the old fort as well as possible for defense, and the fort and block-house were put in as good order as circumstances and materials would admit. Dirt was thrown up two or three feet high around the bottom logs of the fort, which were rotten and dry, and would easily ignite. Joseph Snelling was put in command of one of the block-houses, and Jean Brunet of the other, with a few picked men in each, who were trained to the use of the swivel and wall pieces that were found and mounted therein; and a number of barrels were placed around the quarters filled with water, with orders, in case of an attack, to cover the roof of the building with blankets, etc., and to keep them wet. All the blacksmiths were put in requisition to repair the condemned muskets found in the fort, and, mustering our force, we found of men and women about ninety that could handle a musket in case of an attack.

The next day after taking possession of the fort, J. B. Loyer, an old voyageur, was engaged to cross the Mississippi and go back through the country, now the State of Iowa, to inform Col. Snelling, commanding Fort Snelling, of our situation. For this service Loyer was promised $50 and furnished with a horse, to ride and provisions, and Duncan Graham was engaged to accompany him, for which he was to receive $20, provisions and a horse to ride; and for these payments, I became personally responsible.

Gov. Cass, who had come to Butte des Morts, on the Fox river, to hold a treaty with the Winnebago's, learned from rumor that there was dissatisfaction among them, and starting in his canoe, arrived at Prairie du Chien on the morning of the 4th of July. He ordered the company of militia into the service of the United States, and appointed me quartermaster and commissary, with the request that I would use my own funds for the supply of the department, and that he would see it refunded; and, furthermore, assumed the debt for ammunition and provisions already advanced, and also the expense of the express to Fort Snelling, and directed me to issue to the troops a keel-boat load of flour, that I previously received for to one of the agents of the contractors for Fort Snelling, who feared to go farther with it.

After these arrangements had been made, Gov. Cass proceeded in his canoe to Galena, and raised a volunteer company under the late Col. Abner Fields as captain, and assigned him to the command of Fort Crawford. Lieut. Martin Thomas, of the United States ordnance department, and then stationed at the arsenal near St. Louis, who happened to be at Galena, came up and mustered the two companies of the militia into the service of the United States; and contracted with Phineas Black, of the village of Louisiana, in Missouri, whom he found at Galena, for a quantity of pork which was sent up by the boat that brought the volunteer company. Gov. Cass proceeded from Galena to St. Louis to confer with Gen. Atkinson, then in command of Jefferson barracks and of the western military department. This resulted in Gen. Atkinson's moving up the Mississippi with the disposable force under command at Jefferson barracks. During this time Col. Snelling came down the Mississippi with two companies of the 5th regiment of United States Infantry, and assumed the command of Fort Crawford, and soon after discharged the Galena volunteer company, as they could not well be brought under military discipline. But the Prairie du Chien company was retained in service until some time in the month of August, for which service, through the fault of some one, they never received any pay.

During this time Gen. Atkinson arrived with the troops from Jefferson barracks, having on his way up dispatched a volunteer force under Gen. Dodge from Galena, to proceed by land to the portage of Wisconsin. When Gen. Atkinson, with great difficulty, owing to the low state of the water in the Wisconsin, arrived at the portage, he met old grey-headed Day-Kau-Ray, with his band, who, finding himself surrounded by the volunteers in the rear, and Gen. Atkinson's force of regulars in front, and a company of volunteers from Green Bay, concluded to disclaim any unfriendly feelings towards the United States, and disavowed any connection with the murders on the Mississippi. Gen. Atkinson, on these assurances of Day-Kau-Ray, returned, but ordered the occupation of Fort Crawford by two companies of troops. Notwithstanding these murders of our citizens and movements of troops, the wise men at Washington, with about as much judgment as they generally decide upon Indian affairs, decided that this was not an Indian war.

After the people had taken possession of the fort, and before the arrival of Gen. Cass, Indians were seen in the village, and a guard was sent out to take them and bring them to the fort. They made no resistance, but surrendered themselves and were brought to the guard house. One proved to be the famous Red Bird, who headed the party that murdered Gagnier and Lipcap; another was Wah-wah-peck-ah, the Indian I had met up the Wisconsin river, and whose conduct had so much alarmed me and my men; the other was a young Indian whose name I do not recollect. There being no charge of crime against Wah-wah-peck-ah and the young Indian; after the United States troops were stationed at Fort Crawford, they were discharged; and Red Bird was retained in the guard-house, where he died before he was tried for the murder of Gagnier and Lipcap.

AN INTERESTING EVENT OF THE WINNEBAGO WAR

On the 1st of September, 1827, Maj. William Whistler, with government troops, arrived at the portage; and, while there, an express letter arrived from Gen. Atkinson, announcing his approach, and directing him to halt and fortify himself, and await his arrival. The object of the joint expedition of Gen. Atkinson from Jefferson barracks, below St. Louis, and of Maj. Whistler, from Fort Howard, at Green Bay, was to capture those who had committed the murders at Prairie du Chien, and put a stop to any further aggression. The Winnebago's were advised that the security of their people lay in the surrender of the murderers of the Gagnier family. While Major Whistler was at the portage, he received a call in a mysterious way. An Indian came to his tent and informed him that, at about 3 o'clock the next day, "they will come in." In reply to the question, "who will come in?" he said, "Red Bird and We-Kau." After making this answer he retired by the way he came. At 3 o'clock the same day, another Indian came and took position in nearly the same place and in the same way, when to like questions he gave like answers; and at sundown a third came, confirming what the two had said, adding, that he had, to secure that object, given to the families of the murderers nearly all his property.

There was something heroic in this voluntary surrender. The giving away of property to the families of the guilty parties had nothing to do with their determination to devote themselves for the good of their people, but only to reconcile those who were about to be bereaved to the dreadful expedient. The heroism of the purpose is seen in the fact that the murders committed at Prairie du Chien were not wanton, but in retaliation for wrongs committed on this people by the whites. The parties murdered at the prairie were doubtless innocent of the wrongs and outrages of which the Indians complained; but the law of Indian retaliation does not require that he alone who commits a wrong shall suffer for it. One scalp is held due for another, no matter whose head is taken, provided it be torn from the crown of the family, or people who may have made a resort to this law a necessity.

About noon of the day following there were seen descending the mound on the portage a body of Indians. Some were mounted and some were on foot. By the aid of a glass the Americans could discern the direction to be towards their position. They bore no arms, and no one was at a loss to understand that the promise made by the three Indians was about to be fulfilled. In the course of half an hour they had approached within a short distance of the crossing of Fox river, when on a sudden singing was heard. Those who were familiar with the air said, "It is a death song." When still nearer some present who knew him said, "It is Red Bird singing his death song." The moment a halt was made, preparatory to crossing over, two scalp yells were heard. The Menomonee's and other Indians who had accompanied the troops were lying carelessly about the ground; regardless of what was going on; but when the "scalp yells" were uttered, they sprang to their feet as one man, seized their rifles, and were ready for battle. They were at no loss to know what these yells were; but they had not heard with sufficient accuracy to decide whether they indicated scalps to be taken or given, but doubtless inferred the first.

Barges were sent across to receive and an escort of military to accompany them within the lines. The white flag which had been seen in the distance was borne by Red Bird.

And now the advance of the Indians had reached half up the ascent of the bluff on which was the encampment. In the lead was Car-i-minie, a distinguished chief. Arriving on the level upon which was the encampment of the Americans, order being called, Car-i-mi-nie spoke, saying, "They are here. Like braves they have come in; treat them as braves; do not put them in irons." This address was made to Col. McKenney. The latter told him he was not the big captain. His talk must be made to Major Whistler, who would do what was right. Mr. Marsh, the sub-agent, being there, an advance was made to him, and a hope expressed that the prisoners might be turned over to him.

The military had been previously drawn out in line. The Menomonee and Wabaukie (Oneida) Indians were in groups upon their haunches, on the left flank. On the right was the band of music, a little in advance of the line. In front of the center, about ten paces distant, were the murderers. On their right and left were those who had accompanied them, forming a semi-circle; the magnificent Red Bird and the miserable looking We-Kau, little in advance of the center. All eyes were fixed on Red Bird. In height he was about six feet, straight, but without restraint. His proportions were those of most exact symmetry; and these embraced the entire man from his head to his feet.

He and We-Kau were told to sit down. At this moment the band struck up Pleyel's hymn. Everything was still. Red Bird turned his eyes toward the band. The music having ceased, he took up his pouch, and taking from it kinnikinnic and tobacco cut the latter in the palm of his hand, after the Indian fashion, then rubbing the two together, filled the bowl of his calumet, struck fire on a bit of punk with his flint and steel, lighted and smoked it. All sat except the speaker. The substance of what they said was as follows:

They were required to bring in the murderers. They had no power over any except two; the third had gone away; and these had voluntarily agreed to come in and give themselves up. As their friends they had come with them. They hoped their white brother would agree to accept the horses, of which there were perhaps twenty; the meaning of which was, to take them in commutation for the lives of their two friends. They asked kind treatment for them, and earnestly besought that they might not be put in irons, and concluded by asking for a little tobacco and something to eat.

They were answered and told in substance that they had done well thus to come in. By having done so they had turned away our guns and saved their people. They were admonished against placing themselves in a like situation in the future, and advised, when they were aggrieved, not to resort to violence, but to go to their agent who would inform the Great Father of their complaints, and he would redress their grievances ; that their friends should be treated kindly, and tried by the same laws, by which their Great Father's white children were tried; that for the present Red Bird and We-Kau should not be put in irons; that they should all have something to eat and tobacco to smoke.

Having heard this, Red Bird stood up; the commanding officer, Major Whistler, a few paces in front of the center of the line facing him. After a moment's pause and a quick survey of the troops, he spoke, saying : "I am ready." Then advancing a step or two, he paused, saying, "I do not wish to be put in irons; let me be free. I have given away my life; it is gone" (stooping and taking some dust between his thumb and finger and blowing it. away), "like that," eyeing the dust as it fell and vanished from his sight, adding, "I would not take it back, it is gone." Having thus spoken, he threw his hands behind him and marched up to Major Whistler, breast to breast. A platoon was wheeled backward from the center of the line, when, the major stepping aside, Red Bird and We-Kau marched through the line, in charge of a file of men, to a tent provided for them in the rear, where a guard was set over them. The comrades of the two captives then left the ground by the way they had come, taking with them our advice and a supply of meat, flour and tobacco.

We-Kau, the miserable looking being, the accomplice of Red Bird, was in all things the opposite of that unfortunate brave. Never were two persons so totally unlike. The one seemed prince, and as if born to command and worthy to be obeyed; the other as if he had been born to be hanged; meagre, cold, dirty in his person and dress, crooked in form like the starved wolf; gaunt, hungry and blood-thirsty; his entire appearance indicating the presence of a spirit wary, cruel and treacherous. The prisoners were committed into safe keeping at Prairie du Chien to wait their trial in the regular courts of justice for murder.

LAST ACT IN "THE WINNEBAGO WAR."

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

To all who shall see these presents, Greeting:

WHEREAS, at a court of Oyer and Terminer, held at the village of Prairie du Chien, in the month of September, A. D. 1828. Wa-ni-ga, otherwise called the Sun, and Chick-hong-sic otherwise called Little Beuffe, were convicted of the offense of murder in the second degree, and the said Chick-hong-sic, otherwise called Little Beuffe, was also convicted of another offense of murder in the second degree ; And, whereas, also it appears satisfactorily to me that the clemency of the executive may be extended to the said convicts without injury to the public;

Now, therefore, I, John Quincy Adams, President of the United States of America, in consideration of the promises, divers other good and sufficient causes me hereunto moving, have granted and do hereby grant to the said Wa-ni-ga, otherwise called the Sun, and to the said Chick-hong-sic, otherwise called Little Beuffe, my full and free pardon for the offenses aforesaid.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed to these presents. Given at the city of Washington this third day of November, A. D. 1828, and of the Independence, of the United States the fifty-third.

By the President, J. Q. ADAMS.

H. CLAY, *Secretary of State.

MRS. COASM CHERRIER (NEE GAGNIER.)†

My father was born in St. Louis; he came to Prairie du Chien about the time of the last war with England.

My mother Theresa Chalefau, was born in Prairie du Chien; her father. came to Prairie du Chien from Canada, before the last war with England..

I was born in this place (now called French Town) Aug. 15, 1826. The following spring my father moved his family to a house on what is now known as the Ackerly place, a short distance below the limits of "Lower Town the house had only one room. It was there that the murder of father and Lipcap, and the terrible mutilation of myself occurred.

I will tell the story as learned from my mother. June 10, 1827, my father visited the village of Prairie du Chien; the afternoon of that day mother noticed there were skulking Indians on the bluff east of the house, partially concealed, and being accustomed to seeing Indians almost daily, was not alarmed. Father did not return home until about noon of the next day, (June 11). He was accompanied by his half brother, Paschal Menoir, after dinner the family consisting of father, mother, Lipcap (an old man living with us) my brother Frank, three years old, myself, nearly ten months old, and Paschal Menoir (visitor), were having an after dinner chat. Young Menoir was sitting in the open window on the west side of the house, facing the door. My father was sitting on a trunk against the wall, to the right of the window, and also facing the door. My mother had returned to the work of the day, family washing. My brother Frank was amusing himself. Lipcap had gone to his work in the corn patch not very far from the house. I had crept to my father's feet and lifted myself by his clothing, and was standing with my hands on his knees. At this moment four Indians, who had reached the door unnoticed, entered the room. Mother placed four chairs and bade them be seated.; they complied, the table being as left. Mother asked them to have dinner; they replied : "We are not hungry, but thirsty." She satisfied their wants, and watching them closely, she said to father in French: "These Indians mean to do us some harm." Father made no reply. My father's gun was hanging in fastenings to a joist directly overhead; three of the Indians had guns in their hands, the fourth, a chief, whose Indian name signified "Little Sun," was seated the nearest to my father, with his side toward him. This Indian had, unknown to the family, a shorter gun concealed under his blanket, and it was held in such a position as to bring my father in range. One of the other Indians left his chair, and took down my father's gun Father instantly rose, seized and wrenched the gun from him, and stood it by the trunk, then both were seated again. My father spoke to mother, saying

"Come take this little girl." At this moment, at a signal from one of the other Indians, "Little Sun" fired his concealed gun, the bullet entering the right breast of my father, who had not changed his position. At almost the same instant another Indian shot his gun at Paschal Menoir, who was still sitting in the window, but missed him. Young Menoir, with great presence of mind, fell backward, through the window. He was undoubtedly supposed by the Indians to have been killed, and was not immediately looked after. He made his escape into the timber, which stood close up to that side of the house.

The house was filled with powder smoke my little brother was crying and calling for mother. Mother picked him up and ran out of the house. The Indians had preceded her, and leaped over the fence near the house. Mother, with Frank, made her way over the fence, and dropped directly in front of one of the Indians, who was crouching, unnoticed by her on that side. Dropping the child, she seized his gun, and with unnatural strength, wrenched it away from him, and instantly cocked it with the intention of killing him; some irresistible impulse compelled her at the moment of firing, to give an upward inclination, sufficient to carry the bullet over the Indian's head. She threw the gun after the Indians, who had started to kill Lipcap. My mother then returned to the house. I had crept under the bed. The house was partially cleared from smoke. Father was not dead, but could not speak or move, but made motions with his eyes, which she clearly understood as saying: "Make your escape." She then ran out, and through a picket fence, which divided their grounds from those of a man named Joseph Lambeire, who was eating his dinner in his cabin which he occupied alone. He had heard the shots fired, but did not know their meaning.

My mother who had not been to Prairie du Chien since they moved to the place, did not even know the way. She hurriedly told him what had occurred, and asked him to help her escape. Lambeire, whose horse was tied to a fence near by, told her to bring the horse. She did so, when he mounted and rode cowardly and rapidly away, without a word to her, who then returned to the house. Father, who still lived, again with expressive look, plainly signaled "get away." Mother then with my little brother, made her way into the timber close to the house, into which Menoir had escaped. (All this occurred in little time). While doing this, she discovered that Lipcap was being chased by the Indians, and making his way toward her, shouting, "wait for me." In her flight, she noticed a large soft maple tree which had been blown down, and that the place where it had stood was surrounded by a dense new growth of brush. She crept into this, and into the cavity made by uprooting the tree, placed Frank, and crouching low over him, remained almost breathless, until within twelve feet of her hiding place, the Indians overtook Lipcap and killed him with their knives, mutilating him and taking his scalp. My mother was not discovered.

The Indians then returned to the house, Paschal Menoir, who from his place of concealment, had kept a close watch, noticing this, took the opportunity to make his way to the village. He reached exhausted, the house of Julian Lariviere; he there found Frank Dechuquette, who mounted his horse and alarmed the people, who turned out to the rescue en masse.

My mother in the meantime, alive to the necessity of making her escape, had left her hiding place, and unnoticed by the Indians, found father's horse, and with Frank had mounted, and was searching for the road to the village, when she saw the people coming to the relief. The Indians, after killing Lipcap, made their last return to the house. I had crept from under the bed, to the door. Of the brutal treatment of myself, "Little Sun," in his testimony given at the trial of himself and the chief, "Red Bird," for these murders said, "that he first gave the child a kick on the left hip, and then with his gun barrel in his hands, struck her with the breech of the gun on the right shoulder, and with his knife struck her across the back of the neck, intending to behead her, and carry the head away with him," at this moment the other Indians outside of the house shouted, that "people are coming." he said, "I then took her scalp and with it part of the skull," he then scalped my father, down whose dying face, he said the tears were flowing, at witnessing the horrid butchery of myself.

When the people from the village reached the house, my father was dead. The Indians were gone. I was lying in a pool of my own blood, and supposed to be dead. Julian, son of Julian Lariviere, wrapped me in his handkerchief, and carried me to his father's house, where some hours later, when being washed preparatory to burial, I was first discovered to be alive, and by careful nursing and tender care, under kind Providence, was restored to health.

The motives which actuated the Indians to commit these terrible murders, are not fully understood. The family believed that an indignity received by "Little Sun," at the hands of Registe Gagnier, was the immediate cause. The facts on which this belief is based, are told by Mrs. Cherrier, as follows "In those years whenever a Catholic priest would visit Prairie du Chien, to celebrate mass, a procession would be formed by all of our Catholic people, and would march in line to the house devoted to the services of the day. Upon one of these occasions, among the lookers-on was the Winnebago chief, "Little Sun" intentionally or otherwise. He was in the line of march, and as the head of the procession reached him, refused to move. Some confusion ensued. My father leaving his place in the line, advanced to the front, and seizing the chief, threw him one side with such force as caused him to fall to the ground. Arising with a murderous look and tone, "Little Sun" said, "you have thrown me down, but when I throw you down, you will never get up again."

My first husband's name was Moreaux. He died in 1855. By that marriage we had ten children, seven of whom are now [1884] living. I was married to Mr. Cherrier, March 1, 1862. We have had three children—Magdalene, born Dec. 6, 1863; Felix, born Oct. 7, 1865; and Louisa, born Feb. 29, 1868. The last named died in infancy.

My mother married again in 1831. Her second husband's name was St. Germain. They had two children—David and Hattie. My mother died in 1836 with the small-pox. My step-father died in January, 1882. Pascal Menoir died in Prairie du Chien, in 1882.

THE WINNEBAGO EXODUS.

In 1829 a large part of the territory of the Winnebago's, southwest Wisconsin, lying between Sugar river and the Mississippi, and extending to the Wisconsin (including, of course, a great part of what is now Green county), was sold to the general government. In 1832 all the residue of the Winnebago territory south and east of the Wisconsin and Fox rivers of Green bay, was disposed of to the United States, by which sale they relinquished their right to the present county of Green east of Sugar river.

Finally, in the brief language of the treaty between this tribe (which has become unsettled and wasteful) and the United States, of the 1st of November, 1837, "the Winnebago Nation of Indians ceded to the general government "all their lands east of the Mississippi." Not an acre was reserved. And the Indians agreed that, within eight months from that date, they would move west of "the great river." This arrangement, however, was not carried out fully; although all, save a few stragglers, left what is now Green county within the time stipulated. It ended forever the occupation of this immediate region by the Indians. In 1842 there were only 756 at Turkey River, Iowa, their new home, with as many in Wisconsin, and smaller bands elsewhere. All had become lawless and roving. Some removed in 1848; while a party to the number of over 800 left the State as late as 1873. The present home of the tribe is in Nebraska, where they have a reservation north of and adjacent to the Omaha's, containing over 100,000 acres. however, since their first removal beyond the Mississippi, they have several times changed their place of abode. The period of Winnebago occupancy of Green county and the region of country contiguous thereto, properly began about the commencement of the present century, and ended, virtually, in 1838. There were two Winnebago villages within the present limits of Green county, when the first white men began to "mine" at the Sugar river diggings. These were Spotted Arm's village and White Breast's village. The first named was about eight miles north of the diggings just named, and the other between twelve and fifteen miles south. This exact location was afterwards determined by the United States surveyors.* The number of houses in each did not exceed ten.†

Within the last two years steps have been taken toward paying such of the Winnebago's, in Wisconsin, as might come forward to be enrolled, at least a portion of the money due to them under the act of Jan. 18, 1881. It has been found by this enrollment that the whole number of Winnebago's in Wisconsin at this time (1884) is about 1,200; while those in Nebraska number about 1,400; so that the entire Nation now consists of about 2,600 souls.

Concerning the removal of the Winnebago's, John H. Fonda says: During the year 1848, just previous to the adoption of the State Constitution, the Winnebago Indians were scattered through the country along the Wisconsin and Fox rivers, through the Kickapoo timbers, and the Lemonweir valley. Orders came from the sub-Indian agent, J. E. Fletcher, to collect and remove them to their reservation, near Fort Atkinson, Iowa.

In 1848, when orders were received at Fort Crawford to remove the Winnebago's, several attempts were made to do so, but with poor success. Early in the same year I received the following official letter:

OFFICE SUB-INDIAN AGENT,
TURKEY RIVER, JAN. 4, 1848.

SIR:—In answer to your inquiry respecting the disposition to be made of the Winnebago Indians who may be found wandering about through the country, I have to say that I wish you to arrest them, cause them to be securely guarded, and report them to me as early as may be practicable.

Very respectfully your obedient servant,

J. E. FLETCHER.

To Lieut. — — —, Indian Agent.
Commanding Ft. Crawford, W. T.

*See Surveyors' Notes, in Chap. VI.

†Consult Beouchard's Reminiscence, in Chap. VIII.

Upon receipt of the above I made all necessary preparation, and started with fifty men to collect the Indians. This attempt was quite successful, and several hundred were arrested and sent to Fort Atkinson, Iowa. It may appear strange to some persons that such a handful of men could take many hundred Indians prisoners, and guard them day and night as we traveled through a wild, unsettled country; but it was done, and I have a list of names of those men who accompanied me on that expedition. My journal, kept during the time we were hunting the Indians, presents numerous interesting items, only one or two of which I will relate.

In taking the Indians, great caution was necessary to enable us to approach them. When the scouts reported that Indians had been discovered, four or five of the men would start on ahead, enter the Winnebago camp, collect all the guns and take off the locks before the Indians were aware of their intention. Frequently a hunting party would come in while the men were un-locking the guns, and make a demonstration of resistance, by which time our entire party would arrive, and prevail on them to submit to the same treatment, telling them if they came along with us quietly no harm would be offered them. On the 10th of May we encamped in a valley near the Baraboo, and three days after were on Dell creek. Here the scouting party captured a Winnebago Indian, who told me his part of the tribe were encamped at Seven Mile creek. I sent eleven men to the camp, which was very large and comprised many lodges. When the main body had come up to the Indian camp, we found the men had succeeded in getting all the guns but one, which belonged to a young brave who refused to give it up. Fearing he might do mischief, the gun was taken from him. It was a fine rifle, of which he was proud; but in spite of his remonstrance, the lock was taken off and put in a bag with others. When the piece was rendered unserviceable, they handed it back to the young Indian. He looked at it a moment, and then grasping the barrel he raised it above his head, and brought the stock down with such force against the trunk of a young sapling as to break it to splinters, and threw the barrel many rods from him. His sister, an Indian girl about seventeen years old, picked up the barrel and handed it to him. The brother bent it against the tree and then hurled it over the bank into the creek. The addition of the Indians put us on short allowance, and I was obliged to send one of the wagons back to Baraboo for provisions and grain. Just before making camp on main ridge the 15th of May, my horse was bitten on the nose by a rattlesnake. The horse's head was soon swollen to twice its natural size, and I thought him as good as dead, when an old Frenchman offered to make the horse well by the next morning. I turned the horse over to his care, and sure enough, the morning following the swelling had all disappeared, and the horse was as well as ever. I asked what he had put on to effect the sudden cure, he said he did not apply anything, but one of the men told me that he cured the horse by looking at and talking to it. This was the same man who cured one, Theo. Warner, now [1858] living in Prairie du Chien, when he was bitten by a rattlesnake. his name was Limmery, and a strange man who was; his eyes were the smallest I have ever seen in the head of any human being, with a piercing expression that once seen could never be forgotten. He would never allow a snake to be killed if he could help it, and could take up the most venomous snake with impunity. I saw him take up a large moccasin snake while we were in the Kickapoo bottoms, and it never offered to bite him, while it would strike fiercely at any other person who approached it. I could only attribute the strange power of this man to some mesmeric influence.

We were fortunate enough to bring all the Indians to Prairie du Chien without accident, where they were delivered to a body of regulars from Fort Atkinson, who moved them to their reservation. That was the last of the Winnebago's in Wisconsin as a tribe. There are now a few stragglers loitering near the old hunting grounds, in the Kickapoo and Wisconsin bottom lands, but altogether they no not exceed a hundred souls.

THE WINNEBAGO'S IN 1816.

In 1816 the Menomonee's inhabited the country about Green bay, and their women occasionally married Winnebago's, but not often. The Menomonee's were a quiet and peaceful race, well disposed and friendly to the whites. To-mah, the acting chief of the Nation, was well spoken of by all the traders who knew him.

The principal villages of the Winnebago's were at the upper and lower end of the lake, of that name, with an occasional lodge along the Fox river. At the season that traders generally passed the Portage of Wisconsin, they would find old grey headed Day-Kau-Ray at the Portage with his band. Their village was a short distance from theirs up the Wisconsin, and the Winnebago's had villages up the Baraboo river, and several small ones along down the Wisconsin to near its mouth and up the Mississippi. They were estimated at that time by the traders best acquainted with them to be about 900 warriors strong. Of the Day-Kau-Rays, there were four or five brothers, who were all influential men in the Nation. One sister had a family of children by a trader named Lecuyer, who had married her after the Indian manner. Tradition says that their father was a French trader, who, during the time the French had possession of the country, married a Winnebago woman, the daughter of the principal chief of the Nation, by whom he had these sons and daughters; that at the time the country was taken possession of by the English, he abandoned them, and they were raised among tine Indians, and being the descendants of a chief on the mother's side, when arrived at manhood they assumed the dignity of their rank by inheritance. They were generally good Indians, and frequently urged their claims to the friendship of the whites by saying that they were themselves half white.

THE WINNEBAGO'S IN 1818.

The locations of the different tribes of Indians in the vicinity of Crawford county in 1818, including also the homes of the Winnebago's, is clearly pointed out in the narrative of Edward Tanner published in the Detroit Gazette, of January 8 and 15, 1819.

"The first tribe of Indians after leaving St. Louis is the Ojibwayes [Iowa's]. This tribe live about 100 miles from the west side of the Mississippi, on the Menomonee, and have about 400 warriors. The next tribe are the Sauk's, who live on the Mississippi, and about 400 miles above St. Louis. They emigrated from the Oisconsin [Wisconsin] about thirty-five years ago. Their military strength is about 800 warriors, exclusive of old men and boys, and are divided into two divisions of 400 men. Each division is commanded by a war chief. The first are those who have been most distinguished for deeds of valor, and the second the ordinary warriors. They have also two village chiefs who appear to preside over the civil concerns of the Nation. The next tribe is the Fox Indians. This tribe have a few lodges on the east side of the Mississippi near Fort Armstrong and about four miles from the Sank village. Thirty miles above this, at the mine De Bake [Dubuque], on the west side, they have another village, and another on Turkey river, thirty miles below Prairie du Chien. Their whole military strength is about 400 warriors. They are at this time in a state of war with the Sioux; and as the Sauk's are in strict amity with the Fox Indians, and have the influence and control of them, they are also drawn into the war. This war was in consequence of depredations committed by the Fox Indians on the Sioux.

"Prairie du Chien, on which the village of that name stands, is a handsome plain, about half a mile wide from the bank of the river to the bluff or commencement of the rising ground, and out of danger from inundations. In consequence of the serpentine course of the river, the plain widens above and below the village. The soil is a black sand about fifteen inches deep, appearing to be very productive. The foundation is gravelly, containing amber stones susceptible of a handsome polish. Timber is scarce. The upland in the vicinity is very broken, poor and nearly barren. In the settlement are about 1,500 inhabitants, exclusive of the military, who are principally Creoles. As a place of business, it now appears on the decline.

"The river Ouisconsin [Wisconsin] is about half a mile wide—common depth, one to four feet—no falls, but generally a brisk current. The channel is subject to change, from the numerous bars of sand which lie in it, and frequently alter their position. In the river are numerous islands, on which grow the principal timber of the country. The banks are generally low and sandy—some plains lined with the common granite stone. The bordering country is very broken, sandy and barren. In the interior the same description will answer. Barren, broken and destitute of vegetation, few places can be found that will admit of settlements. The 'Winnebago Indians inhabit the country bordering on the tributary streams of both sides of the river. They appear to go abroad for their game, and have no conveniences for dwelling, except a kind of lodge which they carry with them wherever they go. their territory extends from the Mississippi to the vicinity of Green bay, and the number of their warriors is 700."

AN INDIAN SCARE.

In 1846 the citizens living contiguous to the Wisconsin river were treated to a genuine Indian scare, and as the Winnebago's were the supposed enemies, an account in this connection is properly given of the event.

In the winter of 1844—5, and while the Legislature of the Territory was in session at Madison, the capital, a rumor that an Indian war had broken out, came to the ears of the legislators with a thousand fearful forebodings, and producing intense excitement.

At this time the militia laws had all been repealed, probably with a view to counteract the supposed influence of Gov. Doty, and the capital he might have made by the organization of the militia and the appointment of the officers from among his friends, the majority of the Legislature being opposed to Doty. At this juncture, however, a change in the administration of the general government had changed governors, and Gen. Dodge was again at the helm of the Territory. But the law which abolished the militia service with a view to hamper and trammel Doty, was now, in a time of need, found to trammel and to hamper Dodge, for though great fear was excited, that plunder and murder would be, or were actually being committed by the Indians, the governor's hands were tied by the law, which he had himself approved. The representations of the Indian disturbances made to the governor he communicated to the Assembly

The emergency of the case was such as to call the two houses together at an evening session, to receive the governor's message on the subject, and to devise ways and means for the public defense. And while one was looking at another, at a loss to know what to do, a member penned and offered a bill to repeal the act by which the militia organization had been abolished, and to restore the former laws upon the subject. In offering the bill which contained only a few lines, he moved a suspension of the rules, so that the bill passed at once, and was sent to the council; and by the same process, it was passed there, and in about half an hour from the time it was first offered, the governor had approved of it, and the whole militia of the Territory was organized, officers and all, and measures were taken to call out a portion of it, to chastise the supposed marauders, when a second communication to the governor showed that there was no occasion for it. The first report had grown out of exaggerated statements of some white hunters, who had come in contact with some Indians in the same pursuit, and who probably took some game which the whites would have been glad to have taken; and possibly some pigs had been taken on the credit of the Indians, but this was never proven against them.

By reference to the legislative journals, it appears that this matter happened on the last evening, Feb. 3, 1846. The governor communicated the proceedings of a meeting of the citizens of Muscoda, on the Wisconsin river, in Grant county, dated Sunday night, Feb. 1, 1846, stating as follows: "The citizens of this prairie and surrounding country, having been for the last several months annoyed and harassed by the depredations of the Winnebago Indians, and submitted to their bullying and insults, have at length been forced to the dernier resort; to take up arms for our protection. This evening a skirmish took place between the Indians and the citizens, in which four of the former were severely, if not mortally, wounded; and from the known character of the Indians, we may naturally expect more serious consequences to ensue. A true and correct statement of the occurrences of the day is substantially as follows: A number of the Indians came down the north side of the Wisconsin river to Capt. Smith's, and stole his canoe. He discovered them and called to them to bring it back, which they refused to do. The captain, with several other men, came over to this shore, found the Indians who took his boat, and chastised one or two of them with a stick, and in the melee one of his men was severely hurt with a club in the hands of one of the Indians. The Indians then ran, and the citizens, a number of whom had by this time collected, followed them a little way and returned. In a short time the Indians came back also. All the citizens having by this time assembled, Capt. James B. Estes and Booth advanced towards them, unarmed, and in a peaceable manner, making friendly manifestations, all of which time the Indians threatened, by drawing their knives, throwing off, their blankets, waving their guns in the air, and pointing them towards the whites. Finding it impossible to pacify or appease them they separated, and in a moment they fired upon the citizens; the next moment their fire was returned, and four of them fell. They then add, that the Indians have sent their runners to collect their scattered bands, and the whites have sent for aid; that they want the governor's assistance, and are determined to kill or drive every Indian on the Wisconsin over the Mississippi; have upwards of forty men under arms, and have chosen James B. Estes for captain."

Gov. Dodge recommended the adoption of a memorial to the secretary of war, asking for a corps of dragoons to protect the frontier settlements. "In the course of half an hour," says the Madison Argus of that period, "resolutions were adopted to that effect, and the militia law of the Territory revived;" and on the adjournment of the Legislature, they set out immediately for the scene of disturbance, but the excitement had died away and no more trouble was apprehended.

TREATIES WITH THE SAC AND FOX INDIANS AND THE WINNEBAGO'S.

Twelve treaties were held at different times between the United States and the Sac and Fox Indians and the Winnebago's, affecting, immediately or remotely, the territory now included within the limits of Crawford county as follows:

1. A treaty was held at St. Louis Nov, 3, 1804, between the Sacs and Foxes and the United States. William Henry Harrison was acting commissioner on the part of the government. By the provisions of the treaty, the chiefs and head men of the united tribes ceded to the United States a large tract on both sides of the Mississippi, extending on the east from the mouth of the Illinois to the head of that river, and thence to the Wisconsin, and including on the west considerable portions of Iowa and Missouri, from the mouth of the Gasconade northward. In what is now the State of Wisconsin, this grant embraced the whole of the present counties of Grant and Lafayette and a large portion of Iowa and Green counties. The Lead Region was included in this purchase. In consideration of this cession, the general government agreed to protect the tribes in the quiet enjoyment of their land, against its own citizens and all others who should intrude on them. The tribes permitted a fort to be built on the upper side of the Wisconsin river near its mouth, and granted a tract of land two miles square adjoining the same. The government agreed to give them an annuity of $1,000 per annum. The validity of this treaty was denied by one band of Sac Indians, and this cession of land became, twenty-eight years after, the alleged cause of the Black Hawk War.

2. Another treaty was held at Portage des Sioux, now a village in St. Charles Co., Mo., on the Mississippi river, Sept. 13, 1815, with certain chiefs of that portion of the Sac Nation then residing in Missouri, who, they said, were compelled since the commencement of the late war, to separate them selves from the rest of their Nation. They gave their assent to the treaty made at St. Louis in 1804, and promised to remain separate from the Sacs of Rock river, and to give them no aid or assistance, until peace should be concluded between the United states and the Foxes of Rock river.

3. On the 14th of September a treaty was made with the chiefs of the Fox tribe, at the same place. They agreed that all prisoners in their bands should be delivered up to the government. They assented to, recognized, re-established and confirmed the treaty of 1804 to the full extent of their interest in the same.

4. A treaty was held at St. Louis, May 13, 1816, with the Sacs of Rock river, who affirmed the treaty of 1804, and agreed to deliver up all he property stolen or plundered, and in failure to do so, to forfeit all title to their annuities. To this treaty Black Hawk's name appears with theirs. That chief afterward affirmed that though he himself had "touched the quill" to this treaty, he knew not what he was signing, and that he was therein deceived by the agent and others, who did not correctly explain the nature of the grant; and in reference to the treaty of St. Louis in 1804, and at Portage des Sioux in 1815, he said he did not consider the same valid or binding on him or his tribe, inasmuch as in the terms of those treaties, territory was described which the Indians never intended to sell, and the treaty of 1804, particularly, was made by parties who had neither authority in the Nation nor power to dispose of its lands. Whether this was a true statement of the case or otherwise, it is quite certain that the grant of lands referred to was often confirmed by his Nation, and was deemed conclusive and binding by the government. The latter acted in good faith to the tribes, as well as to the settlers, in the disposition of the lands.

5. A treaty of peace and friendship was made at St. Louis, June 3, 1816, between the chiefs and warriors of that part of the Winnebago's residing on the Wisconsin river. In this treaty the tribe state that they have separated themselves from the rest of their Nation; that they, for themselves and those they represent, confirm to the United States all and every cession of land heretofore made by their Nation, and every contract and agreement, as far as their interest extended.

6. On the 19th of August, 1825, at Prairie du Chien, a treaty was made with the Sioux, Chippewa's, Sacs and Foxes, Winnebago's, Ottawa's and Pottawattamie, by which the boundary between the two first Nations was agreed upon; also between the Chippewa's, Winnebago's and other tribes.

7. Another treaty was held Aug. 5, 1826, at Fond du Lac of Lake Superior, a small settlement on the St. Louis river, in Itasca Co., Minn., with the same tribes, by which the previous treaty was confirmed in respect to boundaries, and those of the Chippewa's was defined, as a portion of the same was not completed at the former treaty.

8. A treaty was made and concluded Aug. 1, 1827, at Butte des Morts, between the United States and the Chippewa, Menomonee and Winnebago tribes, in which the boundaries of their tribes were defined; no cession of lands was made.

9. A treaty was made at Green Bay, Aug. 25, 1828, with the Winnebago's, Pottawattamie and other tribes. This treaty was made to remove the difficulties which had arisen in consequence of the occupation by white men of that portion of the mining country in the southwestern part of Wisconsin which had not been ceded to the United States. A provisional boundary was provided, and privileges accorded the government to freely occupy their territory until a treaty should be made for the cession of the same. This treaty was simply to define the rights of the Indians, and to give the United States the right of occupation.

10. Two treaties were made at Prairie du Chien on the 29th of July, 1829, and Aug. 1, 1829. At the first date, with the Chippewa's, Ottawa's and Pottawattamie, by which these Nations ceded all their lands which they claimed in the northwestern part of Illinois; and at the latter date with the Winnebago's, by which that Nation ceded and relinquished all their right, title and claim to all their lands south of the Wisconsin river, thus confirming the purchase of the lead-mine region. Certain grants were made to individuals, which grants were not to be leased or sold by the grantees.

By this important treaty, about 8,000,000 acres of land were added to the public domain. The three tracts ceded, and forming one whole, extended from the upper end of Rock river to the mouth of the Wisconsin, from latitude 41 degrees 30 minutes to latitude 43 degrees 15 minutes on the Mississippi. Following the meanderings of the river, it was about 240 miles from west to east, extending along the Wisconsin and Fox rivers, affording a passage across the country from the Mississippi to Lake Michigan.

11. At the conclusion of the Black Hawk War, in 1832, for the purpose of clearing up the Indian title of the Winnebago Nation in the country, a treaty was made and concluded at Fort Armstrong, Sept. 15, 1832. All the territory claimed by this Nation lying south and east of the Wisconsin and Fox rivers of Green bay, was ceded to the United States, and no band or party of Winnebago's was allowed to reside, plant, fish or hunt on these grounds, after June 1, 1833, or on any part of the country therein ceded.

12. The Winnebago Nation, by the chiefs and delegates, held a treaty with the government at Washington, Nov. 1, 1837. That Nation ceded all their lands east of the Mississippi, and obligated themselves to remove, within eight months after the ratification of the treaty, to certain lands west of the Mississippi which were conveyed to them by the treaty of Sept. 21, 1832.

THE INDIAN TREATIES OF 1829.

[BY CALEB ATWATER.]

Galena stands on the land we afterwards purchased of the Indians, and is the largest town in Illinois. When we arrived there it had been settled about three years. It contained several taverns, a considerable number of stores, about a dozen lawyers, and four or five physicians, with little to do, as the country is healthy. There were three religious congregations in the place—Methodists, Roman Catholics and Presbyterians. The town is built on the side hill, in the form of a crescent, on the north side of Fever river, and contains, perhaps, 1,000 inhabitants. It is a seat of justice of Jo Daviess Co., Ill., and is situated in latitude about 42 degrees 30 minutes north. It contained at all times very large quantities of lead, brought here either as rent to the government or for sale to the merchants. The superintendent of the mines and his assistant, Major Campbell, live here. The latter gentleman and his amiable and interesting lady had been with us on our passage from St. Louis, and they were happy to find themselves at the end of as disagreeable a journey as was ever made on these waters.

Numerous groceries appeared in the town, and two billiard tables were occupied by persons who wished to amuse themselves at billiards.

Mr. James Barnes, formerly of Chillicothe, Ohio, kept an excellent boarding house, and I found many old acquaintances in the town, enjoying the best of health, and they appeared cheerful and happy.

Here we learned that a large body of Indians had already been assembled at Prairie du Chien for some time, and were in readiness to meet us. Knowing the necessity of supplying them with food, that ours would not reach us for some time yet, and knowing this to be the last opportunity we should find to purchase any food, we purchased 500 bushels of corn, and loading all we could convey, we left this beautiful town on the next day, and departed for our final destination, where we arrived about the middle of July, 1829.

As soon as we were discovered by our red friends, a few miles below the fort, opposite to their encampment, they fired into the air about 1,500 rifles, to honor us. Our powder had become wet, and, to our extreme mortification and regret, we could not answer them by our cannon. Having fired their arms, some ran on foot, some rode on their small horses furiously along over the prairie to meet us where we landed. Amidst the motley group of thousands, of all ages, sexes, classes of society, colors and conditions of men, women and children, who met us on the wharf—Nawkaw and Hoochopekah, with their families, eagerly seized my hand, and I was happy, indeed, to meet them here. During twenty years I had seen them several times, and they recognized me in a moment among the crowd, and assured me of their friendship and good wishes. These chiefs of the Winnebago's and their families pressed around me, and continued close by me until we reached the tavern where we went. There we entered into a long conversation, and they introduced me to their red friends. I assured them of my ardent friendship, and that they and their people should be dealt with not only justly but liberally; that the President, their great father, was their friend, a warrior like them, and never would do them any injury; that I wished them all to remember what I now told them, and when we finally parted, if my solemn promises thus voluntarily made to them had not been kept to the very letter, I wished them to publicly tell me so. Shaking me heartily by the hand, and assuring me of their friendship, they then appealed to Col. Menard, who heartily agreed with me in assuring them of our good intentions towards them.

Dr. Wolcott, the agent for the Chippewa's, Ottawa's and Pottawatomie, here met us, and he had been at incredible pains to get his Indians here, where they had been for nearly a month, perhaps. Mr. Kinzey, the sub-agent of the Winnebago's, whose sub-agency is located at Fort Winnebago, had also come and with him all the principal persons of that Nation residing in that direction.

All the Indians with whom we were sent to treat were represented on the ground, and all that was wanting to begin our councils we urged forward with all the energy that the officers of the government and their numerous friends could muster. The next day, in company with Gen. Street, the agent of the Winnebago's, resident here, several sub-agents and interpreters, I met the principal men of the Winnebago's, and we impressed upon them the necessity of keeping their young men under subjection, and arranged with them the outlines of the manner in which our business should be conducted. The talk was a long one and occupied the afternoon. Gen. Street was very zealous in the service of the government. Gen. McNeil and his officers at the fort erected a council shade near the fort, and in about three days we were ready to hold a public council, when Dr. Wolcott's Indians informed me that they could not meet in public council until an Indian was buried, and inquired of me if I objected to the burial, to which I replied that I could not object to the burial, certainly. On the next day, to my regret, I learned they would not assemble in council until the Indian was buried, and again inquired whether I was willing to have the person buried, to which question I replied in the affirmative, when I was informed that the relatives of the deceased would not consent to the burial of the murdered person until they had received a horse, as the compensation for his death. Understanding the difficulty at last, the commissioners gave the horse, the deceased was buried and the Indians agreed to meet in council next day.

I took some pains to get the murderer and the relatives of the deceased together in order to have a perfect reconciliation between them. They shook hands very cordially in appearance, but the relatives of the deceased person informed me privately afterwards that, as soon as the murderer got home with his horse and goods, they would kill him and take his property, which he could better keep than they could until then. If I am correctly informed they did as they assured me they would after their arrival in their own country. So that compounding for the murder only procrastinated for a time the punishment of the crime.

When everything was in readiness for the opening of the council, the Indians of all the tribes and Nations on the treaty ground attended, and requested to have translated to them, severally, what we said to each tribe, which being assented to on our part, the Winnebago's, the Chippewa's, Ottawa's, Pottawattamie, Sioux, Sauk's, Foxes and Menomonee's, half-breeds, the officers from the fort, the Indian agents, subagents, interpreters and a great concourse of strangers from every city in the Union; and even from Liverpool, London and Paris, were in attendance. The commissioners sat on a raised bench facing the Indian chiefs; on each side of them stood the officers of the army in full dress, while the soldiers, in their best attire, appeared in bright array on the sides of the council shade. The ladies belonging to the officers' families, and the best families in the Prairie, were seated directly behind the commissioners, where they could see all that passed and hear all that was said. Behind the principal Indian chiefs sat the common people—first the men, then the women and children, to the number of thousands, who listened in breathless and death-like silence to every word that was uttered. The spectacle was grand and morally sublime in the highest degree to the Nations of red men who were present, and when our proposition to sell all their country to their Father had been delivered to them, they requested an exact copy of it in writing; the request was instantly complied with and the council broke up. The next day we addressed the Winnebago's, as we had the Chippewa's, etc., the day before, and at their request gave them a copy of our speech.

After counseling among themselves, the Chippewa's, etc., answered favorably as to a sale, though they would do nothing yet until they had fixed on their terms.

The Winnebago's appeared in council and delivered many speeches to us. They demanded the $20,000 worth of goods. "Wipe out your debt," was their reply, "before you run in debt again to us."

Our goods, owing to the low stage of the water, had not arrived yet, and the Indians feared we did not intend to fulfill Gov. Cass' agreement of the year before. When our goods did arrive and they saw them they then changed their tone a little; but in the meantime, great uneasiness existed, and I was often seriously advised by Nawkaw and other friends to go into the fort, as Gen. McNeil had done. Col. Menard's ill health had compelled him to leave the ground and go to Gen. Street's, five miles (the general calls it three) from the council house. Unless we left the ground, we were told by the Winnebago's, that they "would use a little switch upon us." In plain English, they would assassinate the whole of us out of the fort. Two hundred warriors under Keokuk and Morgan, of Sauk's and Foxes, arrived and began their war dance for the United States, and they brought word that thirty steamboats with cannon and United States troops, and 400 warriors of their own, were near at hand. the Winnebago's were silenced by this intelligence, and by demonstrations, not misunderstood by them.

When Keokuk arrived, he brought two deserters from the garrison here, whom he had made prisoners on his way up the river. Quasquawina and his son-in-law, Tia-na came with Keokuk. It was a season of great joy with me, who placed more reliance on these friendly warriors than on all our forces. Good as our officers were, our soldiers of the army were too dissipated and worthless to be relied on one moment. Taking Keokuk aside and alone, I told him in plain English all I wanted of him, what I would do for him and what I expected from him and his good officers. He replied in good English: "I understand you sir, perfectly, and it shall all be done." It was all done faithfully, and he turned the tide in our favor.

The goods arrived and also our provisions; Col. Menard's and Gen. McNeil's health were restored and they appeared again at the council house and everything wore a new aspect. They approved of all I had done in their temporary absence.

On the 29th of July, 1829, we concluded our treaty with the Chippewa's, Ottawa's and Pottawattamie,

On the 1st day of August a treaty was concluded with the Winnebago's.

So the treaties were executed at last, and about 3,000,000 acres of land added to our domain, purchased from the Indians. Taking the three tracts, ceded, and forming one whole, it extends from the upper end of Rock Island to the mouth of the Wisconsin; from latitude 41 degrees, 30 minutes, to latitude 48 degrees, 15 minutes, on the Mississippi. Following the meanderings of the river, it is called 240 miles from south to north. It extends along the Wisconsin and Fox rivers, from west to east, so as to give us a passage across the country from the Mississippi to Lake Michigan. The south part of the purchase extends from Rock Island to Lake Michigan south of the Wisconsin, the Indians now own only reservations where they live, which, as soon as the white people settle on all the ceded lands, will be sold to us, and the Indians will retire above the Wisconsin, or cross the Mississippi, where the bear, the beaver, the deer and the bison invite them. The United States now owns all the country on the east side of the Mississippi, from the Gulf of Mexico to the mouth of the Wisconsin.

When I have crossed Rock river, after having passed over the interior of the ceded country, I will describe it more particularly.

It remains for me to make a few remarks upon the country along the Mississippi from Fort Edwards upward, and briefly describe Prairie du Chien.

Ascending the Mississippi, the country appeared to rise up out of the river at Fort Edwards, and the hills assume a greater elevation still, at Dubuque's mine and tomb not far from Galena. From thence upwards, the bottom lands are narrow, the river turns towards the northwest and becomes very crooked, bounded by high hills. Cassville, thirty miles below Prairie du Chien, stands on a narrow bottom, where an opening into the mineral country, in the direction of Mineral Point, presents itself. This easy passage down to the river has located a town here of a few houses, consisting of a tavern, a storehouse for the lead, belonging to the United States; and here a government sub-agent to collect and receive the government's share of lead resides, Major Beal. Opposite the mouth of the Wisconsin stands Pike's hill, lofty and abrupt, and just above this place, on the eastern bank of the river, begins the low prairie ground on which Fort Crawford and the village of Prairie du Chien stand. The town begins to show itself three miles above the Wisconsin, and extends upwards about nine miles, where it ends. The river is full of islands, and when at its highest altitude in a freshet is three miles in width, from hill to hill. Originally settled by the French, it was once a place of some importance, as the remains of old cellars and chimneys show. That importance is no more, and probably never will be again. Overflowed by high waters, and but little good land near it, without water-power, I see little inducement to build up a town here. On the north side of the Wisconsin there is no land on which a town can be located near the Wisconsin, and the south side is preferable for it, where one will, one day, rise up. The town, though, is a seat of justice for a county of Michigan, and perhaps thirty families, besides those belonging to the garrison, reside here. No Indians reside near here, and there is no sort of need of nor propriety in having an agency, etc., here for the Winnebago's, because Fort Winnebago is the proper place for the agency.

Gen. Street, the agent and near relative of Mr. Barry the postmaster general, is the present agent, and his residence, I consider to be about five miles above the fort, though I am aware that Gen. Street's estimated distance is only three miles.

The water found by digging in this prairie is not always good, and that in our well was the worst I ever tasted, operating upon the bowels like glauber salts, and I suffered excessively from using it. Even the food cooked in it affected me seriously. The well in the fort is better, and some persons obtain water from springs in the river when it is low. The river covers all the town and where the fort is in high water. The Mississippi rising late in the season, and subsiding in the summer solstice, this place must be sickly in summer every year, when a freshet takes such a time to appear. In 1829 there was no such rise in the river, of any amount, and the place was healthy.

The only Indians living on this river below this place and near it, are the Sauk's and Foxes. The principal town of the former, on the east side of the Mississippi, is situated on the north side of Rock river, near its mouth, and in sight of the Mississippi. Not many years ago this town contained, it is said, 4,000 or 5,000 inhabitants. They have sold all the country east of the river Mississippi, and are withdrawing from it to a new town some ten miles west of the old town, and about the same distance from Rock Island.

The principal town of the Foxes is on the brink of the river near Du Buque's mine, and in sight of his tomb, which is erected on a high hill, where the cross on his grave can be seen from the river to a considerable distance from it. Du Buque was an Indian trader and lived and died here.

The Fox town contains twenty wigwams or upwards and I presume some 200 Indians. I saw but a few acres of poorly cultivated corn near the town, and the wigwams looked shabby enough. Morgan is the principal warrior of this village, as Keokuk is of the Rock river town.

The Sauk's and Foxes were so useful to us as auxiliaries, that I feel grateful to them and make a few remarks on their principal men who were with us.

Keokuk, the principal warrior of the Sauk's, is a shrewd politic man, as well as a brave one, and he possesses great weight of character in their national councils. He is a high-minded, honorable man, and never begs of the whites.

While ascending the Mississippi to join us, at the head of his brave troops, he met, arrested and brought along with him to Fort Crawford, two United States soldiers, who were deserting from the garrison when he met them. I informed him that for this act he was entitled to a bounty in money; to which he proudly replied, that he acted from motives of friendship towards the United States, and would accept no money for it.

Morgan is the principal warrior of the Foxes, and resides at Du Buque's mine on the western bank of the Mississippi. Though less versatility of talent belongs to him than Keokuk possesses, yet he is a bravo man and fond of war. More than a year before we were in this country, this Indian general had gone to the Sioux country and killed a woman and three children of that Nation, which act produced the war, then raging between the two Nations. This act has since been dreadfully avenged by a large party, on some twenty individuals of the Foxes.

Tiama, a principal civil chief of the same tribe, is an excellent man, and son-in-law of Quasquawma. Their village is already noticed as being located on the west side of the river, opposite where we lay on an island, at the head of the lower rapids.

Quasquawma was the chief of this tribe once, but being cheated out of the mineral country, as the Indians allege, he was degraded from his rank and his son-in-law, Tiama, elected in his stead. The improvisatory, whose name has escaped my recollection, is a shrewd wit and a very good man, certainly a very amiable and agreeable one. He is highly esteemed by all his people. A half-blood, is a great pet among the whites. He speaks prairie-wolf French and a little English, in addition to his knowledge of Indian languages.

Of the above named individuals, and several others belonging to these brave and generous allies, I brought away with me as correct a likeness as I ever saw drawn. Gratitude towards them was my motive for being at the expense of these beautiful paintings which have gone to London a year since. Like many other expenses I was necessarily put to, I have never received even one cent from the government towards them, nor have I received one cent, either for my expenses or my services at St. Louis, the lower rapids, Rock Island or Galena. I say this because it has been stated very differently, even on the floor of the House of Representatives. It is not true that all my expenses were paid by the United States; nor is it true that my services have been paid for by the government at all. In saying this, I do it in justice to myself as I would to do justice to any other injured individual, however humble in the Nation. I am even yet unpaid, but I never will condescend to beg for my pay at the doors of Congress. I did once expect very different treatment from my country.

SEQUEL TO THE INDIAN TREATIES OF 1829.

[BY CALEB ATWATER.]

On the day we delivered the goods to the Winnebago's, after the Indians were all seated on the ground in rows, the chiefs on the highest spot in the center, on benches, clothed in the most sumptuous manner; where they could see and be seen to the best advantage; every tribe by itself; the half-breeds in one place; the full whites in another. As I passed through the open spaces between the ranks, my attention was forcibly drawn to a particular spot by a constant snarling, hissing noise of some miserable human being, whom, on approaching her, I ascertained to be an Indian woman, shriveled, haggard and old, though remarkably neat in her person and dress. She appeared to be about sixty years of age, and scolded incessantly. Some of the goods placed before her, as her share of them, she complained of as being too fine; others as being too coarse; some cost too much, while others were quite too cheap, and none of them seemed to please her. Wishing, if possible, to please all of them, and especially the ladies; actuated by the best of motives, I endeavored by every argument in my power to satisfy her, that so far as I could do anything towards it, great care had been taken in the distribution to do justice to every individual. I told her that her great father, the President, had specially ordered me, so far as in me lay, to please all, and to see that no one went home dissatisfied. At that moment she returned upon me a volley of epithets too degrading to be repeated, even though applied to myself, as I felt conscious of not deserving them. Turning around to some females who were politely sitting on the ground behind me, I learned the fault finder was an old maid (unmarried men at sixty years of age I will call bachelors, but ladies never), and that the only distinguishing mark of attention she had ever received from any man was a smart blow with a flat hand on her right ear.

As there is no law regulating taste, and sometimes no rational way of accounting for some of its freaks; and as some sights are the aversion of some persons, while the appearance of other objects is equally disagreeable to others; and as I never could endure the ideas conveyed to my mind by a rattlesnake, a heartless politician, an iceberg and a cold hearted woman, I turned away from her in disgust, and never saw her more nor inquired her name, for fear I should remember it. She was the only person who left the treaty ground dissatisfied with the commissioners. To please her it was utterly impossible.

Seated, as I said, upon rising ground, on benches, clad in blankets, either green or red; covered with handsome fur hats, with three beautiful ostrich plumes in each hat; dressed in ruffled calico shirts, leggins and moccasins, all new, and faces painted to suit the fancy of each individual, who held in his hand a new rifle, adorned too with silver broaches, silver clasps on every arm, and a large medal suspended on each breast; the chiefs, principal warriors and head men, to the number of forty-two, sat during the two hours after all the goods had been delivered to the Nation.

Every individual of both sexes in the Nation had lying directly before the person on the ground the share of the goods belonging to the individual. Great pains had been taken to give each such, and just so many clothes as would be suitable for the owner to wear during the year to come. The clothes were cut so as to correspond exactly with the size of the owner. The pile of clothes for each person was nearly two feet in thickness, the sight of which entirely overcame with joy our red friends, and they sat during two hours in the most profound silence, not taking off their eyes one moment from the goods, now their own. For the first time during my constant intercourse of several weeks with these interesting sons and daughters of the forest, as I passed repeatedly through their ranks, not an eye appeared to see me, not an ear to hear my heavy tread, not a tongue, as always heretofore, repeated the endearing name of "Oconee Kairake" (the good chief), which their kind partiality had given me on my first landing at Prairie du Chien. Their minds were entirely overcome with joy.

The day being far spent, and, as the loading of the canoes, in which they were about to depart, would necessarily occupy some little time, I informed the chiefs and principal men that the time had arrived when we should part to meet no more; that the great gun at the fort would soon be fired to do them honor. With one accord they all arose, and shaking me heartily by the hand, many of them shedding tears on the occasion, they one and all invited me to visit them at their respective places of abode. In a shrill tone of voice Nawkaw issued his orders for every individual to arise, take up his or her goods, and repair to the beach of the river near at hand, and there await the signal from the fort for their embarkation.

In fifteen minutes they were all seated on the sands by the river's edge, where they all sat in breathless silence awaiting the signal, which was soon given. As soon as that was given each chief came forward, shook me again cordially by the hand, accompanied by the warmest protestations of friendship. In a few moments more they were off, covering a considerable surface with their canoes, each one of which carried its flag of some sort floating in the gentle breeze, which ruffled the surface of the Mississippi.

The Chippewa's, Ottawa's and Pottawattamie had received their goods in the same manner as the Winnebago's; had been treated precisely in the same way, and three guns, one for each Nation, had given them signal to depart, and they had parted with me in the same kind and affectionate manner.

After the departure of the above named Indians, we had the Sauk's and Foxes still with us, with whom we had orders to hold a council to ascertain from them "if they would sell their mineral lands, situated west of the Mississippi?—and if they would sell them, upon what terms?"

Gen. McNeil, who was in command as a military officer in this section of country, addressed these tribes and was answered by Keokuk on the part of the Sauk's, and by Morgan for the Foxes. I regret that the injunction of secrecy rests on these speeches in the United States Senate; otherwise I should take great pleasure in laying them before the reader. Keokuk, in particular, made one of the best speeches ever heard, and it was admired as such by several members of the Senate. Keokuk, on the part of these Indians, complained to us of certain white men who had settled on the Indian lands along the Mississippi in order to supply persons navigating the river with necessaries, such as poultry, milk, butter, eggs, and above all, cordwood for the steamboats. He complained that the United States had cultivated lands as a garden for the garrison at Prairie du Chien— had erected a mill without leave, on Indian land— and had not fulfilled former treaties with them.

Making them liberal presents, we naturally deferred the whole subject in discussion for the consideration of the government of the United States to act on it; and I take pleasure in saying the government has, since that time, done its duty to these sons of the forest.

After arranging all matters with them as well as we could, which occupied several days, they were dismissed in a very friendly manner, as all other Indians had been already; and they immediately descended the river for their homes.

Before leaving this place I wish to make a few remarks of a general nature. Though I neither am, nor ever pretended to be a military man, yet I venture a few remarks on some of the military establishments in the northwest.

The fort on Rock Island is commanded by hills on both sides of it, and could not stand an hour against an enemy with cannon posted on the heights. Why this fort was placed here where it is, no man of sense can tell, if the British were to be the attacking enemy. If this work was intended to protect this frontier against Indians it is in so dilapidated a state that by crossing on the island above the fort, or gliding along in their canoes under the western side of the island, which forms the outside of the fort, the Indians could in any dark night make themselves masters of the garrison in fifteen minutes. Whenever they please they can collect at this point in ten days 4,000 warriors, to contend with 400 soldiers. 'There is no regular mail connecting this post with the United States, and war might be declared for three months, in some seasons of the year, without the garrison's knowing it.

There is a post office established here, and in summer the officers sometimes go to Galena for their papers and letters, 100 miles above them—and sometimes they go to Springfield, in the Sangamo country, a distance of seventy miles perhaps, for their letters. The officers must go themselves, as the soldiers, if permitted to go, would desert the service. Cut off from all the world, that is, the civilized world, during six months of the year, the officers and soldiers lead a life as dull as need be. The officers who have families have established a school for their children, which is doing very well.

Ascending the Mississippi, 200 miles or more above Rock Island, we arrive at Fort Crawford, at Prairie du Chien. This post like that at Rock Island, stands near the Mississippi on its eastern shore, and is entirely and completely commanded by the hills on each side of the river. It enjoys, too, a situation so low that nearly every summer, during the dog days, its site is under water from six to ten feet in depth, from the overflowing of the river.

This work is in so dilapidated a state that I presume it is now abandoned for another site somewhat more elevated but nearer the high hill that will forever command it, just east of it. Major Garland pointed out to me the spot where he supposed a new fort would be erected.

There is a propriety in placing a military post somewhere, at or near the mouth of the Wisconsin, in order to form a line of posts situated on Green bay, where there is a fort—and in the interior, at the spot where Fort Winnebago is but what consideration could have induced the government to place a garrison at St. Peters, 300 miles and more beyond a single white settlement—unconnected, too, with any other post in the very heart of the Indian country, I am unable to determine. If this post was intended to strengthen this frontier, it certainly weakens it to the amount of the force stationed there added to an amount of force enough to succor and defend it. If the object was to station a garrison where an intercourse with the Indians, for the purposes of trade, was sought, Lake Pepin, far below it, is the place where it should have been located. As it is, it so happens often that the officers and others who pass and re-pass between Prairie du Chien and St. Peters are taken prisoners on the route by the Indians. Unless some one wished to get a good governmental job by getting this post established, then I cannot account for this strange location, and I am equally at a loss to account for the continuance of this worse than useless establishment where it is.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

All the officers in the Indian country, who have been there ten years, ought instantly to be relieved by others. Lieut-Col. Z. Taylor has been in the Indian country constantly with his family, about twenty years. Here he and his lady, who were bred in the most polished and refined society, have been compelled to rear, as well as they could, a worthy and most interesting family of children. Col. Taylor commands Fort Crawford, at Prairie du Chien. Dr. Beaumont and his amiable and accomplished lady; Major Garland and his, belonging to this garrison, are doing the same. It is an interesting sight to see such persons, located as they are, in a fort, on the very verge of civilized life, educating a family of young children. The situation of delicate females, belonging to some of the best families in the Nation, reared in tenderness, amidst all the luxuries and refinements of polished society, now living in a fort, calls for our sympathy and admiration of their fortitude, which enables them to bear with all the ills, and overcome all the difficulties attendant on their mode of living. When I was very unwell, from exposure, miserable water, and the worst of cookery, and worn down too by fatigue of body and mental suffering, I always found sympathy, food that I could eat, and smiles and kindness which touched my heart, in the families I have named, nor can I ever forget the females belonging to the families of Mr. Rolette and of Judge Lockwood, at Prairie du Chien. Without their kindness towards me, I must have perished. I do not deny my fondness for woman, because I know that in cases of distress and suffering, her sympathy and cheering voice infuses into man new life, new vigor, and new fortitude, and he marches onward with redoubled energy, to climb over every alps that is placed in his way. Living as these ladies do, amidst dangers, in an Indian country, they are familiarized with them, and their animating voice is worth an army of men. I never can forget them, nor their families while I live. Would the government hear my feeble voice, such officers would not be compelled, with their families, to spend all their days, in an Indian country, while others who have known no suffering in the service, are attending levees and gallanting about the ladies at Washington City.

There is something wrong in all this, that I hope will be rectified yet.

At each of the military posts, the officers have established a library and a reading room at their own expense. Their books consist of useful works, connected with their pursuits. History, geography, mathematics, chemistry and scientific books, are in the library, and the officers and their families are well read in them all. Though they may be uninformed as to the passing events, at the very moment they occur, yet at unequal periods, their regular files of all the best newspapers published in the United States, are received and read with care. The National Intelligencer, National Gazette, all the literary periodicals, worth reading, are carefully perused.

The younger officers were all educated at West Point Academy, and whenever I met one of them, I always found a gentleman, and man of science, brave, active, vigorous, energetic, high minded, honorable, strictly honest and correct in all his deportment. He claimed all that belonged to him, and not one title more, of any one. These officers, belonging to the first families in the Nation, educated in the very best manner, are induced by their self-respect, to conduct themselves in the very best manner on all occasions. They fear nothing but disgrace, originating in their own bad conduct, and they scrupulously avoid it everywhere and at all times. As officers, as gentlemen and as men, I feel proud of them as my countrymen.

I pray them to accept this testimony in their favor, as a small payment towards a large sum justly due to them for their good conduct in every part of the Union where I have had the pleasure of meeting with them. My only regret is, that this honest, heartfelt approbation of them is all I have it in my power upon persons so worthy. Those who are in actual service on the Indian frontier, deserve more pay than they receive, in a country where everything is so extravagantly dear. Congress ought to remember these worthy men, and make future provision for them, and to Congress I submit their case. While those who shine in every fashionable circle at Washington, under the eye of Congress, are well paid for their services, it is to be hoped that others, who undergo nothing but hardships, will not be forgotten, as I know they will not be by the Senate.

Having completed all our business of a public nature, so far as we could at this place, about the middle of August, as near as I now remember we concluded to give our friends here a ball on the evening preceding our leaving them. It was attended by all the respectable part of the people in the garrison and in the village. It was a most interesting scene. Within the council house, where the civilized people were assembled, might be seen persons of both sexes, as polished and as refined in their manners, as well bred, arid educated as well, too, as any person in the United States.; and at the same moment might be seen on the outside of the house, at the doors and windows, looking on and occasionally dancing by themselves, by way of experiment, or to show what they could do as dancers in the open air, as motley a group of creatures, (I can scarcely call them human beings) as the world ever beheld. They are a race peculiar to those parts of the upper Mississippi, where settlements were originally made by the French, soon after the conquest of Canada by the English, under Gen. Wolf. They are of a mixed breed, and probably more mixed than any other human beings in the world; each one consisting of Negro, Indian, French, English, American, Scotch, Irish and Spanish blood; and I should rather suspect some of them to be a little touched with the prairie wolf. They may fairly claim the vices and faults of each and all the above named Nations and animals, without even one redeeming virtue.

The reader will see that we were on the very confines of civilized and savage life.

The officers and their families from Fort Crawford, and the best families in the Prairie, were all very happy, and we parted with them all in friendship, and retired to rest at about midnight.

CHAPTER IV.

FIRST SETTLEMENT OF THE COUNTY.

Among the questions which naturally interest the citizens of Green county of to-day is this: "Who were the first settlers within its limits and where did they locate? There is a curiosity always manifested by those who come after the pioneers, not only to learn their names and their place of settlement, but also the dates of their arrival. Especially is the time of their coming a matter particularly desirable to be known. The county itself, so far as the people constitute it, begins then, although its formation and organization did not take place for some years subsequent to their arrival. The better to understand the first settlement of the county and the condition of things at that time in this region—let us first consider, in a general way.

EARLY TIMES IN WISCONSIN.

It is difficult, if not impossible, to convey to the present generation a correct impression as to the actual state of affairs in Wisconsin, even if we go no farther back than the existence of Wisconsin Territory; since, except among pioneer settlers, there is nothing in its experience that furnishes a standard for comparison. The most it can conceive is a vast and fertile region as yet unsurveyed and scarcely penetrated by the white race, without settlements, roads, bridges or population, except in a few widely scattered and detached farms, hamlets and villages, clustered generally about military posts. In 1830, the population west of Lake Michigan by census enumeration aggregated less than 3,000, which in 1840 had only increased to 30,945. When the capital was located at Madison what is now Green county, contained but very few permanent white settlers, and many others now teeming with industrious multitudes were then wholly unoccupied. Isolated communities was the rule, to which there was no exception, and lack of means and routes of travel scarcely permitted other than slow and most difficult communication. Gradually, however, mail service was secured, and the swell of incoming immigration brought the early settlements nearer and nearer to each other. The movement at first slow, yearly gained in intensity, until the waste places were nearly all absorbed.

It was fortunate for Wisconsin that State organization did not take place until the financial affairs of the country had settled down upon a safe business basis, and wild and reckless enterprises received no countenance. The bitter experience of the States formed out of the old northwest territory served as a lesson and warning, which was not lost when the essential features of our proposed constitution received a preliminary discussion. At one period, these States can scarcely be said to have had either credit or resources, while their debts, incurred for works which even when completed scarce paid the cost of repairs, were out of all proportion to the assessed valuation of property. As late as 1843, the State of Ohio sold its bonds at fifty cents on the dollar to raise funds to meet obligations, while the bonds of Michigan, Indiana and Illinois were for several years quoted in market at from twenty to thirty cents, with few or no buyers. Such was the penalty for embarking the public credit in wild schemes, without resources to meet even the ordinary expenses of local government.

Except about military posts, and with slight other exceptions, permanent settlement first began in Wisconsin about 1826, in the Lead Region, or present southwest counties, and for many years, population pressed in by way of the Mississippi river, before the route by the great lakes was fairly opened. For a long period Galena was more of a commercial mart for supplies for the interior of Wisconsin than Milwaukee or other lake ports, while Chicago was scarcely known in that connection. The southern states were at first more numerous represented than the eastern. Lead mining had developed into a great leading industry on one side of the territory, while agriculture was commencing on the other. The two streams of settlers finally met about midway, but several years elapsed before the eastern current largely predominated. As a result, the diversity of interests, ideas and modes of thought between the two sections were much more striking in early times than at present. time, which has obliterated so many pioneer landmarks, has not even yet effaced the peculiar characteristics of the two sections.

Naturally, the first efforts of the pioneer era were directed to securing channels of communication with the interior and outer world. Laws for surveying and marking out roads were among the first enactments of the territorial legislature. Canals were projected from several of the lake ports, among which may be mentioned one from Sheboygan to Fond du Lac; another from Milwaukee to Rock River, and thence by way of the Four Lakes to the Wisconsin; while the Fox and Wisconsin river route was universally believed destined to become the great central channel of commerce. To the buoyant imagination of the time all rivers of any size were deemed navigable, while their branches were regarded as routes for future canals. So many village and city sites were laid out and platted, whose names even are now wholly lost, that the present realization is almost a blank by comparison. It was a period of vast projects, limitless enterprises, and chimerical speculations which has had no parallel. All this, too, when the population imported most of its provisions, and, except the product of lead furnaces, exported nothing.

Railroad projects received early attention, and charters were actually granted before even highways were laid out in many places from lake ports to the interior. Often the line and terminal points were not even indicated. Among the earliest efforts in this direction was a memorial to Congress, passed in 1840, asking for the survey and construction of a railroad from Lake Michigan to the Mississippi river. It was not until ten years later that any of our existing routes were definitely decided upon, companies really organized, and work of construction seriously commenced.

The period from about 1830 to 1837 was one of great and almost limitless financial currency expansion. In that year, in the States east of us, it reached a natural culmination, followed by a crash that speedily carried down most of the banking institutions in the United States. The Banks of Green Bay and Mineral Point, the only ones within the territory, ended in the same way, and for some years the early settlers had little or no currency other than the small sums brought in by newly arrived immigrants. In the southwest counties or Lead Region, citizens of all classes combined and refused to receive or use anything but gold and silver as a measure of exchangeable values. Immigration, which had commenced coming in a flood soon after Territorial organization, was not only checked, but actually recoiled eastward, and it was not until about 1843-4 that the current turned westward again, since which time it has known no abatement.

Pioneer settlers in the Northwest, if they cannot be said to have witnessed the exodus of nations, have certainly been spectators of the ingress of multitudes so vast in number as to well deserve that name. Within the limits of a generation in point of time, they have seen almost limitless wastes of forest and prairie, in natural and normal wildness, changed from a desert to the home of teeming populations, possessing every appliance of art, and every advantage of moral and material improvement. Looking upon the mighty movement in gross, it might be said with truth that representatives of all Europe had marched upon western America. But the invasion was peaceful—the march a silent one. The hosts encamped upon the waste places so quietly as scarcely to awaken surprise. Experience of the mighty change grew, indeed, to be habitual. It was not until it ended in particular localities that it began to attract much attention. The frozen north equally with the semi-tropical south have been almost equally overrun—and yet the impulse has as yet scarcely known pause. It is to continue until the world's populations, productions and perhaps means of livelihood, reach an equilibrium. Like the glacial era in geological records, it is the grand mixing of diverse peoples—the abrading force, grinding prejudice against prejudice, religious system against religious system, nationality against nationality, until from the ultimate product there shall spring, as we believe, a higher development and nobler race to elevate the career of humanity. History furnishes no parallel to this wondrous movement. It will ever stand out single and isolated as the greatest event in human annals.

Pioneer settlers found and opened the way for the teeming multitudes that have followed. The early comers were almost exclusively of American birth and parentage. At the period of the conventions to frame a State constitution, foreign emigrants composed but a small per cent of the population. They had gained a foothold, indeed, but in were no part a controlling authority. Pioneer experience, therefore, was unique in its way—in all its conditions and surroundings, unlike the present. It could occur but once, and will be reproduced to no future generation. It was a Golden Era, the twilight of the morning of the birth of mighty States, and must ever remain one of the most interesting chapters in our history. It is for this reason that its details, hardships, purposes and modes of life, hopes and expectations, interesting even now, will, as the years progress, be esteemed more and more valuable. They err sadly who think such records puerile, or of small value. The future will cherish and perpetuate them as the choicest gifts this generation can confer.

Before entering upon a consideration of the first settlement of Green county, we must premise that this county was, when the first settlers came, for a short time a part of Crawford county, but soon became, most of it, a portion of Iowa county, and so remained for over seven years—the very years of the early settlement of not only the last mentioned county as it is now constituted, but of the present Lafayette as well. To correctly understand the history of the first settlement, therefore, of Green county, we must first take a birds-eye view of early times in the neighboring counties of Iowa and Lafayette; for the histories of the three counties, as to their first settlements, are most intimately blended.

FIRST SETTLEMENT OF IOWA COUNTY.

When the country south of and immediately adjoining the Wisconsin river, but extending so far away from that stream as to reach the present State of Illinois (including all of what was Iowa county when it was first constituted by name and boundaries), was first visited by the whites, it was apparently a derelict region. In the middle of the eighteenth century, however, the Sacs and Foxes had taken possession of it, they having settled down on the Lower Wisconsin, from the Fox river country. These, in time, gave way to the Winnebago's, who occupied this territory when pioneer settlers began to invade this region, and was recognized as their land by the United States government in subsequent treaties

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

By an act of the Legislative council of the Territory of Michigan, approved Oct. 29, 1829, to take effect the 1st of January following, the county of Iowa was established, embracing all the present State of Wisconsin south of the Wisconsin river, and west of a line drawn due north from the northern boundary of Illinois, through the middle of the portage between the Fox and Wisconsin rivers; in other words, it included the whole of what was previously Crawford county lying south of the Wisconsin river. By the same act Samuel W. Beale and Louis Grignon, of Brown county, and Joseph M. Street, of Crawford county, were appointed commissioners to fix the county seat of the new county, and were required to perform the duty on or before Jan. 1, 1830, and file their written decision with the county clerk. The place designated by them was to become the county seat. But should they not agree, or should they be prevented from performing said duty, then the county seat was, by this act, temporarily established at Mineral Point. Terms of the Territorial district courts were ordered to be held on the first Mondays of June and December of each year.

Mineral Point became the county seat; but prior to Wisconsin becoming a Territory the records give but little information as to the election or action of county officers. Commissioners and a sheriff were chosen, however, as is shown by the sheriff's bill for jailor of $85, at $15 per month, presented in 1831, which bill was rejected by the board as exorbitant. This year also the board selected a lot for a jail, and let the contract for building the same to John Brown for $538, to be completed by the first Monday of May, 1831, George B. Call going security on the contract. Economy seemed to prevail in those early times, as will appear. in the fact that for copying original county records and furnishing a blank book for the purpose, M. O. Fitch received the sum of $4, and each member of the board received seventy-five cents a day for his services Samuel W.

Beale, who was appointed by the Legislature as one of the commissioners to locate the county seat, presented a bill for $100 for forty days' services, and it was reduced to $65 and paid..

By an act of the sixth legislative council of the Territory of Michigan, approved Sept. 6, 1834, the eastern boundary of Iowa county was changed to "the principal meridian dividing the Green Bay and Wisconsin land districts." This took from Iowa county a strip of territory three miles wide on its eastern side, and made what is now the range line between ranges 8 and 9 the boundary line on the east. In 1835 the people of Mineral Point subscribed $575 for the purpose of building a court house, and the sheriff was directed to contract for its erection. The building was to be twenty-four feet square, two stories high, the lower story eight feet and the upper seven feet high; to be built of hewn oak logs, with oak floor one and one-fourth inches thick. The upper story was to be divided into four rooms, with plank partitions. Three rooms were to have one window each, and all the doors were to be hung with good butts and screws. The upper rooms were to be ceiled with one-half inch plank, dressed on the under side. The judge's bench was to be raised two feet, with steps leading to it. There was to be one table, seven feet long and three feet wide. seats for a jury were to be provided in both stories The building was to be well stocked and painted with lime mortar, furnished with good and sufficient sash for the windows, with good glass put in with putty, and the shingles to be of pine, eighteen inches long and four wide.

By an act of the Territorial legislature of Wisconsin, approved Dec. 8, 1836, Iowa county was, as already shown in this chapter, divided and re-organized. That portion lying west of the fourth principal meridian was set off as Grant county. All that part lying east of the range line between ranges 5 and 6 east was made a part of Green and Dane counties. The remaining part of the old county of Iowa constituted a new county retaining the old name. By the same act the county seat was established at the town of Mineral Point.

By a treaty, concluded at Prairie du Chien, Aug. 1, 1829, the Winnebago's ceded to the general government a tract of territory lying south of the Lower Wisconsin. This included the present county of Iowa, and opened the way to permanent settlements. Previous to this time a few had located here, being led hither by the reports of the lead diggings. The first actual settlement was made in the spring of 1828, by John Hood, who, with his wife and son, three years of age, came from Missouri, and settled at Mineral Point, camping at first in a cabin made of poles covered with bark, until a sod house could be built, in which to live more securely. This sod house was ten by twelve feet on the ground, and in it was born their second son, on the 29th day of November, 1829, being the first white child born in the county. This child was named John Theophilus Lawson Hood. Mr. Hood at first engaged in labor for others who soon opened mines there, and at times prospected for himself, until, finally, he struck a rich "lead," which he worked until his death, in 1844. Mrs. Hood is still living at Mineral Point, on the ground they first occupied. Hood's family were here during the Black Hawk War; Hood was a lieutenant under Gen. Dodge. His wife, who was a dead shot, carried a rifle on her shoulder every time she stepped out of doors during the entire war. By taking the log houses, a log fort, called Fort Jackson, was built at Mineral Point; a cannon (six pounder) was procured, and forty-two women, with very few men to protect them, remained in this fort three months. No battles were fought in this locality, and all escaped injury by the Indians. At the same time a fort called Fort Union, was built at Dodgeville, into which during the hostilities, the women and children of that region were collected for safety and defense.

In the spring of 1828, almost immediately after the family of Hood had settled in their bark house, Nat. Morris came to this point, and soon struck a rich vein of mineral, the first discovery at this place, owing to which circumstance, the locality was called Mineral Point, which name it has retained to the present time. By the month of August of that year, J. W. Blackstone had associated himself with Mr. Morris, and, as they employed two men to dig in their mine, it made seven persons at the Point at that time. During the summer and fall of 1828, Messrs. Gayond & Wright opened a store in a small log house. They were the first merchants in the county. A Baptist minister by the name of Roberts settled here with his family in 1828, and was the first preacher in the county; he failed, after years of effort, to organize a church society. D. M. Parkison built a log house of good size, in the fall of 1828, which was kept as a hotel by John T. Sublet, and was the first hotel in the county. At this house the fifty-third anniversary of our national independence was celebrated in 1829. John B. Terry settled here in 1828 for the purposes of mining, and afterwards built a smelting furnace, the first operated in the county. In 1830 Mr. Terry farmed a little, two or three miles west of the Point. Dr. Manegan, from Missouri, settled here in 1828, and was the first physician in the county. The second physician was Dr. Jestine, who came in 1829. A Mr. Miller settled here in 1828, and afterwards built a mill a mile or two south of where the railroad depot now stands. This was the first mill in the county. Miller ground grain into feed for animals, made corn meal, but no bolted flour. The grain ground at that time was hauled from Galena, as was flour and provisions. Before the winter of 1829, the settlement had swelled to considerable proportions, all, or nearly all, eager to plunge into the earth and bring up the wealth there buried.

In 1829, Frank Kilpatrick, Judge Monden and Daniel Moore settled in the southwestern part of the present county and commenced farming; all had their families, but Moore being a little in advance, his wife was the first white woman in this part of the county.

In 1829, a Mr. Parish settled in the western section of the county with his family, consisting of his wife, five sons and two daughters. One daughter, America Parish, married Daniel Moore, and the other, Levi Sterling who was the first sheriff of the county. One of the sons, Thomas Parish, became a smelter, the other farmed; but it was not many years before the family became scattered. About this time, E. P. Goodsell found lead in this region and with others engaged in mining with good success. Soon after their labors commenced, Moses Meeker built a smelting furnace at this point. In the spring of 1832, Black Hawk with a party of Sacs and Foxes crossed the Mississippi from the other side and prepared to re-assert his claim to disputed territory. At the first war-whoop the miners and settlers from all this region hastened for some stockade or fort, and with them went the few inhabitants of this county; collecting at Mineral Point, Dodgeville, Blue Mounds, and other places of security. Although there were no "glorious victories," or "inglorious defeats" within the present limits of Iowa county, yet it was the scene of many a flying "Modoc," and pursuing "Jonathan." The Indians were soon vanquished, Black Hawk taken prisoner, and the war ended by the combined strategy and efforts of Gen. Henry Atchison and Col. Henry Dodge. As soon as hostilities were over, the settlers again looked up their scattered axes and picks and began anew tilling the soil and searching for lead.

Prior to 1836 all the mining was done in shallow diggings, which amounted to little more than picking up surface lead; at least, the most extensive mines were but a few feet deep. Although the first "lead" was discovered in the county at Mineral Point, by Nat. Morris, in 1828, still the mining was shallow, owing to the great abundance of lead near the surface, and the want of facilities for deep mining. In 1836 three "leads" were discovered two and one half miles north of Mineral Point, by Holmes, Martin and Bennett, by whose names they were known. These mines were not deep, but their yield was abundant. From this deeper mining commenced in and around Mineral Point, and up to 1840, in addition to the mines already mentioned, there had been opened Bracken's mine two and a half miles south of the Point, Fragasca's mine a little to the east, and the Terrill mines, McKnight's mine, and the Irish mine at Mineral Point. As, at that date, Green county had been organized two years, it is unnecessary to pursue further a consideration of the Iowa county mines, or the history of that county itself.

FIRST SETTLEMENT OF LAFAYETTE COUNTY.

The county of Lafayette was, from the time of its first settlement, a part of Crawford, until 1829, when Iowa county was formed. It was then a portion of Iowa until it was set off as a separate county, with its present name and boundaries, by the Territorial legislature of Wisconsin, Feb. 4, 1847.

The project of separation by the formation of two counties out of Iowa, had been agitated for some years before it was effected. It was favored by the people at both extremities, north and south, but persistently opposed by those in the central portion, contiguous to the proposed line of division. It was put in motion in the fall of 1845, by a public meeting at New Diggings, at which a petition to the Legislature was prepared, and a committee appointed to circulate it for signatures. The Legislature responded by the passage of an act, Jan. 31, 1846, defining the boundaries of the proposed separate counties, and enabling the people to express their wish more fully upon the question of division in the manner defined, by voting either for or against the proposition at the annual election in September, the Legislature endowed it with legal force and effect by the act of Feb. 4, 1847.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

Under provisions of the same act, taking effect May 1, 1847, the county of Lafayette was fully organized for county and judicial purposes. It was also provided that all officers heretofore elected for the county of Iowa, residing within Lafayette, should be officers of the latter until their terms expired, and that the remaining officers to which it was entitled should be chosen at a special election, on the first Tuesday of April, 1847. The county was assigned to the first judicial district, and terms of court were directed to be held thereafter at the seat of justice, in September and April of each year.

So much for the political history of Lafayette county. We now proceed to give a sketch of its early history, to understand which is so necessary to a just comprehension of that of the county of Green.

Upon the first advent of miners and settlers to this region, it was occupied by the Winnebago Indians, who gave the intruders frequent trouble by their unfriendly disposition until 1828, when they threw open their territory to the United States, and the next year ceded all their land south of the Wisconsin and west of Sugar river to the general government by the treaty of Prairie du Chien, and withdrew to the northward and eastward

The United States began the survey of public lands in this section by running the base line, or line between Wisconsin and Illinois, from the Fourth principal meridian eastward to Lake Michigan, in 1833, and immediately thereafter proceeding with the sub-division into townships and sections of the territory embraced in this county, which was completed by 1835. In that year, the lands were brought into market at Mineral Point, but the mineral lands were reserved from sale, being worked under regulations elsewhere mentioned, until 1846, when they also were put upon the market.

The early settlement of Lafayette county, was induced by the discovery of lead ore. Galena was the "hub" of the Lead Region, from which point explorations were made in all directions. Wherever a discovery of mineral was made, there a settlement sprung up, composed largely of fortune hunters, who generally made but a temporary stay, but a portion of whom became permanent and influential residents. All were engaged in milling, or in accessory operations.

In 1824, the "new diggings" near Fever river, in the southwest part of the county, were discovered by a prospecting party from Galena, consisting of Duke L. Smith, George Ferguson, and five or six others, and were at once occupied. In 1856, Ferguson, and John and Cuyler Armstrong, were the principal occupants of these mines, which proved to be immensely rich.

In the towns of New Diggings and White Oak Springs, mining was commenced in 1827 and 1823 by Amos Looney, Mr. Deering, J. W. Blackstone, James Collins, Samuel Scales, R. H. Champion, and others.

The first white persons known to have made a permanent settlement in the county, were Henry and Beon Gratiot, two Frenchmen from St. Louis, Mo., who settled at what was called Gratiot's Grove, in the year 1826, and commenced the business of mining and smelting lead. This point became famous as "Fort Gratiot" during the Black Hawk War in 1832, as a place of safety for families. It was about two miles south of the present village of Shullsburg. Henry Gratiot became Indian agent for the United States government, and had great influence with the Winnebago's, who inhabited this country. On the 15th day of February, 1827, James Woods, John Woods, William Chilton, Andrew Clarno, Thomas Chilton, Hugh McGeary, and Augustus Chilton, left Springfield, Ill., on foot, with the view of settling or laboring in the "Lead Region" of Wisconsin. They traveled on foot, carrying their supplies on their backs, fording streams, wading through swamps, sleeping on the ground, with scant covering, and sometimes in the snow or rain, during a journey of twenty days, at the end of which they arrived at Gratiot's Grove, on the 7th day of March,

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

1827. From this point most of the party scattered to different points; some returned to Galena and others to their homes in Illinois, but James and John Woods engaged to drive a team for the Gratiot's, who wanted one man, and gave James Woods $12 a month with board, and his brother John, his board, so the two brothers became settlers at this point. Andrew Clarno afterward settled in what is now Green county. During the trip from Springfield to Galena, Clarno was taken sick, and it was necessary for his comrades to carry him, which they did faithfully until reaching Galena. Here they found James Kendall and family, also a Mr. Rendezbarger and family, whose son was an artist, and his son-in-law, a doctor, probably the first physician who ever saw this section of country. Rendezbarger and family were Swiss, highly cultured, and came here from the settlements of the Red river of the north. Those already mentioned, with a few laborers, constituted the inhabitants of this region in the spring of 1827. George Skillinger, Anthony Miller and Crawford Million, with their families, came the same summer. Skillinger and Miller soon moved further east, and commenced farming in the present town of Wiota.

Jesse Shull settled near the Gratiot's, and opened valuable mines. The village of Shullsburg was named in his honor. Absalom and Elijah Townsend and James H. Earnest, were other early settlers in this part of the county.

Fortinetus Berry, from Sangamon Co., Ill., with his family, settled at Gratiot's Grove, in the fall of 1827, and the year following commenced farming, a little south of the settlement. One of his daughters was the first wife of Charles Lamar.

William S. Hamilton, son of the celebrated Alexander Hamilton, settled in the present town of Wiota, in 1827, for the purpose of engaging in mining and smelting. He built the first furnace in the county, except Gratiot's, and did the first farming in his settlement. This settlement was known as "Hamilton's Fort," being a place of resort for the settlers when Indians were troublesome, especially during the Black Hawk War. Hamilton platted a village near the northeast part of the present town of Wayne, in 1827, and gave it the Indian name of Wiota, hoping to induce sufficient settlement to become a village and hasten the improvement of that section, but as all who came to this region, at that time, thought only of making their fortunes by mining, they settled where mineral had been found, and this early enterprise of Hamilton's failed, although the aboriginal name, Wiota, was retained for a village.

In 1828, two men by the names of Collins and Kemp, settled near Hamilton, in the present town of Wiota, and opened a mine. Two brothers, Robert and Samuel Paxton, and Eli Shook, soon followed and commenced mining. George Carrol, Ezra Lamb and James McKnight, had settled and commenced farming here, by 1830.

Jameson Hamilton, from Indiana, settled on the banks of the Pecatonica, at the site of Darlington, in 1827. He made a claim and farmed. He sold most of the present town site, or first town plat, in 1861.

James and Dennis Murphy commenced mining in the southwestern part of the present county, in what is now the town of Benton, where still exist some of the most valuable mines. In 1828, a Mr. Eastman settled in the northwestern part of the county, in the present town of Belmont, and commenced farming. The same year Col. Moore settled further east, at the present town of Willow Springs, where in 1831, his son Alphonzo was born, who was the first white child born in the county. Col. Moore afterward settled at Belmont and engaged in hotel keeping at the old capital, near the center of the present town of Belmont. John Ames settled about four miles south of Darlington, in 1828, and commenced mining, moving afterward to Iowa, in 1838, where he became quite a prominent public man.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

Daniel M. Parkinson settled in the north part of the county in 1828, with his family. The settlement was called Willow Springs, and Mrs. Parkinson was the first white woman at this settlement. Parkinson was held in high esteem by the people of the county, who often elected him to offices of trust. He was repeatedly elected representative to the Territorial and State legislatures. John Ray and wife settled here in 1828, and Ray, with a Mr. Fretwell, engaged in keeping a hotel and grocery. Mrs. Ray was noted for her religious zeal.

James Collins, John W. Blackstone, Samuel Scales, Capt. Funk, Mr. Deering, and Amos Looney, settled in the south and southwestern parts of the county, in 1827 and 1828, all for the purpose of mining. in connection with which interest they became prominent. Blackstone was a lawyer, whose merits soon became known; although he did not at first engage in the practice of his profession, he was chosen to fill places of trust, both legislative and judicial. James Neagle, an Irish lawyer, very eccentric and not a little audacious, settled here very early and commenced mining. He afterward engaged in his profession, however, and was noted for his quaint remarks in court, and a disposition to have the last word. At one time, he went so far in his peculiar style in Judge Dunn's court, at Mineral Point, that the judge, finding it impossible to quiet him, imposed a sharp fine for contempt. This action brought temporary quiet to the odd son of Erin, but presently he rose and said in broad Irish brogue: "May it please the court, I may be permitted to say, your honor is much more impregnated with dignity, this morning, than usual."

The settlement of the present town of Fayette was commenced in 1828, by Mr. Duke, who opened the mine known as Duke's diggings, which for many years gave an abundant yield of lead ore.

James McKnight and brother settled in the southeastern part of the county in 1829, and commenced farming; and were soon followed by many others.

Daniel S. Hawley settled in the present town of Argyle, where he farmed, and afterwards built a mill and hotel, the first hotel and mill in this part of the county. In 1830 J. C. Saxton opened a store at the same place, and by 1833, Joseph Shook, William Brazzell, a Mr. Cunningham and others, had commenced farming.

James Kendall, from Gratiot's, settled in the present town of Kendall, in 1829, and commenced farming. He built a mill for grinding grain in 1833. This was the second mill built in the county, the first having been built in 1835, on the Pecatonica, at the site of the village of Gratiot (a place entirely distinct from Gratiot's Grove), by a Mr. Curtis. Mineral was found here, and Robert C. Hoard built a smelting furnace in the year 1851.

Owing to the menaces of the Winnebago Indians, there was no rapid influx of population into this country for two or three years after the discovery of the lead mines. The unfriendly disposition of the savages culminated in the outbreak at Prairie du Chien in June. 1827. At the same time they threatened a murderous descent on all the frontier settlements, and consequently nearly all the miners located in this region precipitately abandoned these outposts and concentrated in Galena for safety. The troubles were quieted by the march of Gen. Atkinson's troops to the Wisconsin portage in August and September, when the miners resumed their occupation. At the same time the reports of the war and the return of the volunteers under Atkinson to Illinois, had spread the fame of the lead mines far and wide, and men immediately flocked hither in great numbers. This and several succeeding years were noted as years of wild expectation and adventure, second only to the gold excitement in California.

The Winnebago's manifested great uneasiness from the first at the intrusion of the whites upon their mines, and the various difficulties with them between 1823 and 1828 are attributed to that cause. These were quieted, however, in 1828, when by treaty they gave the government permission to occupy the mineral region for a compensation of $20,000, but did not cede these lands until the next year. This was the end of the Winnebago trouble, but in 1832 a more serious danger threatened the destruction of the isolated settlements—the incursion of Black Hawk with his formidable band of Sacs and Foxes from the Iowa country into the lower valley of Rock river. The concentration of United States forces and Illinois volunteers from the south and east upon the rear and flank of this enemy, forced him back upon the Lead Region, but the resistance here offered, added to the pursuit in his rear, compelled him to seek safety in the timber and swamps of Jefferson county. The more important incidents of this struggle in Lafayette county may be briefly summarized. In April, 1832, information of Black Hawk's crossing into Illinois having reached the Lead Regions, Daniel M. Parkison was dispatched to Dixon's ferry, to ascertain if his intentions were hostile. Returning with information confirming previous reports of danger ahead, a volunteer force was organized, of which Col. Henry Dodge became commander. Defenses were constructed at Hamilton's place, Gratiot's Grove, White Oak Springs, Shullsburg, Diamond Grove, Elk Grove, at the residence of D. M. Parkison (Fort Defiance), and at Seelhorst's at the southwest extremity of Elk Grove, all in Lafayette county, and elsewhere. During the early part of June, matters became still more serious, Dodge's volunteers visited Rock river, and after an interview between its commander and Gen. Atkinson, returned and were dismissed to their homes, with orders to be in readiness to re-assemble on a moment's notice. This occurred on the 14th. The same day the Indians surprised a party of seven men at work in a corn field on Spafford's farm, near the mouth of the creek of the same name, a few miles southeast of Fort Hamilton, killing five, the other two making their escape by extraordinary activity. The alarm was instantly spread, and a detachment from Fort Defiance proceeded to the scene of action and buried the dead. On the morning of the 16th, Col. Dodge arrived at Fort Hamilton, where the volunteers had been ordered to assemble. A few moments after his arrival, a German named Apple was fired upon within a short distance of the fort by the Indians in ambush, and instantly killed. The men at the fort, twenty-nine in number, hastily mounted, under Dodge's orders, and galloped after the now retreating band of savages, who retired eastward toward the East Branch of the Pecatonica, about five miles distant, when, finding that they would be overtaken, they posted themselves within a horse-shoe bend of the stream under the banks of a small pond, and awaited the onset. After fording the river and approaching the position, the men were dismounted, and leaving four in charge of the horses, four others were detached in different directions to watch the movements of the enemy. Twenty-one advanced to the attack in open order, with trailed arms, and when within a few yards of the concealed enemy they received their fire, which, however, was not well directed, and only three men fell. A charge was instantly made, and before the Indians could reload they were all shot down, seventeen in number, not one of them escaping. The loss of the assailants was three killed and one wounded. The Indians made no further hostile demonstrations, and a few days later Posey's Illinois detachment and the miners' battalion united their forces at Fort Hamilton, and proceeded from thence by way of the four lakes to join Gen. Atkinson and the main army at the foot of Lake Koshkonong. During this time Hamilton made a trip to Prairie du Chien, in order to secure Winnebago allies against Black Hawk, in which he was only partly successful, returning with a number of that tribe with whom he accompanied the expedition previously mentioned. The conclusion of the Black Hawk War was the end of all Indian disturbances in this region.

The people now began to employ themselves in various kinds of business at the settlements or villages, and agriculture soon claimed its legitimate place among the industries of the county.

In 1825 a superintendent was appointed for all the mines claimed by the United States in the upper Mississippi district, with authority to prescribe rules and regulations for the government of those engaged in working them. Under these regulations a lot 200 yards square was allowed to every two miners, and one in addition for every two hands employed. The miners staked off these lots at pleasure, on any unoccupied ground, and held them only during occupation; but, by giving a bond of $5,000, a miner's lease to a half section for three years could be obtained. They were allowed the free use of timber for building and fuel, and smelters were allowed sufficient to carry on their works; but no permission was given to use timber in any other manner. Miners were restricted to the sale of their ore to licensed smelters, but could obtain a smelter's license in the same manner as other persons, by entering into $10,000 bonds to pay the government a tenth of all the lead manufactured. Farming was permitted free of rent wherever it did not interfere with the timber required for mining purposes. These regulations passed away when the lands were brought into market, and mining became the business of private individuals, companies or corporations, under the same general laws and regulations prescribed to other business.

Among the first to give prominence to this industry in Lafayette county were J. W. Blackstone, Col. James Collins, Jesse Shall, Henry Gratiot, Samuel Scales, Amos Looney, Beon Gratiot, Buck Deering, Absalom and Elijah Townsend, James Earnest, James and Dennis Murphy, Robert and Samuel Paxton, M. Duke, a Mr. Kemp, and William S. Hamilton. After many years of varying success the mines in the eastern part of the county were measurably abandoned. Having thus considered the condition of the pioneers in Wisconsin while the latter was a Territory, and having sketched briefly the early history of Iowa and Lafayette counties, let us now proceed to examine the cause which first led adventurers to what is now the county of Green. The object of their coming was the newly discovered El Dorado—

THE LEAD MINES.

Undoubtedly the first miners in Green county were Indians of the Sac tribe; at least, it is not known that any mineral was taken out of the earth here before they came in possession of this part of the country—they and their kindred, the Foxes. There is no positive record left behind them of their having been visited in the region round about here by white men while engaged in mining; but local traditions among the Winnebago's, who followed them, fixed the sites, in at least two places, within the limits of the present county of Green, as "Old Sac Diggings." One of these, it is quite certain, was on what was afterward (and still is) known as the south line of the southeast quarter of section 27, in township 4 north, of range 8 east, in the town of Exeter; the other was, probably, what was subsequently known as "Skinner's Diggings," on the present section 3, in township north, of range 7 east, near the northeast corner of the northwest quarter of that section (in what is now the town of Monroe).

Helen M. Bingham, in her excellent little work—"History of Green County"—says:

"In the beginning were the lead mines. The Sauk, or Sugar River, Diggings, were situated a little over a mile southwest of the present village of Exeter."

This, without explanation might convey the idea that the mines, when first discovered by the whites, were worked by the Sacs; but the Winnebago's had been in possession of this region a number of years before the existence of the "Sugar River Diggings" became known to civilized miners, and had worked them in their crude manner—though known to them and to the first white miners as the "Old Sac Diggings."*

"The squaws," says Miss Bingham, in her history before referred to, "were the first miners, but they had neither the knowledge nor the tools to make their labor very profitable. With such instruments as they could make, they picked out the surface or float mineral; and when their excavations became too deep to step into, threw in a dead tree, on which they climbed up and down. When a vein ran under the rock, they dug it out as far as they could reach, built a fire in the hole thus made, and, when the rock was heated, cracked it by pouring on water."

The author in the book just quoted from very truthfully and aptly describes the excitement in 1826 and 1827 as to the lead mines. She says:

"In 1826 there began to be a great deal of talk about the lead mines of southwestern Wisconsin. In 1827 the interest in them was as general as the interest in the California gold mines in 1849; and there was such a rush to them from all parts of the country that sometimes the boats that came up the Mississippi from St. Louis could not carry half of those who wanted to come."

GETTING KNOWLEDGE UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

The difficulty of correctly obtaining the facts concerning the first coming of settlers to this county is very happily described by Miss Bingham in the preface to her history:

"Before the days of newspapers in a new county, the county and family records are almost the only means by which the dates of important occurrences are preserved. Nevertheless, when a country has been settled fifty years, each man, by reference to the dates set down in his family Bible, and to the year in which he came, is able to fix a great many other dates thus: 'Barber and Newcomb had been here a year when I came, in 1837. Holland came the next spring. Smith came the year our baby died, and that was 1838. Brown must have come in 1837, for it was the description of the country, in his letters, that induced the Smiths to leave Illinois. Jones came the 10th of September, 1839. That was the day Tom was born, and I remember Jones was camped right in front of my house, because some of his cattle had given out.'

*They were also called, at an early day, "McNutt Diggings," by the whites. They are so named on some of the early maps of the Green county region. But the name "Sugar River Diggings" soon took the place of the others.

"Alas, that the good mother of the house must shake our faith in her husband's chronology in this way! 'No, Pa, that was the day Mary was born. I know, because Mrs. Jones said 'twas a pity she wasn't a boy, she had such a good head.' There is always a possibility that dates arrived at by the course just illustrated may be wrong; but usually there is also a great probability that they are right, and when the same dates are obtained in two or more families, the probability becomes almost a certainty. In proportion to their number, their correctness is disputed not nearly so often as the correctness of later dates which are verified by the newspapers of their time."

THE FIRST SETTLERS.

The first settlement within the limits of what is now Green county, was in the year 1827. The first settlers were Messrs. Boner and McNutt. They located at what was afterward known as the "Sugar River Diggings," in the present town of Exeter—on the east line of the northeast quarter of section 34, of the government survey. Here they erected a log cabin.

The sole object of these venturers was to trade with the Indians, and to that end they were provided with some goods, such as were prized by the savages, and with that necessary companion, an interpreter, whose name was Van Sickle. Here the Indians had mined for lead.

It would be a reasonable supposition, that, where so few had penetrated the wilderness, with no opposing interests, a feeling of mutual friendship would prevail, to the extent that each individual would extend to each and every member of their little community all the protection in his power; for such has been the experience of so many primitive, frontier settlements. But in this case there was a tragic departure from this rule. McNutt, in 1828, maddened with whisky, entered his trading cabin, and without any known provocation, deliberately murdered his partner, Boner, with an ax; literally chopping him to pieces. Van Sickle, their interpreter, paralyzed with fear, ran for his life, and while fleeing, was shot at repeatedly by McNutt, with a rifle. Van Sickle made his way to Blue Mound, a settlement about eighteen miles to the northwest, and gave information of what had occurred. Hardly had he arrived there, when McNutt made his appearance, on horseback, and delivered himself up, confessing the murder. The territory now constituting Green county, being at that time a part of the county of Crawford; with the county seat at Prairie du Chien, McNutt was taken to that place, tried, and acquitted. This was the first white man killed, so far as is known, in this county. Soon after, the few settlers assembled at the trading-house, and gave the mangled corpse of Boner as decent a burial as circumstances would permit. The grave was the first dug for a white settler in the county.

The exact date of the killing of Boner, by McNutt, is unknown though it must have been in 1828 and before the 7th of July of that year; as is seen by the following extract from the records of the supervisors of the county of Crawford, Wisconsin:

“TERRITORY OF MICHIGAN, COUNTY OF CRAWFORD.

“At a session of the supervisors of the county of Crawford, and township of St. Anthony, held on the 7th day of July, 1828, present, John Marsh, John Simpson and Dennis Courtois, supervisors of said township, was presented the account of Pierre Lembert of $1.50, which was allowed; and Dennis Courtois, account of $1; John Simpson, of $1; John Marsh, of $1, and Joseph Brisbois, of $2, which was allowed.

“Upon the representation of the sheriff that the prison is insufficient for the safe keeping of D. McNutt, a prisoner confined on the charge of murder, a request was made to the commanding officer of Fort Crawford to take the prisoner into his custody for safe keeping. The court adjourned until the first Monday in September next, at 10 o'clock A. M.”

In 1829 William Deviese built a smelting furnace near the Sugar River Diggings, which was afterwards held and used for some years by two men named Kemp and Collins. Deviese must be considered the first permanent settler in Green county. The date of his first arrival was Aug. 12, 1828.

In 1830 Andrew Clarno took up a claim in the southwestern part of the county, about six miles from what is now the city of Monroe, but did not settle there until the spring of 1832.

Around his pioneer home cluster many important incidents. Joseph Payne and William Wallace became Clarno's neighbors, by erecting a cabin near by, and making their home therein. Thus a pleasant neighborhood had commenced to grow, when, in 1832, the Black Hawk War brought consternation to the little settlement. On the 5th of May, 1832, they all left their homes in great haste before the approaching Indians. Hardly had they reached a safe distance when the smoke of their burning homes arose in curling volumes above the tree tops. A few hours later and they would have fallen a prey to the remorseless hate of the followers of Black Hawk. The first sad, dreary night they spent on the ground now occupied by the county seat, often startled by the whoop of the savage, in hourly expectation of falling victims to the prowling foe. Fortunately they were not detected. In the dim, gray light of morning they hastened away, and arrived at “Hamilton's Fort,” now Wiota, where they tarried the second night. They then marched their way westward to “Fort Gratiot,” where they remained in safety until the close of the war. When the troubles had ceased they returned to their ruined homes, rebuilt their houses, and commenced to lay the foundations of that prosperity which afterwards was the reward of their trials and industry. Clarno's home became the resting place of many subsequent adventurers, who sought and obtained homes in that vicinity, and helped to swell the population of the settlement. As is the case in all new settlements, each vied with the other in making every newcomer welcome, and in rendering all needed aid to the seekers of new homes. Clarno lived to a good old age, and was a leading man in the county until his death, and left a worthy family to enjoy the fruits of his enterprise. His son, O. H. P. Clarno, now (1884) owns valuable estates at the old settlement. Some of these early settlers have left the State, while the descendants of others are scattered through the county, engaged in varied pursuits.

It should be borne in mind that it was over four years after the Black Hawk War before the county of Green was created; and that immigration, which, immediately after that conflict of arms ended, began to increase, was, during those four years, to Iowa county—of which the present Green county formed a part. In her "History of Green County," Miss Bingham, in speaking of the Black Hawk War, says:

"To the newcomers, as to the earliest settlers, those who had participated in the war ever appeared as heroes. For years the one unfailling subject of conversation, the subject which never grew old and never was out of place, was the [Black Hawk] war. Every incident was told over and over again. There was a man named Bennett Million, who used to play the fiddle at the dances in Monroe. He, with a number of others, had been surprised by the Indians, somewhere near the Pecatonica, and chased by them. The fright made one of his companions insane, and several others were killed. Mr. Million saved himself by rolling in the mud until so covered by it that he could hide on the ground. his experience was interesting and exciting, and many a time, in later years, the gay company for whom he played bade him lay by the fiddle and the bow and tell them his story of the war."

In the year 1834 Nicholas Cornelius, of Illinois, and Hiram Rust and Leonard Ross, from the State of New York, came to this county. Ross finally settled at Exeter, in the northern part of the county, and Rust took land in the vicinity of the present city of Monroe, where he lived engaged in agricultural pursuits until his death.

The same year John W. Deniston and Abner Van Sant came to this county, and settled about three miles southwest from Monroe, where they built cabins, and erected the first flouring mill ever operated in the county. About this time settlers began to arrive in greater numbers, and farms were opened up in many parts of the county. Many who had been led here with the hope of gaining speedy wealth by mining operations found their labors amply rewarded in the fruits of well-tilled soil.

In 1834 George W. Lot, a Pennsylvanian by birth, came from the lead mines to the westward and made a settlement in the southwest corner of what is now the town of Cadiz.

In the spring of 1834 James Biggs and wife moved from Union Co., Ohio, to Wiota, in what was then Iowa county (now Lafayette). They staid there one year and then moved to what is now the town of Adams, Green county. This was the middle of June, 1835. They settled on section 8. They had not a neighbor at that time within ten miles. The first one who followed Mr. Biggs was William Brazel. Mr. Biggs was the first settler in Adams; and Mr. Brazel, the second.

The town of Jefferson as now constituted had its first settler—Jonathan E. Clark—on section 32, in 1835. In the autumn of the next year he was followed by David C. Bridge, who built on section 20.

What is now the town of Sylvester was first settled by Allen and William Woodle. This was in the spring of 1836. In the fall they were joined by another brother—Joseph. William and Joseph brought families with them.

An Englishman, John Mitchel by name, was the first to locate in what is now the town of Mount Pleasant. The exact date of his coming is unknown, although it must have been before 1837.

It was probably in the early part of 1837 that Daniel Baxter settled in what is now the town of Spring Grove. Then followed, the same year, Eli Kline; these two were the first settlers there.

The year 1837 saw settled in what is now the town of Jordan, Robert Braze!; and 1839, John Trotter and Joshua Chilton.

During the month of November, 1837, Josiah Pierce moved into a cabin in what is now the town of Washington, and was the first settler within its limits.

There was a claim made by John Moore, from Ohio, in 1839, on section 20—the first in what was afterwards (and still is) the town of Decatur. Thomas Chambers, his son-in-law, followed him the following year; also John J. Dawson and Samuel Rowe.

It was as late as 1840 before the present town of York rejoiced in any settlement. John Stewart was the first to locate there.

It was in the year 1841 that the first location was made in the present town of Albany, by James Campbell. The next corners there were Hiram Brown and Samuel Mitchell.

The year 1842 was the one in which, for the first time, a settler made his home in what is now the town of Brooklyn. The name of this first corner was W. W. McLaughlin.

New Glarus was settled before 1845 by James Parkins and Daniel Morley, but these were not permanent settlers. As is well known, the first to settle there permanently were emigrants from Glarus, Switzerland.

We have seen that between 1827 and 1845 was the period of the first settlement of Green county—less than a score of years. By the time the Swiss had got a foot-hold in the county, every surveyed township had occupants and the county at large a considerable population.

Says Miss Bingham:

“Iowa county was partially surveyed before the war, much earlier than would have been necessary had not the lead mines brought it into notice. In 1835 the land was brought into market, and many settlers came to the county in 1835—6. Probably nine-tenths of those who came now or any time before 1840 came from Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania or Virginia. It is difficult to ascertain the States of their nativity. A very large proportion of them came from Illinois, but they had gone there a few years before, when ‘EelinOise’ was the boundary of the civilized world. The Indiana immigrants were, many of them, born in Ohio, and many who came from Ohio had spent their earlier years in Pennsylvania or Virginia. At this time hardly any one came directly from New England, but some who were by birth the children of New England came from New York State. The settlers of 1835—6—7 endured privations of all kinds. The nearest markets were Mineral Point, Galena and Fort Winnebago. The difficulties of going to market were increased by the fact that the streams, which a few years later were shallow enough to be forded, were now so deep that teams were obliged to swim across them, and the banks were so steep that travelers carried shovels with which to cut them down. One might travel days at a time in southern Wisconsin without seeing a house, and dismal prophets had foretold that this state of things must continue.”

The same writer records, in her interesting history, the following laughable incident of early times:

“By 1844 one-third of the land in the county was entered. Soon after the land came into market, a great number of acres, including much timber land, were bought by New England speculators—a proceeding that the settlers regarded as iniquitous. All non-residents who owned land were called speculators, and opposition to speculators was held to be an essential element of loyalty to the county. The usual form of opposition was stripping the timber from the land of the obnoxious class. To a great extent it was the speculators' timber that fenced the farms, and kept the cooking stoves and saw-mills running. Ordinarily, wood cut from any speculator's land was good enough; but a speculator owning land east of Monroe died, and (as though his death was an addition to his former indignity to the settlers), from that time until the timber was all used, his land, known as "dead man's land," was the favorite place of supply in this part of the county. Until 1844 the speculators made no effort to defend themselves, but in that year a number of them engaged J. A. Bingham to prosecute every one found cutting their timber, and for a time the old hatred of speculators was forgotten in the new desire to resist a citizen who dared to become a representative and defender of the obnoxious class. For a year or two it seemed as though the more the timber cutters were prosecuted, the more they developed a martyr-like persistency and a very un-martyr-like aggressiveness. These qualities might have reached the heroic, had not the courage of the choppers wasted away so rapidly that their conduct became the laughing stock of the county.

"A brother of Thomas W. Thompson once came from New York to visit him. At Milwaukee he hired horses and a covered carriage for the remainder of the journey. Before his visit in Sylvester was over, he wanted to see the county town. He started, but lost his way. Presently he saw three men and three loads of rails standing in the road before him. Before he was near enough to ask for information, they all started. Two of the men had horse teams, and they soon disappeared. Mr. Thompson then called loudly to the man with the ox team to stop, but the more he called, the more the man pounded his oxen. Psychologists may well tell of the strange influence which, under favorable circumstances, a man who concentrates his mind on one thing is capable of wielding, even if he does not utter a word. In this case the circumstances were favorable, and the concentration was perfect; and, in an incredibly short time, both oxen and rails seemed to have been inspired with the belief that only a speculator would ride in such a fine carriage as that which was coming behind him. The oxen galloped, and the rails flew off at the sides, and the last Mr. Thompson saw of the driver he was clinging with both hands to the wagon, from which the last rail was gone, while the oxen were making time to which Mr. Thompson, in his amazed and bewildered condition, was entirely unable to bring his high-spirited horses."

Many of the early settlers have passed away, but they have left a posterity who honor their names, and are doing their share toward building up and sustaining the social fabric of the county. The pioneers who remain in "the land of the living" feel a commendable pride in the advancement and prosperity of their county, which, though less rapid in growth than some of its neighbors, has, nevertheless, moved forward to the goal of success with certainty. They can look back to the time when miles intervened between neighbors; and, following the widening path to the present, can see that the population of that day has increased and multiplied many hundred times. "They can rejoice that they are surrounded by a thrifty, upright, law-abiding people."

GREEN COUNTY ON EARLY MAPS.

There is no better way to bring before the mind's eye the general facts as to the history of any country, or portion of country, than to study old maps of the region under consideration. We give the result of such a study in so far as Green county is concerned, beginning with the first map ever published of this immediate locality, known as a "Map of the United States Lead Mines, on the Upper Mississippi River, 1829."

On the map just mentioned, of course Green county is not laid down, as the county was not in existence for seven years thereafter. But within what are now its boundaries, are designated two localities where there are lead mines—only one being named. That one is called “McNutt Diggings.” There is a road leading off in a southeasterly direction from these “Diggings,” called the “Chicago Trace.” It crosses Rock river in the State of Illinois, where there is represented a Winnebago Indian Village. There are two Indian villages located within what are now the limits of Green county—both Winnebago. One is called “Spotted-arm’s village;” one is on the east side of Sugar river, some distance above the State line;* the other (Spotted-arm’s village) is on the west side and farther up the stream on the trace leading from “Hamilton’s” in what is now Iowa county, to Green Bay. There is a trace running up the east side of Sugar river through the whole extent of the present county. The Pecatonica is given as “Peek-a-ton-oke.”

*This village was called “White Breast’s village.” Its exact location (as well as that of “Spotted-arm’s village” is given in Chap. VI.

The next map examined is the one known as “Peck and Messenger’s Map of Illinois, and Part of the Wisconsin Territory, 1835.” On title map, all south of what is now Green county, Wisconsin is “Jo Daviess county,” Illinois. The range lines in the Wisconsin Land District are given and also the township lines. The Pecatonica is marked “Peekatonookee.”

The second map containing matters of interest, is that denominated the “Map of the Territories of Michigan and Ouisconsin.” By John Farmer, 1830. On this map, two “diggings” within the limits of the present Green county, are denominated the “Old Sac Diggings.”

In 1835, “Sugar river” appears for the first time on any published map. There were two maps printed in the year just mentioned representing what is now the county of Green along with the residue of the surveyed part of “Wisconsin Territory,” although, at that time, there was, in fact, no such “Territory.” From the Indian village on the east side of Sugar river on one of these maps, there runs a road northeasterly to Lake “Kushkanong;” another northwesterly to “Blue Mounds;” and a third west to “Shullsburg.’ The Pecatonica is named “Peekatonokee.”

Burr’s “Map of the Territory of Wisconsin” 1830, is interesting as containing a line of a “Proposed Rail Road from Wisconsin City to Mineral Point,” running along from Rock river to Mineral Point near the northern boundary of the present Green county.

There are several printed maps of 1838 having “Green County” noted thereon. In each of these, the Indian village on the east side of Sugar river (“White Breast’s Village”) gives place to “Centreville;”* and “New Mexico” stands prominently forth as the county seat of the county. From “Centreville” one road leads southeast to Beloit; one northwest through “Livingston” to “Blue Mounds;” one west to “Hamilton” in Iowa county; and one southwesterly to “New Mexico,”—where it branches, the north branch running through “Peekatonokee” to “Wiota” in Iowa county, and the south branch to “Avon,” and thence west to “Gratiot’s Grove.”

*Concerning this “paper city,” Miss Bingham says:

Upon the print of Centreville, which was exhibited in Milwaukee, Detroit, and the eastern cities, were represented steamboats, churches, warehouses, and blocks of stores. thus portrayed, the place was the cause of many a yearning for a western home and a brisk sale of high-priced business lots and four acre out lots began. Careful, prosperous farmers and tradesmen, wealthy speculators, and penny saving laborers all embraced the opportunity to make a good investment, and purchased real estate in what the agents called the growing, bustling city of Centreville. One by one the purchasers learned that they were the victims of a fraud. that their land was no better than might have been bought at the government price. And so undesirable did it seem, when the unsettled state of the country was made known, that although their titles were unquestionably good, yet, to far as can be ascertained, not one of the purchasers of Centreville lots ever claimed a foot of the much lauded city or ever settled within the limits of Decatur township. [the place had indeed been surveyed and divided, as the plat showed, but the red stakes marking these divisions were the only marks of their presence which white men had ever left in the so-called city.

CHAPTER V.

THE BLACK HAWK WAR.

To the people of Green county, the brief contest between a portion of the Sac and Fox Indians and the Americans, in 1832, known from the name of the leader of the savages as "The Black Hawk War," is of interest, for the reason that the present limits of the county were nearly the center of the region of conflict, and the few inhabitants here all left their homes for safety, nearly all having had their houses burned by the savages. Some afterward took an active part in the war. In the outline history of Wisconsin, previously given, a brief sketch of the hostile movements of both parties engaged in the work of death, will be found; but, at this point, it is proposed to enter more into detail.

Black Hawk's return from the west side of the Mississippi, and his moving up Rock river, caused the mustering into the service of the United States, in Illinois, of about 800 volunteers, who were sent in pursuit. Gen. H. Atkinson, brevet brigadier-general in the United States army, followed the militia with his regulars, but at too great a distance to afford support. On the 12th of May the volunteers reached Dixon's ferry, where they were joined by 275 men from the northern counties of the State. The latter force, however, were immediately sent out on scouting duty. But the two battalions still moved along together until Stillman's run was reached; the creek then being known as Kishwaukee, about thirty miles above the ferry.

BATTLE OF STILLMAN'S RUN.

Black Hawk now made advances for peace, but two of his messengers being killed, the negotiations were broken off. The chief at this time had but forty men under his immediate command, most of his party being some ten miles away; nevertheless, with his handful of warriors, he started back to meet his pursuers. Raising the war-whoop, he rushed in upon the volunteers and scattered them in every direction. The fugitives, in their flight, did not stop until the ferry was reached. This was afterward known as "The Battle of Stillman's Run," of May 14, 1832. The governor of Illinois issued a proclamation immediately after, calling for an additional force of 2,000 mounted volunteers. These incidents caused throughout the west the greatest alarm. The loss of the Indians in this, the first battle of the war, was none. Of the volunteers, one major, one captain and nine of the rank and file were killed, and five men wounded.

On the 17th of May, Gen. Atkinson reached Dixon's ferry with his regulars and a supply of provisions; and on the 19th, with 2,400 men, advanced up Rock river. On the 27th and 28th of the month, the volunteers were disbanded by the governor, leaving the defense of the frontiers in the hands of the regular troops and a few citizens who had volunteered temporarily. Meanwhile the savages were waging war in earnest against the exposed settlements. Their war parties were scattered from Chicago to Galena; from the Rock river to the lead mines. It was a warfare in regular Indian style; there was success first on one side, then on the other; until on the 24th of June, Black Hawk made an unsuccessful attack on Apple River Fort, near the present village of Elizabeth, Ill. Meanwhile the volunteers called out by the governor of Illinois were assembling and ordered to rendezvous at Dixon's ferry, where they were mustered into the service of the United States and formed into three brigades. The contest now began to assume somewhat the appearance of regular war. But, before we proceed to narrate the aggressive movements of the Americans up the Rock river valley in pursuit of Black Hawk and his band, it is proper to more particularly describe the incident which occurred in various localities where the savages carried on their depredations previously.

In the night of the 17th of June a volunteer company encamped near Burr Oak Grove, thirty-five miles east of Galena, was fired on by the enemy. The next morning they started in pursuit of the savages, and succeeded in killing all of them—four in number—with the loss on their part of only one man. However, later in the day they were attacked by the Indians in considerable force, losing two killed and one wounded; but they beat off the assailants and killed their leader.

BATTLE OF PECATONICA.

On the 14th of June a party of men were attacked in a cornfield near the mouth of Spafford's creek, and five killed. Two days after, Col. Henry Dodge, with twenty-eight men, struck the trail of the savages, overtaking them on the bank of the Pecatonica in what is now Lafayette Co., Wis. The savages numbered seventeen, and all were killed. Dodge's loss was three killed. This was, all things considered, the most spirited and effective fighting done during "the war." Capt. James W. Stephenson, at the head of the Galena volunteers, being on the lookout for Indians near the head of Yellow creek, lost three of his men and was obliged to retreat. This ended what may be called the irregular fighting of the campaign. We now return to Rock river, up the valley of which Black Hawk and his force had moved and the Americans just commencing pursuit.

THE PURSUIT OF BLACK HAWK.

A battalion of spies was the first body ordered forward. They reached Kellogg's grove, and were informed, on the morning of the 25th of June, that a heavy trail was to be seen of the enemy not far away. Twenty-five men went out to reconnoitre, and were defeated, leaving five killed and three wounded, though the enemy's loss is said to have been nine killed. The enemy now retired up the river in the direction of Lake Koshkonong, in Wisconsin; and the fighting in Illinois was ended. The first halt made by Black Hawk was at what was afterwards known as "Black Hawk Grove," just outside of the present city of Janesville, Rock Co., Wis., where his forces remained some time in camp. It must not be understood that they were now at their former homes. This was not the case. It was not then the country claimed by the Sacs, but by the Rock River Winnebago's

Gen. Atkinson having arrived at the mouth of the Pecatonica, in pursuit of the savages, and hearing that the Sac chief was further up Rock river, determined to follow him with the intention of deciding the campaign by a general battle if possible. Black Hawk, judging of his intentions from the report of his spies, broke up his camp and retreated still further up the river, to the foot of Lake Koshkonong, where, on the west side of the river, in what is now the town of Milton, he again formed a camp. Here he remained some time, when he again moved, this time to an island in the lake, still known as Black Hawk's island. It is in the southeast corner of the town of Sumner, in Jefferson Co., Wis. Black Hawk afterwards made his way still further up the valley of Rock river.

But now let us return to the army under Gen. Atkinson, in its march from the mouth of the Pecatonica to Lake Koshkonong where he found the Sac chief had eluded him. The recital is best given in the words of one who was in the army at the time and marched under Atkinson:

“The 30th of June, 1832, we passed through the Turtle village [now the city of Beloit, Rock Co., Wis.,] which is a considerable Winnebago town, but it was deserted. We marched on about a mile and encamped on the open prairie near enough to Rock river to get water from it. We here saw very fresh signs of the Sac Indians, where they had apparently been fishing that day. Gen. Atkinson believed we were close to them and apprehended an attack that night. The sentinels fired several times, and we were as often paraded and prepared to receive the enemy, but they never came, though from the accounts given by the sentinels to the officers of the day, there was no doubt that Indians had been prowling about the camp.

“July 1.—We had not marched but two or three miles before an Indian was seen across Rock river at some distance off, on a very high prairie, which, no doubt, was a spy, and likely was one that had been prowling about our encampment the night before. We proceeded a few miles further, and came to the place where the Indians, who had taken the two Misses Hall prisoners, had staid for several days near the site of the present city of Janesville. It was a strong position, where they could have withstood a very powerful force. We afterwards discovered they always encamped in such places. We had not marched but a few miles from this place before one of our front scouts came back meeting the army in great haste, and stated that they had discovered a fresh trail of Indians, where they had just gone along in front of us. Major Ewing who was in front of the main army some distance, immediately formed his men in line of battle, and marched in that order in advance of the main army, about three-quarters of a mile. We had a very thick wood to march through, where the under-growth stood very high and thick; the signs looked very fresh, and we expected every step to be fired upon from the thickets. We marched in this order about two miles, not stopping for the unevenness of the ground or anything else, but keeping in line of battle all the time, until we found the Indians had scattered; then we resumed our common line of march, which was in three divisions. Soon after we had formed into three divisions, the friendly Indians that were with us raised an alarm, by seven or eight of them shooting at a deer, some little in advance of the army. The whole army here formed for action; but it was soon ascertained that these children of the forest had been at what their whole race seems born for, shooting at the beasts of the woods.

“We here encamped by a small lake [Storr’s] this night, and had to drink the water, which was very bad, but it was all that could be found. Here a very bad accident happened. One of the sentinels, mistaking another that was on post, with a blanket wrapped around him, for an Indian, shot him just below the groin, in the thick of the thigh. At first the wound was thought mortal. I understood before I left the army that the man was nearly well. Here Gen. Atkinson had, on this night, breastworks thrown up, which was easily done, as we were encamped in thick, heavy timber. This was a precaution which went to show that he set a great deal by the lives of his men, and by no means was any mark of cowardice; for generalship consists more in good management than anything else.

He moved on in front of his battalion a short distance further, when he came to the main Sac trail of Black Hawk's whole army, which appeared to be about two days old.

"Capt. Early, who commanded a volunteer independent company, and had got in advance this morning, called a halt; so did Major Ewing with his battalion. Then Major Ewing sent back one of his staff officers for the main army to call a halt for a few minutes. He, with Major Anderson, of the infantry, Capt. Early and Jonathan H. Pugh, went a little in advance, when Major Anderson, with a telescope, took a view across the lake, as we had now got to Lake Koshkonong. [The army entered what is now Jefferson county, very nearly where, in going north, its south line is crossed by the Chicago & Northwestern Railway. The trail, after leaving the southeast quarter of section 35, in township 5 north, of range 13 east, ran nearly due north to the southeast corner of section 26, in the same township and range, where the army reached the lake in what is now the town of Koshkonong]. They then discovered three Indians apparently in their canoes.

"Major Ewing went himself and informed Gen. Atkinson what discovery was made, and requested Gen. Atkinson to let him take his battalion around through a narrow defile that was between two of those lakes, where we supposed the Indians were. By this time our scouts, who had taken the trail that led off on our left, returned, bringing with them five white men's scalps. They followed the Indian trail until it took them to a large Indian encampment that they had left a few days before. They reached it; the scalps were sticking against some of the wigwams; some of them were identified; but I do not recollect the names of any, except one, which was said to be an old gentleman by the name of Hall.

"Major Ewing then marched his battalion about a mile, where the pass on the side of the lake appeared so narrow that he dismounted his men and had the horses all tied, and a few men left to guard them. The rest of us marched on foot about one mile through a narrow defile on the [east] bank of the Koshkonong lake. This was considered a dangerous procedure, but Major Ewing, who was in front with Major Anderson, would have been first in danger. He now found that we were getting too far in advance of our horses; so Major Ewing sent a part of the men back for them. When we mounted our horses, we were joined by Capt. Early and his independent corps. We then marched some distance around the [Koshkonong] lake and went in between two of them, in a narrow defile until we found another deserted encampment. We now saw clearly that the Indians were gone from the Koshkonong lake; so, the next thing to be done was to find in which direction they had steered their course.

"Gen. Atkinson having been re-enforced by Gen. Alexander, took up his line of march, arriving at the burnt village on the 6th of July. That evening, Gen. Posey's brigade, in company with Col. Dodge's squadron, joined Atkinson. Col. John Ewing and his regiment came within a mile and a half of the main army and encamped. On the 10th, Gen. Atkinson sent Col. Ewing with his regiment down Rock river to Dixon's; Gen. Posey, with the rest of his brigade, was dispatched to Fort Hamilton; while Col. Henry and his brigade, Gen. Alexander's brigade and Col. Dodge's squadron were sent to Fort Winnebago, now Portage, Columbia Co., Wis., for provisions. Atkinson dropped down a short distance from the burnt village and built a stockade fort, which he called Fort Koshkonong. It was located on the south side of Rock river in the eastern outskirts of the present village of Fort Atkinson, Jefferson Co., Wis. Alexander returned from Fort Winnebago by the direct route, while Dodge and Henry took a more easterly one, striking Rock river at a point where there was a small Winnebago village, now Hustisford, Dodge county, which point was reached July 18. Information was here obtained that Black Hawk was at Cranberry lake, farther up the river. This was believed to be reliable, and an express was started down the stream at once, to inform Gen. Atkinson of the Sac chief's whereabouts. The express came very unexpectedly, at a distance not more than eight miles from the starting point, upon the trail of Black Hawk, making his way down the river. The express returned to the army with the news, and the next morning, July 19, the pursuit began."

BLACK HAWK PURSUED TO THE WISCONSIN.

In the march in pursuit of the enemy, the Americans crossed the Crawfish near what is now Aztalan, in Jefferson Co., Wis., and were, of course, soon in what is now Dane county. But the account of the march is best told by one who participated in the pursuit:

"July 19, 1832.—This day we had, for about twelve miles, the worst kind of a road. To look at, it appeared impossible to march an army through it. Thickets and swamps of the worst kind we had to go through, but the men had something now to stimulate them. They saw the Sac trail fresh before them, and the prospect of bringing our campaign to an end. There was no murmuring, no excuses were made, none getting on the sick report. If we came to a swamp that our horses were not able to carry us through, we dismounted, turned our horses before us and stepped in ourselves, sometimes up to our armpits in mud and water. In this way we marched with great celerity. In the evening of this day, it commenced thundering, lightning and raining tremendously. We stopped not, but pushed on. The trail appeared to be still getting fresher and the ground better, which still encouraged us to overcome every difficulty found in the way. It continued raining until dark, and, indeed, until after dark. We now saw the want of our tents, a great number of us having left this necessary article behind in the morning, in order to favor our horses.

"The rain ceased before day, and it turned cold and chilly. In the morning we rose early, at the well-known sound of the bugle, and prepared, in a very short time, our rude breakfast, dried our clothes a little, and by 7 o'clock, [July 20th], were on the march at a quick pace. On this day some of our scouts took an Indian as a prisoner. On examination he was found to be a Winnebago. he stated that Black Hawk was but a little distance ahead of us; and that he had seen some of his party not more than two miles ahead. But it was a bad piece of conduct on our part that this Indian was not kept as a prisoner of war, but was set at liberty and let go, no doubt, that he might inform the Sacs of our pursuit.

"We halted and the order of battle was formed as we expected we would overtake them this evening. The order was as follows:

Gen. Dodge and Major Ewing were to bring on the battle. Major Ewing was placed in the center with his spy battalion, Capt. Gentry and Capt. Clark's companies on our right, and Capt. Camp and Capt. Parkinson on our left. Our own battalion [Major Ewing's] was reduced to two companies [as Capt. Wells and his company had been left at Fort Dixon]; Capt. Lindsay, of our own battalion, was placed on the right and Capt. Huston's company on the left; Col. Fry and his regiment on the right, and Col. Jones, with his regiment, on the left, and Col. Collins in the center. In this order we marched in quick time, with all possible speed, in hope that we would overtake the enemy on that evening. We were close to the Four lakes (in what is now Dane Co., Wis.) and we wished to come up with them before they could reach that place, as it was known to be a stronghold for the Indians; but the day was not long enough to accomplish this desirable object.

"We reached the first of the Four lakes [now known as Lake Monona, or Third lake] about sundown. Gen. Henry here called a halt and consulted with Pouquet [Peter Pauquette], our pilot, as to the country we were approaching. Pauquette, who was well acquainted with this country, told him he could not get through after night; that we had to march close to the margin of the lake for some distance, as the under wood stood so thick one man could not see another ten steps. Gen. Henry concluded to encamp here until the break of day. Gen. Dodge sent Capt. Dixon on ahead with a few men to see if they could make any discovery of the enemy, who returned in a very short time and stated that they had seen the enemy's rear guard about one mile and a half distant. Gen. Henry gave strict orders for every man to tie up his horse, so as to be ready to start as soon as it was daylight. The order was strictly obeyed; and after we took our frugal supper all retired to rest except those who had to mount guard, for we had marched a great way that day, and many were still wet by the rain that fell the preceding night; but being very much fatigued, we were all soon lost in sleep, except those on guard.

"July 21, at the break of day, the bugle sounded, and all were soon up and in a few minutes had breakfast ready, and, after taking a little food, we mounted our horses and again commenced the pursuit. We soon found that the pilot had told us no lie, for we found the country that the enemy was leading us into to be worse, if possible, than what he told us. We could turn neither to the right nor left, but were compelled to follow the trail the Indians had made, and that, too, for a great distance at the edge of the water of the lake. We had not marched more than five miles before Dr. Philleo came back, meeting us, with the scalp of an Indian. He had been on ahead with the front scouts, and came on this Indian, who had been left as a rear guard to watch our movements. There were several shots fired at him about the same time, and I suppose all hit him from the number of bullet holes that were in him; but Dr. Philleo had scalped him, so he was called Philleo's Indian, which reminds me of the hunters: 'He who draws the first blood is entitled to the skin, and the remainder to the carcass, if there are several in the chase,' which was the case at this time."

Leaving our journalist for a moment, we will describe the particulars of the march from the time the Catfish creek, or rather the Yahara, as it is legally called, was reached until the army left the Fourth lake, the most northerly of the Four lakes, properly called lake Mendota. In the timber skirting the Yahara, the Americans overtook the rear guard of the flying foe, where an Indian was wounded, who crept away and hid himself in the thick willows, where he died. A scouting party of fourteen men was sent forward and preceded the main body about two miles. When they arrived at the point now the site of Madison, the capital of Wisconsin, an Indian was seen coming up from the water's edge, who seated himself upon the bank, apparently indifferent to his fate. In a moment after his body was pierced with bullets, one of which passed in at the temple and out of the back part of his head. On examination it was found that he was sitting upon a newly made grave, probably that of his wife, who had perhaps died of fatigue, hunger and exhaustion, and her disconsolate companion had resolved to await the advancing foe and die there also. The trail was followed around the southern end of Lake Mendota (or Fourth lake), passing a little north of what is now the Capital Park, and along the lake across the University grounds. A few miles brought them to what appeared an admirable position for a battle field with natural defenses and places of ambush. It had been chosen by the enemy and here they had lain apparently the previous night. This spot was afterward laid out as the city of Four Lakes. [It is about three-fourths of a mile north of the present village of Pheasant Branch, in Dane county. We now return to the journal, from which we broke off to relate these particulars.

"But I am not done with Dr. Philleo yet. I will show you that he is a good soldier, and something of an Indian fighter. The signs now began to get very fresh, and we mended our pace very much. We had not proceeded more than ten or fifteen miles further before our fighting doctor ran afoul of two more Indians; he showed his bravery by assisting to kill them. I suppose he killed one and Sample Journey the other, so there was a scalp for each. But one of those miserable wretches sold his life as dear as possible. He, in the act of falling, after he was shot, fired and shot three balls into a gentleman who himself was in the act of shooting at him. The balls were all small; one went through his thigh, one through his leg, and the other through his foot. I am sorry I have forgotten the gentleman's name; he belonged to Gen. Dodge's squadron.

"We now doubled our speed, all were anxious to press forward, and as our horses were nearly worn out, we carried nothing, only what was actually necessary for us to eat; camp kettles and many such articles were thrown away. The trail was now literally, in many places, strewn with Indian trinkets, such as mats, kettles, etc., which plainly told us that they knew we were in pursuit. We, too, saw from the face of the country that we were drawing close to the Wisconsin river, and our object was to overtake them before they reached it; so now we went as fast as our horses were able to carry us. But this was too severe for our poor horses; they began to give out. But even this did not stop a man. Whenever a horse gave out, the rider would dismount, throw off his saddle and bridle and pursue on foot, in a run, without a murmur. I think the number of horses left this day was about forty. The rear guard of the enemy began by this time [about 3 o'clock P.M.] to make feint stands; and as the timber stood thick, we did not know but what the whole army of Black Hawk was forming for action; in consequence of which we got down and formed as often as twice, before we found out that their object was to keep us back until they could gain some strong position to fight from. Our front scouts now determined not to be deceived more; but the next they came to, they stopped not for their feigned maneuver, but pursued them to the main body of the enemy. They returned to us in great haste and informed Gen. Henry that the Indians were forming for action.

BATTLE OF WISCONSIN HEIGHTS.

"We all dismounted in an instant. The line of battle was then formed in the same order that it had been laid off the preceding day, Gen. Dodge's corps and Major Ewing's spy battalion still in front. The horses were left and every fourth man detailed to hold them; which gave seven horses to each man to hold. We had scarcely time to form on foot before the Indians raised the war-whoop, screaming and yelling furiously, and rushed forward meeting us with a heavy charge. Gen. Dodge and Major Henry met them also with a heavy charge, which produced a halt on the part of the enemy. Our men then opened a tremendous volley of musketry upon them, and accompanied it with the most terrific yells that ever came from the head of mortals, except from the savages themselves. They could not stand this. They now tried their well-known practice of flanking; but here they were headed again by the brave Col. Jones and his regiment, who were on our left, where he met them in the most fearless manner, and opened a heavy fire upon them. Col. Fry was placed on the extreme right. They tried his line, but were soon repulsed. Their strong position was on the left, or near the center, where Colonels Jones, Dodge and Ewing kept up a constant fire upon them for something like half an hour.

"The enemy here had a strong position. They had taken shelter in some very high grass, where they could lie down and load and be entirely out of sight. After fighting them in this position for at least thirty minutes during which time Col. Jones had his horse shot from under him, and one of his men killed and several wounded, Colonels Dodge, Ewing and Jones all requested Gen. Henry to let them charge upon them at the point of the bayonet, which Gen.

Henry readily assented to, and gave the order 'Charge!' which was obeyed by both men and officers in a most fearless manner. All were intent upon the charge. We had to charge up a rising piece of ground. When we got on the top, we then fired perfectly abreast. They could not stand this. They had to quit their hiding place and make good their retreat. When they commenced retreating we killed a great number.

"Their commander, who, it is said, was Napope, was on a white pony on the top of a mountain in the rear of his Indians; he certainly had one of the best voices for command I ever heard. He kept up a constant yell until his men began to retreat, when he was heard no more. Col. Collins was kept, during the engagement, in the rear, as a reserve, and to keep the enemy from flanking and coming in upon us in the rear, which was a very good arrangement of Gen. Henry. It was now nearly sundown, and still raining, as it had been all the evening, but so slow that we made shift to keep our guns dry. The enemy retreated toward the river with considerable speed. The ground they were retreating to appeared to be low and swampy, and on the bank of the river there appeared to be a heavy body of timber, which the enemy could reach before we could bring them to another stand. So Gen. Henry concluded not to pursue them any further that night, but remain on the battle ground until next morning, and then he would not be in danger of losing so many of his men, knowing that in the dark he would have to lose a number; for the Indians would have the timber to fight from while we would have to stand in the open prairie. [The battle ground was on the east side of the northeast quarter of section 24, in what is now the town of Mazomanie, Dane Co., Wis.]

"Next morning, July 22, the troops were paraded and put in battle order on foot, except Col. Fry's regiment, and took up the line of march to the river, leaving Col. Collins' regiment to guard the horses and baggage, and take care of the wounded. We marched down to the river, which was about one mile and a half off; but, before we reached the banks, we had a very bad swamp to go through, fifty or sixty yards on this side the timber, which stood very high on the bank of the river. We now saw that Gen. Henry had acted very prudently. If he had attempted to follow them the evening before, he would have lost a great many of his men. When we got to the bank, we found they had made their retreat across the river during the night, leaving a great many articles of trumpery behind. We also saw a good deal of blood, where their wounded had bled. We now returned to the camp, seeing there was no chance to follow them this day across the river.

"We, in the battle (known in history as the Battle of Wisconsin Heights), were very fortunate indeed. We had only one man killed and eight wounded; and we have learned since the battle that we killed sixty-eight of the enemy (but Black Hawk declared afterwards that he lost only six), and wounded a considerable number, twenty-five of whom they report died soon after the battle. We were now nearly out of provisions, and to take up the line of march against them, in the condition our horses were in, told us plainly that we would suffer for something to eat before we could get it. We buried the brave young man, who was killed, with the honors of war. It was stated that he had just shot down an Indian when he received the mortal wound himself. His name was John Short, and he belonged to Capt. Briggs' company from Randolph Co., Ill. He had a brother and a brother-in-law in the same company, who witnessed his consignment to the mother earth. The wounded were all well examined and none pronounced mortal. We continued this day on the battle ground and prepared litters for the wounded to be carried on. We spent this day in a more cheerful manner than we had done any other day since we had been on the campaign. We felt a little satisfaction for our toils, and thought we had, no doubt, destroyed a number of the very same monsters that had so lately been imbruing their hands with the blood of our fair sex, the helpless mother and unoffending infant. We dried our clothes, which then had been wet for several days. This day was spent in social chat between men and officers. There were no complaints made; all had fought bravely; each man praised his officers, and all praised our general. Late in the evening, some of our men, who had been out to see if there were any signs of the enemy remaining near us, returned and stated that they saw smoke across the river."

From this time until the Wisconsin river was crossed there were not many incidents of importance worthy of record; so we leave the journal, from which we have been copying, to relate only such events as will preserve the chain of our narrative until, that time. But, before doing so, it will, in this connection, be proper to introduce the following letter, probably addressed to the commandant of Fort Crawford, at Prairie du Chien:

"Camp Wisconsin July 22, 1832.

"We met the enemy yesterday, near the Wisconsin river, and opposite the old Sac village, after a close pursuit for nearly 100 miles. Our loss was one man killed and eight wounded; from the scalps taken by the Winnebago's as well as those taken by the whites, and the Indians carried from the field of battle, we must have killed forty of them. The number of wounded is not known; we can only judge from the number killed, that many were wounded. From their crippled situation, I think we must overtake them, unless they descend the Wisconsin by water. If you could place a field piece immediately on the Wisconsin that would command the river, you might prevent their escape by water. Gen. Atkinson will arrive at the Blue Mounds on the 24th with the regulars and a brigade of mounted men. I will cross the Wisconsin tomorrow, and should the enemy retreat by land, he will probably attempt crossing some twenty miles above Prairie du Chien; in that event the mounted men would want some boats for the transportation of their arms, ammunition and provisions. If you could procure for us some Mackinaw boats, in that event as well as some provision supplies, it would greatly facilitate our views. Excuse great haste.

"I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,"

H. DODGE,

"Col. Com. Michigan Mounted Volunteers."

On the 23d of July the army was put in motion, not in pursuit of Black Hawk, but to go to the Blue Mounds for supplies of provisions. And just here we must go back in our relation to the time when the army left the Rock river, July 19. On this day, the same express that had discovered the trail of Black Hawk the day previous, again started for Gen. Atkinson's camp, or Fort Koshkonong, where the general was with his infantry. That officer, as soon as he was informed that Black Hawk's trail was discovered, directed the same express to return at once to Gen. Henry with orders to the latter to pursue on the trail of the Sac chief until he could overtake him, and to defeat or capture him. However, before these orders had reached Gen. Henry, they had been anticipated. Black Hawk had been pursued, overtaken and defeated, but not captured. Gen. Atkinson also notified Gen. Henry that he would start himself with the infantry and Gen. Alexander's brigade; that the rest of the volunteers who were with him would be left to guard the fort; and that he would go by way of Blue Mounds. He also directed Gen. Henry, if he got out of provisions, to go to that place for a supply. This explains why the army, after the battle of Wisconsin Heights, marched for the Blue Mounds. Not only Gen. Henry's command, but also those of Gen. Atkinson, reached the Blue Mounds without any mishap; so, also, a part of Gen. Posey's brigade from Fort Hamilton, who passed on to Helena, in what is now Iowa Co., Wis., where the Wisconsin river was to be crossed by the whole army. By the 26th of June all the commands had reached that place and preparations were made to cross the stream on rafts made for that purpose.

BLACK HAWK PURSUED TO THE MISSISSIPPI.

On the 27th and 28th of July, Gen. Atkinson with his select body of troops, consisting of the regulars under Col. Taylor, 400 in number, part of Henry's, Posey's, and Alexander's brigades, and Dodge's battalion of mounted volunteers, amounting in all to 1,300 men, crossed the Wisconsin river and immediately fell upon the trail of the enemy. They were in what is now Sank Co., Wis. Pursuing this trail first down the river, then to the northward, they finally struck off in a west-northwest direction through what is now Richland county, until the Kickapoo river was reached near the present Soldier's Grove, in what is now Crawford county.

Before entering upon the particulars of the march through what is now Vernon county, as given in the journal from which extracts have already been so liberally made, it will be well to glance at the route taken from the Kickapoo to the Mississippi. After the Kickapoo was crossed, Black Hawk, followed closely by Gen. Atkinson, was soon in what is now Vernon county, passing, in a direction north of west, near the farm at present owned by Anson G. Tainter, in the town of Franklin; thence across West Prairie to the brakes or ravines leading into the head of Battle creek; thence down that creek through sections 2 and 3, in township 11, range 7, in the town of Wheatland, to the point where he was overtaken and compelled to fight the battle known in history as the battle of Bad Ax. Keeping this general description of the fight of the savages through what is now Vernon county and the pursuit of them by the Americans in view, the following narrative will prove of interest to the reader:

"About 12. o'clock this day (Aug. 1, 1832), we came to a small river called the Kickapoo.

We here found that the country was about to change. A short distance before we got to this stream, we came to a beautiful body of Pine timber, which was tall and large. As soon as we crossed this stream, we found the mountains were covered with prairie grass. We here found the Indian trail was getting fresher. They had encamped at this creek. We had now been three days in these mountains and our horses had lived on weeds, except those that became debilitated and were left behind; for a great number had become so, and were left to starve in this dreary waste. We here for the first time in three days had an opportunity of turning our horses out to graze. Accordingly we left them to graze for about an hour, which they made good use of and during which we took a cold lunch. About 1 o'clock we started, at a faster gait than usual. We found from the face of the country that we were not a great way from the Mississippi. The country was still hilly, but hills of a small size, and almost barren; so we could get along with more speed. It gave the men new spirits. We now saw that our horses would not have to starve, as we had begun to think it probable that they would.

"On this evening, we came across the grave of an Indian chief, who was buried in the grandest style of Indian burials; painted and otherwise decorated as well as those wretched beings were able to do. He was placed on the ground, with his head resting against the root of a tree; logs were placed around him and covered over with bark; and on the top of which, green bushes were laid; so intended that we might pass by without discovering the grave. He was examined and found to have been shot. It was now late in the evening, and we had proceeded but a short distance from here, before some of our front spies came across an Indian that had been left behind from some cause or other. The spies interrogated him about Black Hawk and his band. He stated that they would get to the river that day and would cross over on the next morning. The old sinner then plead for quarters; but that being no time to be plagued with the charge of prisoners, they had to leave the unhappy wretch behind; which appeared to be a hard case. But, no doubt, he had been at the massacre of a number of our citizens, and deserved to die for the crimes which he had perpetrated in taking the lives of harmless and unoffending women and children.

“We this day made a tolerable push, having marched until 8 o’clock at night before we stopped. We then halted and formed our encampment. But it was for a short time only. Gen. Atkinson gave orders for all to confine their horses and be ready to march by 2 o’clock in pursuit of the enemy. We were now all tired and hungry and something to eat was indispensably necessary. We had a long way to go after water, and the worst kind of a precipice to go down and up to procure it. All was now a bustle for awhile, to prepare something to sustain nature, and to do it in time to get a little rest before we would have to march. About 9 o’clock the noise began to die away, so that by 10 o’clock all were lost in sleep but the sentinel, who was at his post.

“At the appointed hour [2 o’clock in the morning of August 2] the bugle sounded; all were soon up and made preparations for a march at quickstep, moving on to complete the work of death upon those unfortunate children of the forest. Gen. Atkinson this morning had the army laid off and arranged in the following manner: Gen. Dodge, with his squadron, was placed in front, the infantry next, the second brigade next, under the command of Gen. Alexander; the first brigade next, under the command of Gen. Posey; the third brigade next, under command of Gen. Henry.

“In this order the march had commenced. We had not proceeded more than four or five miles before there was a herald sent back, informing us that the front spies had come in sight of the enemy’s rear guard [in reality their outpost]. The intelligence was soon conveyed to Gen.

Atkinson, and then to all the commanders of the different brigades. The celerity of the march was then doubled and it was but a short time before the firing of the front spies commenced, about half a mile in front of the main army. The Indians retreated towards the Mississippi, but kept up a retreating fire upon our front spies for some time, until Gen. Dodge, who commanded, began to kill them very fast. The Indians then retreated more rapidly and sought refuge in their main army, which was lying on the bank of the Mississippi [which river they had, in fact, reached the day before].”

BATTLE OF BAD AX.

While Black Hawk and his band and their pursuers were traversing the rugged country across what is now Richland county into Vernon, intelligence was conveyed to Prairie du Chien, by express, of the battle of Wisconsin Heights and of the retreat of the enemy across the Wisconsin river. The commander of the American forces at Prairie du Chien at once came to the conclusion that the savages would soon reach the Mississippi, and by crossing that stream escape the army in pursuit of them; so he engaged a steamboat, placed some regulars upon it and a six-pounder, with orders to cruise up and down the Mississippi to cut off the retreat of the Sac chief and his people. The steamer proving to be a slow one was withdrawn and a faster one armed in its place—the Warrior.

On the 1st of August, the Warrior discovered the Indians on the bank of the Mississippi where they had just arrived, not far below the mouth of the Bad Ax, making preparations to cross to the west side. A flag raised by Black Hawk was not respected by the Warrior, but a fire was opened from the boat upon the Indians with not only the small arms of the regulars but the six-pounder. The fire was returned by Black Hawk’s party. The contest was kept up until the steamboat was compelled to drop down the river to Prairie du Chien for fuel. The loss of the enemy was twenty-three killed.

On board the Warrior none were killed and but one wounded. But the presence of the steamboat and the firing, of course, wholly interrupted the preparations of the savages to cross the river, while Atkinson and his army were marching rapidly upon their rear.

It was the next morning, as we have already seen, that the Americans under Gen. Atkinson came in sight of what was supposed by them to be the rear guard of the Indians, but which was, in reality, one of their outposts. It appears that the savages raised a white flag for the purpose of surrendering, which was either not seen or was not regarded, and the firing on both sides soon became spirited, the Indians retiring slowly to their main force on the bottom of the river, where the latter were busily employed transporting their women and children and the aged and infirm across the Mississippi [the Warrior not having returned to again cut off their retreat].

Let us now return to the American army in keen pursuit of the fugitives. It will be remembered that Gen. Henry had early in the morning been put in the rear, but he did not remain there long. Major Ewing, who commanded the spy battalion, sent his adjutant back to the general informing him that he was on the main trail; he, at the same time, formed his men in order of battle and awaited the arrival of the brigade which marched up in quick time. When they came up, Gen. Henry had his men formed as soon as possible for action; he placed Col. Jones and Major Ewing in front. Gen. Atkinson called for a regiment from Gen. Henry's brigade to cover his rear. Col. Collins formed on the right of Col. Jones and Major Ewing, when all were dismounted and marched on foot in the main trail, down the bluff into the bottom. Soon the fire was opened on the main force of the enemy, at which time Gen. Henry sent back an officer to bring up Col. Fry with his regiment. Col. Collins was by this time in the heat of the action with his regiment. Capt. Gentry, from Dodge's corps, was by this time also up, and opened a heavy fire. He fell into the lines of Col. Jones and Major Ewing. Captains Gruer and Richardson, from Gen. Alexander's brigade, with their companies and a few scattering gentlemen from Gen. Dodge's corps, were also up; who all joined Gen. Henry and fought bravely. Col. Fry obeyed the call of his general and was soon where the conflict raged with his regiment. By this time the savages were falling rapidly.

It was about half an hour after the battle commenced before Col. Zachary Taylor with his infantry and Gen. Dodge with his squadron got on the ground and joined in the battle. They had been thrown on the extreme right, by following the enemy's rear guard as was supposed, but which was, as already explained, their retreating outpost. Generals Posey and Alexander had been stationed up the river on the extreme right, in order to prevent the Indians from making their escape in that direction, so they did not participate in the slaughter of the savages. The victory, of course, with such overpowering numbers, was complete; but those of the Indians who escaped death from the Americans had most of them made good their retreat to one of the islands in the river, when, at an opportune moment for the attacking parties, the Warrior appeared in the river and opened fire upon the fugitives with her cannon, at the same time sending her two boats to the shore to transport troops to the island, also, to attack the now distressed savages. Col. Taylor sent a detachment in the boats and the Indians were soon all killed on the island but one. There were of Black Hawk's entire force, besides a few who had succeeded in reaching the west side of the Mississippi, only himself and ten warriors with thirty-five women and children who made their escape. About 150 were killed. The loss of the Americans was twenty-seven killed and wounded. Such was the battle of Bad Ax. Black Hawk was soon brought in a prisoner by the Winnebago's, and the war was ended.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

The day after the battle the following order was issued:

HEADQUARTERS, 1ST ARMY CORPS OF THE NORTHWESTERN ARMY, BANKS OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER, NEAR BAD AX RIVER.

Aug. 3, 1832.

Order No. 65:

The victory achieved by the volunteers and regular troops over the enemy yesterday on this ground affords the commanding general an opportunity of expressing his approbation of their brave conduct. The whole of the troops participated in the honor of the combat; some of the corps were, however, more fortunate than others in being thrown, from their position in order of battle, more immediately in conflict with the enemy. These were Henry's brigade, Dodge's battalion, the regular troops, Leach's regiment, of Posey's brigade, and the spy battalion, of Alexander's brigade.

In order that individual merit and the conduct of the corps may be properly represented to the department of war, and the general commanding the Northwestern Army, the commanding general of this division directs that commanding officers of brigades and independent corps make to him written reports of the conduct and operation of their respective commands in the action.

By order of,

Brig.-Gen. Atkinson.

Alb. S. Johnston,

A. D. C. and A. Adjutant-General.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE BATTLE.

HEADQUARTERS, 1ST ARMY CORPS, NORTHWESTERN ARMY, PRAIRIE DU CHIEN,

Aug. 5, 1832.

"SIR:—I have the honor to report to you that I crossed the Wisconsin on the 27th and 28th ult., with a select body of troops, consisting of regulars under Col. Zachary Taylor, 400 in number; part of Henry Posey's and Alexander's brigades, and Dodge's battalion of mounted volunteers, amounting in all to 1,300 men, and immediately fell upon the trail of the enemy and pursued it by forced marches through a mountainous and difficult country, till the morning of the 2d instant, when he came up with his main body on the left bank of the Mississippi, nearly opposite the mouth of the Iowa, which we attacked, defeated and dispersed with a loss on his part of about 150 men killed and thirty-nine women and children prisoners. The precise number of the killed could not be ascertained, as the greater portion were slain after being forced into the river. Our loss in killed and wounded, which is stated below, is very small in comparison with the loss of the enemy, which may be attributed to the enemy's being forced from his positions by a rapid charge at the commencement, and through the engagement. The remnant of the enemy, cut up and disheartened, crossed to the opposite side of the river, and has fled into the interior, with a view, it is supposed, of joining Keokuk and Wappilo's bands of Sacs and Foxes.

The horses of the volunteer troops being exhausted by long marches, and the regular troops without shoes, it was not thought advisable to continue the pursuit. Indeed a stop to the further effusion of blood seemed to be called for, until it might be ascertained if the enemy would not surrender.

It is ascertained from our prisoners that the enemy lost in the battle of the Ouisconsin [Wisconsin Heights], sixty-eight killed, and a very large number wounded. His whole loss does not fall short of 300. After the battle of the Ouisconsin, the enemy's women and children, and some who were dismounted, attempted to make their escape by descending that river, but judicious measures being taken here by Capt. Loomis and Gen. Street, an Indian agent, thirty-two women and children, and four men have been captured, and some fifteen killed by the detachment under Lieut. Ritner.

"The day after the battle on this river I fell down with the regular troops to this place by water, and the mounted men will join us today. It is now my purpose to direct Keokuk to demand the surrender of the remaining principal men of the hostile party; which, from the large number of women and children we hold as prisoners, I have every reason to believe will be complied with. Should it not, they should be pursued and subdued; a step Major-Gen. Scott will no doubt take on his arrival.

"I cannot speak too highly of the conduct of the regular and volunteer forces engaged in the last battle [Bad Ax], and the fatiguing march that preceded it.

"As soon as the reports of the officers of brigades and corps are handed in, they shall be submitted with further remarks.

"I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

H. ATKINSON,
B'T. BRIG.-GEN. U. S. A.

MAJOR-GEN. MACOMB,
Commander-in-Chief, Washington City."

UP AND DOWN THE MISSISSIPPI BEFORE THE BLACK HAWK WAR.

In May, 1831, Joseph M. Street, Indian agent at Prairie du Chien, left the agency in care of sub-agent, Thomas P. Burnett. The latter reported to Gen. William Clark, superintendent of Indian affairs, at St. Louis, on the 18th of that month, that "the Indian relations among the different tribes of this quarter, have not a very amicable appearance. The threatening of the Sauk's and Foxes, and occasional acts of mischief committed by them against the whites in the vicinity of Rock Island, have doubtless been communicated to you before this time.

"The Sioux chief, Wabasha, and a considerable number of his tribe, are now here [at Prairie du Chien]. A small party of them who came across the country from Red Cedar, state that within their country north of the line of the purchase of last summer, they came upon a war road of the Sauk's and Foxes. They followed the trail leading out of the country several days, and from the signs remaining at their camps, they have no doubt that three or more of the Sioux had been murdered by the Sauk's and Foxes. Among other appearances that confirmed them in this belief, was a painted buffalo robe, such as no Indians in this quarter but the Sioux make or use, cut in pieces at one of their camps. They pursued their trail until they came upon their camp, a few miles north of the old Red Cedar fort; but finding them double their own number, did not make an attack. They say that they have made peace and promised to keep it, and will not in any case be the aggressors.

"Col. Morgan informed me, two days since, that he had sent down to the Sauk's and Foxes' to send up ten or twelve of their men to see him, and have a talk with him. They were expected here on yesterday, but have not yet arrived. The Sioux are waiting their arrival, and are, I believe, ready to meet them, either as friends or enemies. When they were informed that the Foxes were coming, they put their arms in order. They say that if the Sauk's and Foxes come and deport themselves peaceably, they will not molest them, but if they see any hostile manifestations, they will strike them. My own opinion is that if the Sauk's and Foxes have had a war party out against the Sioux they will not come here upon Col. Morgan's invitation, knowing as they do, that the Sioux always visit this place about this season in considerable numbers."

"A part of the Menomonee's have been to see me since Gen. Street's departure. They renewed their promise not to go against the Chippewa's for the present, but to wait a while longer to hear from their Great Father."

The squally appearance of Indian affairs called for the watchful attention alike of agents and officers of the army. But it became a question of etiquette, which should take the lead in the matter. The military seems to have claimed that right, while the agents claimed at least to know what had been done in the premises, both being then under the superintendence of the war department, the military considered the Indian department as subordinate to theirs. But Mr. Burnett thought otherwise, claiming that each branch of the public service had its appropriate duties with which the other should not interfere, while in case of necessity one should assist the other, both acting in unison. And as the Sauk's and Foxes alluded to in his letter to Gen. Clark, did come to the place, with whom Col. Morgan held a council, without the knowledge or co-operation of the agent, Mr. Burnett claimed to be informed of the nature and extent of the proceedings, and addressed a note dated May 23, 1831, to Col. Morgan, as follows:

"SIR:—I was informed yesterday that you held, on the morning of that day, a council with a party of Sioux and a party of Fox Indians which you had assembled in the village of Prairie du Chien. As the acting Indian agent at this place, it properly concerns me to know what takes place at this post in relation to Indian affairs. I should therefore be glad to be informed of the circumstances that required such council. The objects to be effected and the results accomplished; also the names of the chiefs or men of influence of either tribe, who were present. Will you please to communicate to me as early as may be convenient, the desired information, and likewise whether Gen. Street was apprised previous to his departure, of the contemplated meeting of those Indians."

This brought from Col. Morgan the following tart reply, and raised the question of prerogative:

"SIR:—I acknowledge in you no right to call on me to render an account of my proceedings to you, though if you will do me the favor to call at my quarters on my return from St. Peter's for which place I am just about to set out, I will explain to you the object of the council and tell you what passed. You were apprised yourself of the Foxes having been invited and you knew they had arrived. Why stay four or five miles off? I stated to the Indians that you should have been to the council if you had been there." Mr. Burnett informed Gen. Clark of the transaction of Col. Morgan, May 28, 1831: "In my letter of the 18th inst., I informed you that Col. Morgan had sent for the Sauk's and Foxes to visit this post. On the 21st inst., about fifteen men of the Foxes, of Dubuque mines, arrived at the village, and on the next day Col. Morgan held a council with them and the Sioux, who were here. I presume that whatever took place at the council, or was affected by the meeting of the Indians, of any importance, will be communicated to you through the proper channel, by Col. Morgan who acted alone in the measure.

The Sioux had been awaiting the arrival of the Foxes for several days. The Foxes landed at the village on Saturday evening, not later I think than 4 o'clock. The council was opened the next morning, as I am informed, at 10 o'clock; yet no intimation of either time or place of meeting, or that my presence was at all desired, was given, although there was ample time to do so. Throughout the transaction, there has been no consultation had, or co-operation had with the agency. The only communication upon the subject previous to the council and departure of the Indians, was the simple fact that he had sent for the Foxes, of which I apprised you. I suppose that if anything occurred of sufficient importance to found a report upon, he will communicate the facts, and in that ease, it must appear that the measure was undertaken and carried through without any connection or co-operation with this agency. I have, therefore, given the above statement of facts to show that the absence of co-operation in this affair was not from neglect of duty or inattention on the part of this agency."

The information that I have collected on the subject, is this: "Some fifteen Foxes from Dubuque mines, all young men except one or two, came up and had a talk with the Sioux and Col. Morgan, in which each expressed a desire to continue the peace which had been concluded between them the last year. The Foxes denied any knowledge of a war party having gone against the Sioux. They said they wished to be at peace, and would not do any act of hostility, but they could not answer for those below—they spoke for themselves only. They smoked and danced together and parted in apparent friendship and harmony.”

The extent of the frontier and the number of tribes within the agency kept up an almost incessant excitement as to their affairs, and to keep the government advised of all their movements, required constant vigilance and the writing of numerous letters. Under date of June 13, 1831, Mr. Burnett writes to Gen. Clark: “I have received since the last mail from this place information which I consider entitled to credit, that a war party of Sioux is now being organized among Wabasha’s band to go against the Chippewa’s, by a warrior of some note in the band. I have also understood that there are a few Menomonee’s, relatives of those who were killed by the Chippewa’s in the fall and winter past, now with the band of Sioux. But I have not been able to learn whether they intend joining the Sioux in their expedition or not, but think it probable that some of them will do so.”

Under date of June 29 he wrote: “I am informed by Major Langham, who arrived here from below a few days since, that the Winnebago’s of the Prophet’s village on Rock river, have united with the Sauk’s and Foxes. The Winnebago’s of the Wisconsin and Upper Mississippi are still peaceable. They are most likely waiting to see the first results of the movements below, and intend to act afterwards according to circumstances.

“Until within two or three weeks past, very few of those Indians have visited this place for a length of time, fewer, I am told, than usual at this season of the year. Lately a great many of them have been here, the most of whom came down the Wisconsin and have gone up the Mississippi. A great portion of them are old men, women and children. They continue to pass by daily. Many rumors are in circulation as to their present disposition and intention; very few of which are, perhaps, entitled to implicit belief. They have served, however, to give considerable alarm to many of the inhabitants of the Prairie, and many of them begin to think themselves in danger. I have spared no pains to ascertain the disposition of the Winnebago’s here and have found no evidence of a disposition to hostilities on their part, unless their sending so many of their old men, women and children up the river and purchasing powder in larger quantities than usual for ordinary hunting, should indicate something of the kind.

“I also learned a few days since that the one-eyed Decori had left his village at Prairie La Crosse and gone down to the Sauk’s and Foxes. This was accidentally communicated to my informant by a Winnebago and is probably true. Decori was down about two weeks since and called to see me on his return home. His deportment was as usual; I saw no change. In fact I have not discovered any change in the deportment or appearance of any of them that I have seen. They all appear to be perfectly friendly. None of the traders here think they have any hostile intentions.

“Col. Morgan left the fort for Rock Island on the morning of the 27th inst., with two companies from his post, and two more from Fort Winnebago, under Major Twiggs. He had previously called in all fatigue parties and put his whole force under a course of training. Much alarm prevails in the mines. The people are arming and preparing for their defense. I do not consider that there is any immediate danger either here or in this vicinity. Much, however, will doubtless depend on the result below. The Sioux and Menomonee’s are certainly friendly, and against the Sauk’s and Foxes, would willingly unite with the whites if permitted to do so. I have heard nothing since my last of a war party of those Indians against the Chippewa’s.”

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

In February, 1832, Mr. Burnett was in Kentucky, when Gen. Street wrote him that "the Menomonee's and Sioux are preparing for a retaliatory war against the Sauk's and Foxes in the spring. The Menomonee's have made peace with the Chippewa's, in order to have no fears from that quarter. The two tribes met above the mill on the Chippewa and made their peace. I have advised the superintendent so as to have the earliest interference, if any is intended. The Sauk's and Foxes, I learn, expect retaliation and will be prepared to meet them. If the government is not early in stopping them, they will certainly go in considerable force, and a bloody contest may be expected."

About the 1st of April Mr. Burnett received instructions, while yet in Shelbyville, to "proceed to the agency at Prairie du Chien, by way of St. Louis, and call on Gen. Clark for the funds allotted to the agency for 1832, or such portion thereof as he shall determine to forward. The receipts will be forwarded to you at St. Louis as soon as a conveyance by steamboat shall occur." Mr. Burnett reached the agency about the 1st of May. At that time the Sauk's and Foxes under Black Hawk were in hostile movements on Rock river, with Gen. Atkinson in pursuit. To aid in the defense of the country, Gen. Atkinson, from Dixon's ferry, May 26, 1832, addressed Gen. Street as follows:

"SIR:—I have to request that you send me at this place, with as little delay as possible, as many Menomonee and Sioux Indians as can be collected, within striking distance of Prairie du Chien. I want to employ them in conjunction with the troops against the Sauk's and Foxes, who are now some fifty miles above us in a state of war against the whites. I understand the Menomonee's, to the number of 300 warriors, who were with you a few days ago, are anxious to take part with us. Do encourage them to do so, and promise them rations, blankets, pay, etc. I have written to Capt. Loomis to furnish them some arms, if they can be spared, and ammunition. If there are none at Prairie du Chien, I must procure some in this quarter. Col.

Hamilton, who has volunteered his services to lead the Indians to this place, will hand you this letter; and if the Indians can be prevailed on to come, will perform the duty. I have to desire that Mr. Marsh may be sent with Col. Hamilton and the Indians, and an interpreter of the Menomonee language." In accordance with this requirement, Gen. Street gave, on May 30, to Mr. Burnett the following instructions:

"SIR:—You will please proceed with John Marsh, who goes express to the nearest Sioux village, and render him such aid as may be necessary in obtaining as many Indians as possible, to come down with you, and proceed under the command of Mr. Marsh to join Gen. Atkinson. The letter of Gen. Atkinson will be your guide in the business. Use every means to expedite the object; and hasten your return, as much depends upon the expedition."

The nearest Sioux village was 130 miles up the river from the seat of the agency, which had to be ascended in canoes, there being no steamer then to be had. Yet in six days after receiving the order, Mr. Burnett made the following report to Gen. Street:

"SIR:—In obedience to your order of the 30th ult., I set out immediately from this place, in company with Mr. Marsh, in a canoe, with eight hands, to visit the nearest village of the Sioux Indians. From recent indications among the Winnebago's of the Upper Mississippi of a disposition to engage in hostilities with the Sauk's and Foxes, Mr. Marsh and myself thought best to call at their village on the river La Crosse, and invite so many as might be disposed to join us on our return, and go with the Sioux and Menomonee's to join Gen. Atkinson's army on Rock river. We arrived at the Winnebago village on the evening of the next day after leaving this post, and that night had a talk with the chiefs and braves on the subject. Win-o-a-she-kan was opposed to the measure, and declined having anything to do with it. He said the Sauk's had twice, this season, presented the red wampum to the Winnebago's at Portage, and that they had as often washed it white, and handed it back to them; that he did not like that red thing, he was afraid of it. Waudgh-ha-ta-kan took the wampum, and said that he, with all the young men of the village, would go; that they were anxious to engage in the expedition, and would be ready to accompany us on our return.

"The next day we reached Prairie Aux Ailes [Wabasha], and found the Sioux extensively anxious and ready to go against the Sauk's and Foxes. They were intending to make a descent upon them in a few days, if they had not been sent for. They engaged with alacrity in their preparations, but we found it necessary to wait till Monday morning to give them time. We left their village on our return, at 9 o'clock in the forenoon, accompanied by the whole effective force of the band, and at La Crosse were joined by twenty warriors of the Winnebago, the remainder of their village to follow the next day, and reached this place to-day, at 2 o'clock P. M., with 100 warriors, eighty of whom are Sioux, and twenty, Winnebago's. I think, from the disposition manifested by the Winnebago's, that fifty or sixty more of them will be here before the expedition leaves the Prairie, making a force of 130 or 140. The Indians with whom I have met appear well effected towards the whites, are in fine spirits and seem anxious to engage with the Sauk's and Foxes.

"I made the promise authorized to the Indians of subsistence, pay, etc, and told them that their families should be supplied with provisions during their absence from home. The most of the families of the warriors have accompanied them thus far to take a supply of provisions home with them, when the expedition shall have left this place. It is due to Mr. Marsh to say that he has displayed great zeal and energy in effecting the object of our visit, and that his exertions had the effect of bringing out the greatest possible force from the bands we have called upon."

Mr. Burnett greatly desired and strongly urged

Gen. Street to allow him to accompany these Indians and take part in the war. But the general thought his services were needed at and near the agency, and, therefore, declined to comply with the request.

In the meantime the Sauk's and Foxes retreated from the Rock river to the Wisconsin, where they were routed, "horse, foot and dragoons." The news of this defeat of the Indians is soon reached Prairie du Chien, and it was thought probable that if the Sauk's and Foxes could get canoes, or even rafts, that they would attempt to escape from their pursuers by descending the Wisconsin river. To prevent this, some volunteer troops were stationed on that river at the ferry, now Barrett's. But the Indians took across the country towards Bad .Ax.

AN EPISODE OF THE BLACK HAWK WAR.

As soon as it was ascertained that the hostile Indians under Black Hawk were wending their way to the Mississippi, after the battle of Wisconsin heights, Joseph M. Street, Indian agent, wrote to Thomas P. Burnett, sub-Indian agent, with a view to adopt means to intercept the savages, the following letter, on the 25th of July, 1832:

"SIR—You will proceed up the Mississippi to the Winnebago's, twenty-five or thirty miles above this place, and inform them of the crossing of the Sauk's to the north side of the Wisconsin, and that their chiefs, Carramana and Decori, are here, and that I want all of the Winnebago's to come down with you immediately; tell them it is the wish of their chiefs also. One object of this is, to get them out of the way with their canoes, to prevent their crossing the Sauk's over the river. Send on word, if you can, to the upper villages, that the Sauk's have been defeated, and have crossed the Wisconsin. And should the Winnebago's hesitate, tell them if they do not come I will not pay the annuity to any who refuse. The time's now near and they will lose their money. Hasten back as soon as possible."

The next day, July 26, Mr. Burnett reported:

“SIR:—In obedience to your order of yesterday, I set out from this place in a bark canoe late last evening to visit the Winnebago’s, supposed to be encamped twenty-five or thirty miles above Prairie du Chien. This morning before day the steamboat Enterprise, with a military command, came by my encampment and took myself and crew on board. Before arriving at the place where the Indians had been encamped, we found that they had been gone for several days, and had removed some distance above.

“We therefore continued on up a considerable distance, passing several lodges at different points, until we came to the principal camp, on the east side of the river, supposed to be sixty miles above Prairie du Chien. I communicated your message to all the Indians I saw on the way, who readily promised to obey your instructions.

“At the principal camp I found Washington Decori with a considerable part of the tribe from the Wisconsin and Kickapoo rivers. I immediately informed them of your request, and desired them to get ready as soon as possible and go to the agency. They manifested entire willingness to do so, but said some of their party were out hunting, and would be in at night, for whom they wished to wait, so that all might come together. They promised very positively that they would start as soon as the hunters should arrive, and would certainly see you by the middle of the afternoon tomorrow. After some conversation about their starting this evening, and their still objecting to do so until the hunters came in, Lieut. Abercrombie told them that he would wait until sunset for them to get ready, and if they did not start by that time, he would take all their canoes and bring them down with the steamboat. About two hours after this they concluded to start and let the hunters come on after them; and after seeing all the canoes move off, we started on our return, and reached this place at 9 o’clock this evening. The Indians whom I saw will be here tomorrow by 12 o’clock. They had not heard of the battle on the Wisconsin, but appeared to be highly gratified and pleased at the news.”

The next day, July 27, Gen. Street ordered Mr. Burnett to “proceed with Washington Decori to La Crosse, and such other points as you may deem important, and tell the Winnebago’s I wish to see them at the agency. I wish Winneshiek certainly to come. Much must be left to your own judgment in the case. The object is to get what information you can relative to the Sauk’s and Foxes, and to draw all the Winnebago’s from the Upper Mississippi, and with them the means of passing the river, if you can, extend the news to the Sioux.”

The following day Mr. Burnett reported to Gen. Street: "In obedience to your order of yesterday, I went on board the steamer Enterprise last evening, and started for La Crosse. We arrived early this morning at the entrance of the lower mouth of Black river and found the Winnebago’s encamped on the shore. I took Wekon Decori, and went on shore immediately to see the Indians. I found the one-eyed Decori, and the Little Thunder at the lodges, but found that most of the band had left the village sometime since. Winneshiek and Waumarnarsar, with about fifteen men and their families, had been gone near a month to hunt and dry meat about fifty miles up La Crosse and Black rivers. The rest of the band were in the camp. I told them that you wished to see them immediately; that the Americans under Gen. Dodge had defeated the Sauk’s and Foxes on the Wisconsin, and after killing a great many, had driven them across the river; that the defeated Indians were endeavoring to make their escape to the Mississippi for the purpose of crossing it and regaining their own country; and that it was probable they would attempt to reach that point, that they might get the Winnebago canoes to cross in, and that they must get away from that place before the Sauk’s and Foxes arrived.

“They said they would come down immediately on the return of the absent party; that they were afraid of the Sauk’s, and did not wish to leave a small part of their band behind, who were too few to resist if they would meet them. I then told them to send two of their best young men on horseback to bring in the hunting party. They very promptly complied, and in a short time the young men were mounted and on their way. I charged the express to carry to the absent Indians the message I had delivered, and to tell Winneshiek especially, that his presence was required at the agency. The chiefs present told me that they thought they would all be here certainly in six days, and probably sooner. I told them it was of great importance to them to come as soon as possible, and bring all their canoes on the river; that if the Sauk’s should come to that point they were not strong enough to prevent them from taking their canoes (if they did not kill them), and crossing over the river; that should they effect a passage to the west side of the river, at any point above this place, within their country, they would be suspected of assisting them, and if it should be known that they had done so, they would lose their annuities and be treated as allies of the Sauk’s and Foxes. They promised to start for this place on the return of the absent party and bring all their canoes with them. From their apparent anxiety, I think they will be here in three or four days at the farthest, though they said it might be six.

“The Sioux chief, L’Ark, who left this place on the evening of the 25th inst., passed Black river this morning before our arrival, and will reach his people with the news (which he received from here) today. Having done all we could, we left La Crosse at 10 A. M., and reached this place at 3 P. M., making ninety miles in five hours.”

It was but a few days after this the 2d of August, 1832, that Gen. Atkinson over-hauled the broken fragments of Black Hawk’s army, fatigued, hungry and dispirited, and attacked them on the bottoms of the Mississippi, a few miles below the mouth of Bad Ax river, about forty-five miles above Prairie du Chien, and totally defeated and scattered them, as related in a previous chapter. Black Hawk was soon after taken prisoner by a company of Winnebago’s.

Mr. Burnett met them soon after the capture, to whom Black Hawk gave a piece of red ribbon which was tied to his hair.

AFTER THE BATTLE OF BAD AX.

[BY JOHN A. WAKEFIELD, 1833.]

As soon as the battle was over, all the wounded were collected to one place, and, with those of our enemy, were examined and their wounds dressed; there was no difference here between our men and our enemy. The different surgeons did their best for both. They were no longer able to do us any harm, but were in our power and begging for mercy, and we acted like a civilized people, although it was with the worst kind of enemies, and one that had done so much mischief and had taken away so many of the lives of our fellow citizens.

We had killed and wounded a great many of these wretched wanderers, that have no home in the world, but are like the wild beasts, more than man, wandering from forest to forest, and not making any improvement in the natural mind. All their study is how to proceed in the chase, or take scalps in time of war. But, although they are a miserable race of people, and live a wretched life, they are much frightened when they see death staring them in the face, which was the case at this time. When we came upon the squaws and children, they raised a scream and cry loud enough to affect the stoutest man upon earth. If they had shown themselves they would have come off much better, but fear prevented them, and in their retreat, trying to hide from us, many of them were killed, but contrary to the wish of every man, as neither officer nor private intended to have spilt the blood of those squaws and children. But such was their fate; some of them were killed, but not intentionally by any man, as all were men of too much sense of honor and feeling to have killed any but those who were able to harm us. We all well knew the squaws and children could do us no harm and could not help what the old Black Hawk and the other chiefs did.

The prisoners we took seemed to lament their ever having raised arms against the United States, and appeared to blame the Black Hawk and the Prophet for the miserable condition that their tribe was then in, but at the same time appeared to rejoice that they were prisoners of war, which plainly showed that they had some faith in our humanity and that they would exchange the life they were then living for any other. They appeared to manifest every token of honesty in their examination. They stated that Black Hawk had stolen off up the river at the commencement of the battle, with some few of his warriors and a few squaws and children. I think the number of warriors was ten, and thirty-five women and children, or, in other words, four lodges, which is the Indian phrase, as they do not know how to count by numbers. They were examined respecting the first battle we had with them on the Wisconsin, and they stated that we killed sixty-eight on the field of action, and that twenty-five had died since from their wounds, making in all ninety-three that we are certain we killed in that battle, besides a number more that there is no doubt still lingered and died with their wounds.

Putting together what were killed in the two battles, and all the little skirmishes, we must have destroyed upwards of 400 of these unhappy and miserable beings, which was occasioned no doubt by the superstitious ideas which were instilled into their minds by the Prophet. Although I have already stated that these unhappy wanderers make no improvement in the natural mind, they still, by instinct, believe in an overruling Providence, and are the most credulous people upon earth, They pay much attention to their dreams, and if one of their Nation dreams much, he soon takes the name of prophet, as they believe it to be a visitation of the Great Spirit. One morning I chanced to rise very early, and taking a walk through the encampment, accidentally wandered to where the Indians were encamped. It was just at the dawn of day, and they were just beginning their morning worship of the Great Spirit. I had often heard that these uninformed children of the forest believed that there was a God, and tried to worship Him, which made me call a halt to see if what I had heard respecting this unhappy people was true. They commenced by three of them standing up with their faces to the east; one of them commenced a kind of talk, as though he was talking to some person at a distance, at the same time shaking a gourd, which from the rattling I should have taken to be full of pebbles or beans. The other two stood very still, looking towards the east; the others were all sitting around in the most perfect silence, when the old prophet, priest, or whatever they called him, commenced a kind of song, which I believe is the common one sung by the Indians on all occasions. It was as near as I could make it out, in the following words:

"He-aw aw-he-aw-how-he-aw-hum," with a great many elevations and falls in their tone, and beating time with the gourd of pebbles. When this song was sung, they commenced a kind of prayer, which I thought the most solemn thing I had witnessed. It was a long monotonous note, occasionally dropping by a number of tones at once, to a low and unearthly murmur. When he had done he handed the gourd of pebbles to one of the two that stood by him, who went, as near as I could ascertain through the same ceremony, still shaking the gourd. When he had done he handed it to the third, who went through the same motions, and making use of the same words that the first two had done, which I suppose was, a supplication or prayer to the Great Spirit to give them plenty to eat, and strength to conquer their enemies.

It is stated by those who are acquainted with this race of people, that they are very much afraid of offending the Great Spirit. If they have bad luck in hunting, they think it is caused by their having offended the Great Spirit, and they make an atonement, by offering up or making sacrifice of something that they set much store by, such as burning their tobacco, or something else that they dote upon very much, but there is nothing in this world that they think more of than tobacco, as smoking they think is almost as indispensably necessary as eating.

I must now return to the battle ground with my subject. After the battle was all over, and the wounded all attended to, the prisoners and the wounded of both parties were put on board of the steamboat Warrior, and taken down to Prairie du Chien, where the wounded were taken to the hospital and the prisoners put in confinement.

The boat returned to us the next morning. We are still at the battle ground, or near it; whilst we lay there our men were still picking up scattering Indians. They brought in an old chief who was wounded. He was very poor, between six and seven feet high, and what hair was on his head was gray, but that was not much, as the most of it was shaved off, just leaving enough for hand-hold to scalp him by, as these superstitious beings think it would be a mark of cowardice to cut off this tuft of hair, which they call their scalp. These superstitious beings believe that if they are maimed or disfigured in this world they will appear in the same form, which is the reason they scarcely ever bury their dead. If he should chance to lose his scalp they think that it would show in the next world that he had been conquered and scalped by an enemy which would go to show that he was not a great warrior.

Gen. Atkinson now thought he had taken just retribution for the blood these Indians had spilt on our frontiers, and saw that it would be useless to cross the river, in pursuit of those wretched beings for they were now scattered and hid in the swamps, so that it was an impossible thing to take many of them. He finally came to the conclusion to drop down to Prairie du Chien and have a talk with the Winnebago's, for it was now manifest that they had been allies to the Sacs and Foxes, for the prisoners that we took in this action put all doubts to rest on this score. We had a long time believed that they were acting treacherously and Gen. Atkinson now thought that it was time to bring them to an account for their conduct. He accordingly on the second day after the battle, which was the 4th of August, took up the line of march for Prairie du Chien, but before Gen. Atkinson left the battle ground he provisioned a number of Sioux and some Winnebago's and sent them in search of Black Hawk to see if they could not capture him, and bring him in as a prisoner, which the Sioux appeared to be anxious to do as the Sacs and they had been at variance a long time and they saw that there was no chance of taking revenge for the many injuries the Sacs had done them. Gen. Atkinson and the infantry went down on the steamboat Warrior and reached Prairie du Chien the same day we started. The mounted men, baggage and all, went down by land and reached Prairie du Chien the next day, which was the 5th of August. On entering the settlement of Prairie du Chien we witnessed a very novel scene. The Menomonee Indians were rejoicing at the defeat of the Sacs and Foxes, and were expressing it by music and dancing. They had obtained several scalps, amongst which were some of the squaws, which they always gave to their squaws. They had given their squaws several of them and were making music for them to dance around them. It was, as near as I could observe, in the following way:

The men all stood in a row with gourds in their hands, shaking them in a very regular order, while one old fellow was beating on the head a kind of drum, which is generally a deer skin stretched over a hollow gum, sawed to the length of our drums. They never use but one stick and that very slow. The squaws were all paraded in front of the men, facing them, and the squaws, who were related to those whom the Sacs and Foxes killed in 1831, held scalps of the Sacs and Foxes squaws on long poles, and stood in the center between the two lines shaking them, while the other squaws and the men danced around them, apparently trying to keep time with the rattling of the gourds and the sound of the drum and all at the same time singing the song usually sung by all Nations of Indians, consisting only of a few simple words that I have already repeated; but they rise and fall very singularly and always beat time to the song with their feet; when the song gets to the highest pitch they jump up very high and sometimes stamp with their feet. They generally bend forward toward each other, sometimes with their noses so close as to touch. The squaws appeared to exert all the power they were master of in shaking the scalps, and using their feet at the same time with the drummer and the gourd shaker, and from their countenances they appeared to be perfectly happy.

Gen. Atkinson, on the second day after we arrived at Prairie du Chien, had the principal chiefs of the Winnebago's, and a few of the Menomonee's, at Gen. Street's, the Indian agent at Prairie du Chien, and had a talk with them. He told them that they had given him reason to think they were not true to him, as he had caught them in many lies, which they tried to deny. He then accused Winneshiek of aiding the Sacs, and inquired of him where his two sons were. The answer of Winneshiek was, that he did not know where they were. Gen. Atkinson then asked him if they were not with Black Hawk. His answer was that one had been with him, but he did not know where he was then. Gen. Atkinson then ordered him to be put in prison until his sons could be produced. He then had a talk with the Menomonee's, who had never been at war with the United States. They professed all the friendship in the world for our government; and stated, that they had never done us any harm, and did not tell lies, and that if they wanted to do any harm now that they would not know how. This was a little Menomonee chief, whose name I do not recollect. Gen. Atkinson talked very friendly to him and advised him to pursue the same friendly course towards the United States, and they would be well treated. When this chief was done he made a request of Gen. Atkinson, whom he termed father, to give each of his young men a pair of shoes, and stated that their feet were worn out with walking. He then went on to explain that when he said shoes he meant horses, and stated that his young men had been promised a horse apiece, and had not got them. Gen. Atkinson promised that they should have them, or that he would see to it, I do not recollect which. On the next day, about 11 o'clock, Winneshiek's sons were brought in, both badly wounded, which went to confirm that he and his sons were allies to the Sacs and Foxes. They had been wounded in the battle on the Mississippi. They were put in confinement August 7.

Gen. Scott and suite arrived this morning in the steamboat Warrior, and assumed the command of the whole army, to which station he had been appointed sometime previous, but was unable to come on sooner, in consequence of cholera breaking out in his army. He came past several posts and discharged the men wherever he found them.

Gen. Scott concluded to discharge the army (or the mounted volunteers) that were then in the field, and demanded Black Hawk, of Keokuk, as both men and horses were nearly worn out with fatigue. Accordingly, on the 8th day of August, we left the tented fields and took up our line of march to Dixon's, on Rock river, the place appointed for us to be discharged at (or mustered out of the service of the United States). All now were eager to press forward. We had turned our faces toward our respective homes, and notwithstanding that we, as well as our horses, were nearly worn out with the fatiguing marches, through the swamps and over the mountains, yet all were cheerful, and every heart seemed to leap for joy, at the thought of being free from the toils and hardships of a soldier, to return again to the embraces of a wife and children, or a father and mother, brothers and sisters, and to mingle once more in the walks and society of the fair sex, which appears to be a sovereign balm to man in all his afflictions.

On this day, just at night, we met about 300 Menomonee Indians in company of an American officer from Green Bay, coming to join in pursuit of the Sac and Fox Indians. We happened to meet them in a prairie. The officer advanced and met us, or we certainly would have fired upon them. When we came up to them they appeared almost to lament that they had not got in before we had the last battle, in order that they could have had an opportunity of assisting us in the work of death to our common enemy. For they are, as I have already stated, great enemies to the Menomonee Indians. When they left us they seemed to press forward with more vigor, as it was their object to pursue the balance of the Sacs and Foxes, who had made their escape.

On the next day we began to reach the settlements in the mining country. This was again a solemn scene. The farms had mostly been sown in grain of some kind or other. Those that were in small grain were full ripe for the sickle; but behold! the husbandman was not there to enjoy the benefits of his former labor by thrusting in the scythe and sickle and gathering in his grain, which was fast going to destruction. All appeared to be solitary, and truly presented a state of mourning. But as we advanced a little further into the more thickly settled parts we would occasionally see the smoke just beginning to make its appearance from the top of the chimneys, as some of the inhabitants thought it would be as well to risk dying by the tomahawk and scalping-knife as to lose their grain and die by famine, and others had received information that we had slain in battle their troublesome enemy, who had driven them from their homes and slain many of their neighbors. Whenever we approached a house there is no telling the joy it would give to the desolate man who had lately emerged from some fort, and had left his wife and children still in it while he ventured to his home to save something for them to subsist upon. I must confess it filled my heart with gratitude and joy to think that I had been instrumental, with many others, in delivering my country of those merciless savages, and restoring those people again to their peaceful homes and firesides, there to enjoy in safety the sweets of a retired life, for a fort is to a husbandman what jail is to the prisoner. The inhabitants of this district of country had been shut up in forts for the last three months, through fear of becoming a prey to Indian barbarity.

Nothing very interesting occurred on our march to Dixon's. Lieut. Anderson, of the United States army, met us at this point, and by the 17th of August mustered us all out of the service of the United States. We sheathed our swords and buried our tomahawks and each man again became his own commander and shaped his own course toward his home, to enjoy the social society of his relatives and friends, in the pursuit of their different avocations in life.

CAPTURE OF BLACK HAWK AND THE PROPHET

After the battle of Bad. Ax, when Black Hawk's band was totally defeated, Brevet Brigadier-General H. Atkinson, of the United States army, and Joseph M. Street, agent for the Winnebago's at Prairie du Chien, told the principal chiefs of that Nation, that if they would bring in the Black Hawk and the Prophet, it would be well for them, and that the government of the United States would hold them in future as friends and treat them kindly, and that they would not, by so doing, be considered any longer the friends of the hostile Sacs and Foxes.

On this declaration, the one-eyed chief, called the Decori, and Cheater took some of their men with them and went in pursuit of these Sac chiefs, in order, if possible, to take them prisoners and bring them and deliver them up to the Indian agent at Prairie du Chien. On the 27th of August, these two Winnebago chiefs returned, bringing with them the Black Hawk and the Prophet, the principal movers and instigators of the war. The interview with them at Prairie du Chien, I have been told, was a very interesting scene. I will give the reader the substance of their talk with Indian Agent Street and Col. Zachary Taylor, which will go to show how vigilant and with what perseverance these Winnebago chiefs acted to take these prisoners. They were upwards of twenty days gone, after they left Prairie du Chien, before they returned with them.

When they arrived, Black Hawk desired to speak to Indian Agent Street. The amount of what he said was that he was not the originator of the war; that he was going where he would meet Keokuk, and then he would tell the truth: that he would then tell all about this war which had caused so much trouble; that there were chiefs and braves of the Nation who were the cause of the continuance of the war; that he did not want to hold any council with him; that when he got where Keokuk was he would tell the whole of the origin of the difficulties and of those who committed it; that he wanted to surrender long ago, but others refused; that he wanted to surrender to the steamboat Warrior, and tried to do so until the second fire; that he then ran and went up the river and never returned to the battle ground; and his determination then was to escape if he could; that he did not intend to surrender after that, but that when the Winnebago's came upon him, he gave up; and that he would tell all about the disturbance when he got to Rock Island.

The one-eyed Decori and the Cheater both in like manner addressed Mr. Street, whom they term their father; which almost all the Indians do their agents. The one-eyed Decori rose first and addressed him in the following manner:

“My father, I now stand before you. When we parted I told you we would return soon; but I could not come any sooner. We had to go a great distance [to the dales, dells, on the Wisconsin river above the portage]; you see we have done what you sent us to do. These are the two you told us to get (pointing to Black Hawk and the Prophet). We always do what you tell us to do, because we know it is for our good. My father, you told us to get these men, and it would be the cause of much good to the Winnebago's. We have brought them, but it has been very hard for us to do it. That one Macatamish Kakacky—was a great way off. You told us to bring them alive; we have done so. If you had told us to bring their heads alone, we would have done so; and it would have been less difficult for us to do, than what we have done. My father, we deliver these men into your hands; we would not deliver them even to our brother, the chief of the warriors, but to you, because we know you and believe you are our friend. We want you to keep them safe. If they are to be hurt, we do not wish to see it; wait until we are gone before it is done. My father, many little birds have been flying about our ears of late, and we thought they whispered to us that there was evil intended for us, but now we hope the evil birds will let our ears alone.

“My father, we know you are our friend, because you take our part; this is the reason we do what you tell us to do. My father, you say you love your red children; we think we love you as much or more than you love us. My father, we have been promised a great deal if we would take these men, that it would do much good for our people; we now hope to see what will be done for us. My father, we have come in haste and are tired and hungry; we now put these men in your hands. We have done all you told us to do.”

Mr. Street, the agent of the Winnebago’s, then said:

“My children, you have done well. I told you to bring these men to me, and you have done so. I am pleased at what you have done. I will tend to your good; and, for this reason, I am well pleased. I assured the great chief of the warriors that, if these men were in your country, you would find them and bring them to me; that I believed you would do what I directed you to do. Now, I can say much for your good. I will go down to Rock Island with the prisoners, and I wish you who have brought these men especially to go with me, and such other chiefs and warriors as you may select. My children, the great chief of the warriors, when he left this place, directed me to deliver these and all other prisoners to the chief of the warriors, Col. Taylor, who is by my side.

“Some of the Winnebago’s on the south side of the Wisconsin river have befriended the Sacs, and some of the Indians of my agency have given them aid; this was wrong and displeased the great chief of the warriors and your great father, the President, and was calculated to do much harm. My children, your great father, the President at Washington, has sent a great war chief from the far east, Gen. Scott, with a fresh army of soldiers, who is now at Rock Island.

“Your great father has sent him and the governor of Illinois to hold a council with the Indians at Rock Island; he has sent a speech to you; and he wishes the chiefs and warriors of the Winnebago’s to meet him in council on the 10th of September next. I wish you to be ready to go along with me to Rock Island.

“My children, I am well pleased that you have taken Black Hawk and the Prophet and so many others, because it will enable me to say much for you to the great chief of the warriors and your great father, the President. I shall now deliver these two men, Black Hawk and the Prophet, to the chief of the warriors here, Col. Taylor, who will take good care of them until we start to Rock Island.”

Col. Taylor then said:

“The great chief of the warriors told me to take the prisoners when you should bring them and send them to Rock Island to him. I will take them and keep them safe, but use them well, and will send them by you and Mr. Street when you go down to the council, which will be in a few days. Your friend, Mr. Street, advised you to get ready and go down soon, and so do. I tell you again, I will take the prisoners and keep them safe, but will do them no harm. I will deliver them to the great chief of the warriors, and he will do with them in such manner as he may be ordered by your great father, the President.”

Cheater, a Winnebago, said to Mr. Street, the agent:

“My father, I am young and don’t know how to make speeches. This is the second time I ever spoke to you before the people. My father, I am no chief, I am no orator, but I have been allowed to speak to you. My father, if I shall not speak as well as others, still you must listen to me.

“My father, when you made the speech to the chiefs, Waugh-kan-decorri, Carimane, the one-eyed Decorri, and others, the other day; I was there. I heard you. I thought what you said to them you also said to me. You said if these two (pointing to Black Hawk and the Prophet) were taken by us and brought to you there would never any more a black cloud hang over your Winnebago’s. My father, your words entered into my ears, into my brain and into my heart. I left here that very night and you know you have not seen me since, until now. My father, I have been a great way. I had much trouble; but when I remembered what you said I knew you were right. This made me keep on and do what you told me. Near the dale [dells] on the Wisconsin river I took Black Hawk. No one did it but me. I say this in the ears of all present, and they know it; and now I appeal to the Great Spirit, our Grand Mother, for the truth of what I say. My father, I am no chief, but what I have done is for the benefit of my own Nation, and I hope for the good that has been promised us. My father, that one, Waboki-shick, is my relation. If he is to be hurt I do not wish to see it. My father, soldiers sometimes stick the ends of their guns [bayonets] into the back of Indian prisoners when they are going about in the hands of the guard. I hope this will not be done to these men."

DEATH OF BLACK HAWK.

Black Hawk was sent as a prisoner from Prairie du Chien to Jefferson barracks, under charge of Lieut. Jefferson Davis—then in the United States army at Prairie du Chien, and thirty years later President of the Confederate States. Black Hawk was kept a close prisoner until April, 1833, when he was taken to Washington, together with some of his family and the Prophet. After an interview with President Jackson, and being emphatically told by him that the government would compel the red men to be at peace, they were sent as prisoners to Fortress Monroe, for "levying war," as Jefferson Davis was, thirty-two years later, for the same offense. On June 4, 1833, by order of the President, Black Hawk and his fellow prisoners were liberated and sent home, under officers appointed to conduct them through the principal cities of the Union, in order to impress them with a proper sense of the power of the whites and of the hopelessness of any conflict on the part of the Indians with the government of the United States. Black Hawk ever after remained quiet. He died Oct. 3, 1838, and was buried on the banks of the Mississippi, in the State of Iowa, near the head of the Des Moines rapids, where the village of Montrose is located.

JOHN H. FONDA'S NARRATIVE.

The Black Hawk War commenced this year, [1832]. Some of Dodge's recruiting officers were drumming arming here. I met and got acquainted with one, named White, and enlisted during the war. A quartermaster was up here buying horses. He purchased near 500 head, and I went with them down to the mouth of Rock river, where the army under Atkinson was encamped.

I was under Dodge's command of Illinois volunteers, and a wilder, more independent set of dare-devils I never saw. They had a free-and-easy, devil-may-care appearance about them, that is never seen in the regulars, and Gen. Dodge of all others, was the officer to lead them. A number of Sioux, Winnebago's and some Menomonee's joined the forces on Rock river. I was in the ranks, and my opportunities for knowing and seeing the movements of the army, from the encampment on Rock river to the Four lakes, and to the Wisconsin bluffs, were limited.

Generals Atkinson, Dodge, Henry and Alexander, led the different commands. The force under Dodge, consisted of 200 or 300 men, and we proceeded to the lakes, through the swamps toward Black Hawk's camp on Rock river. Gen. Dodge was impatient to engage the Indians, and urged the men on; but orders came for our men to proceed to headquarters, where we immediately went.

From Gen. Atkinson's camp we were marched to Fort Winnebago, from where we started in pursuit of the Indians, who there held the two Hall girls prisoners, and were camped at Rock River Rapids. Gen. Henry's and Dodge's men reached the Rapids, but the Indians had retreated. Information was received that the Indians were making westward, and getting on their trail, we followed them rapidly for two days; the scouts discovered many Indians on the second day about camp near the lake. The pursuit was renewed on the day after reaching the lakes, where one or more of the Indians was killed. Our men led the chase, next after the scouts, who were continually firing at the Indians. The Indians continued to retreat, until they reached the Wisconsin river, where some made a stand and showed fight, while the others crossed the river. Here we were fired on by the Indians, and one man was killed and several wounded. We returned their fire with effect, and then charged them, killing a good many, all of whom were scalped by the wild Sucker volunteers.

Soon after the skirmish on Wisconsin bluffs, Gen. Atkinson came up, and the entire army crossed the river at Pine Bend, (Helena,) and took the trail on the opposite side, and followed it seven or eight miles, in the direction of Prairie du Chien. When it was discovered that the Indians were making for the Mississippi, Gen. Atkinson sent me with little Boiseley to carry a dispatch to Fort Crawford, that the inhabitants might be ready to prevent the Indians crossing in any canoes or boats belonging to the citizens. Boiseley and I traveled day and night, and arrived at the fort without seeing an Indian. Black Hawk and his people, with the army in pursuit, had turned north ward, intending to ford the Kickapoo high up.

It was on the 1st day of August when Boiseley and I reached the Sugar Loaf, at the south end of the prairie. As we were taking a look over the prairie, previous to starting for the fort, we saw the smoke and steam of a boat coming up the river, just off the mouth of the Wisconsin. We hastened on, and reached the fort as the steamer Warrior made the government landing. I reported myself to Capt. Loomis, and was directed to go up the river in the boat. I assisted to get a six-pounder from the fort on to the Warrior, which cannon was managed by five other persons and myself, and was the only cannon fired at the Indians—if not the only one aboard.

The steamboat Warrior was commanded by Thockmorton, and Lieut. Kingsbury was aboard with a body of regulars. The cannon was placed on the forward part of the boat, without a defense of any kind; and I have the names of the five persons who assisted to manage it, for they got on at the Prairie when I did.

The boat steamed up stream with all on board anxious to get a pop at the Indians. Just above where Lansing is, we picked up a soldier, who had been discharged from Fort Snelling, and was coming down the river in a canoe. He had come down the west channel, on the Minnesota side opposite Bad Ax, and, fortunately for him, he did not meet the Indians. We came in sight of the Indians south of the Bad Ax river; they were collected together on a bench of the land close to the Mississippi, and were making efforts to get their women across.

Capt. Dickson's scouts had not come up yet, and the Indians raised a white flag and endeavored to induce the boat to approach the east shore, and succeeded in bringing her close enough to pour a shower of balls into her. The cannon sent a shower of canister amongst the Indians, which was repeated three times, each time mowing a swath clean through them. After discharging the gun three times, (there were only three charges of canister shot aboard,) the Indians retreated to the low ground back from the shore, where, lying on their bellies, they were safe from us.

A continual firing of small arms was kept up between the persons on board the boat and the Indians ashore, until the fire-wood gave out, when we were obliged to put back to Prairie du Chien to wood up—for there were no wood yards on the Mississippi as now. The village was roused to carry wood aboard, and we soon had a sufficient quantity of that article. A lot of Menomonee Indians were also taken on, and then, under a full head of steam, we put back to the scene of the battle.

Before we rounded the island, and got within sight of the battle-ground, we could hear the report of musketry, and then it was that I heard Thockmorton say: "Dodge is giving them h—!!!" And he guessed right, for as we reached the scene of action, the wild volunteers under Gen. Dodge were engaged in a fierce conflict with the Indians. The Indians were driven down to the river edge; some of them under shelter of the bank were firing at the volunteers, who had command of the bluffs. The Suckers and Hoosiers, as we called them, fought like perfect tigers, and carried everything before them.

The troops and Indians on board the Warrior kept up a brisk fire on the Indians ashore, who fought with a desperation that surpassed every thing I ever saw during an Indian fight, and I have seen more than one. The Indians were between two fires; on the bluffs above them were Dickson and his rangers, and Dodge leading on his men, who needed no urging; while we kept steaming back and forth on the river, running down those who attempted to cross, and shooting at the Indians on shore.

The soldier we picked up helped to man the gun, and during the engagement he was wounded in the knee by a rifle ball. The Indians' shots would hit the water or patter against the boat, but occasionally a rifle ball sent with more force would whistle through both sides. Some of the Indians, naked to the breechcloth, slid down into the water, where they laid, with only their mouth and nostrils above the surface; but by running the boat closer in to the east shore our Menomonee's were enabled to make the water too hot for them. One after another, they jumped up, and were shot down in attempting to gain cover on the bank above. One warrior, more brave than the others, or, perhaps, more accustomed to the smell of gun-powder, kept his position in the water until the balls fell around him like hail, when he also concluded pugh-a-shee,* and commenced to creep up the bank. But he never reached the top, for Thockmorton had his eye upon him, and drawing up his heavy rifle, he sent a ball through the ribs of the Indian, who sprang into the air with an ugh! and fell dead. There was only one person killed of those who came up on the

*Pugh-a-shee—be off—escape—is quite a common word with several of the western Indian tribes. The Shawano's used it many times.

Warrior, and that was an Indian. The pilot was fired at but escaped unharmed, though the pilot house was riddled with balls.

One incident occurred during the battle that came under my observation, which I must not omit to relate. An old Indian brave and his five sons, all of whom I had seen on the prairie and knew, had taken a stand behind a prostrate log, in a little ravine, midway up the bluff; from whence they fired on the regulars with deadly aim. The old man loaded the guns as fast as his sons discharged them, and at each shot a man fell. They knew they could not expect quarter, and they sold their lives as dear as possible; making the best show of fight, and holding their ground the firmest of any of the Indians. But they could never withstand the men under Dodge, for as the volunteers poured over the bluff, they each shot a man, and in return, each of the braves were shot down and scalped by the wild volunteers, who out with their knives, and cutting two parallel gashes down their backs, would strip the skin from the quivering flesh, to make razor strops of. In this manner I saw the old brave and his five sons treated, and afterward had a piece of their hide.

After the Indians had been completely routed on the east side, we carried Col. Taylor and his force across the river, to islands opposite, which we raked with grape and round shot. Taylor and his men charged through the islands to the right and left, but they only took a few prisoners, mostly women and children. I landed with the troops, and was moving along the shore to the north, when a little Indian boy, with one of his arms shot most off, came out of the bushes and made signs for something to eat. He seemed perfectly indifferent to pain, and only sensible of hunger, for when I carried the little naked fellow aboard, some one gave him a piece of hard bread, and he stood and ate it, with the wounded arm dangling by the torn flesh; and so he remained until the arm was taken off.

Old Wa-ba-shaw, with a band of his warriors and Menomonee's, were sent in pursuit of those of Black Hawk's people who crossed the Mississippi, and very few of the Sauk and Fox Indians ever reached their own country. The Warrior carried down to the Prairie, after the fight, the regular troops, wounded men and prisoners; among the latter was an old Sauk Indian, who attempted to destroy himself by pounding his own head with a rock, much to the amusement of the soldiers.

Soon after Black Hawk was captured, the volunteers were discharged, and I received a land warrant for my two months' service, settled down and got married.

THE BLACK HAWK WAR IN GREEN COUNTY.

In this connection the narrative of J. W. Stewart,* in so far as it relates to the Black Hawk War in Green county, is of interest. In speaking of Andrew Clarno, that writer says:

"He was a man of a warm and generous heart, in whose company the writer has spent many pleasant hours, listening to his rude history of the times of the Black Hawk War. This war broke out in 1832, at which time Joseph Payne, whose name is familiar to all in this vicinity, had just erected and moved into a cabin, together with William Wallace, in the same neighborhood with Mr. Clarno; and, at the first outbreak of hostilities, on the 5th of May, they fled from their cabins with their families, and the same day their deserted houses were fired by the Indians. These fugitives camped the first night on the ground where [the city of] Monroe now stands. Here they spent a restless night, occasionally hearing the savage whoop of the blood-thirsty Indians, but were lucky enough to get off undiscovered, with a quick and light tread, in the morning, in the direction of Hamilton's settlement, where they staid next night, and thence to Fort Gratiot, where they remained till the close of the war."

So much for the war, in its particular relation to the south part of what is now the county of Green; but we now call the attention of the reader to the present town of Exeter—to the northern portions of the county, that the effect of the breaking out of hostilities upon the few settlers may be well understood. Albert Salisbury, in 1871, in writing of William Deviese, a Green county pioneer, says:

"The settlers on the Sugar river knew nothing of the Black Hawk War until May of that year [1832], when the Winnebago's told Dougherty's half-breed wife of the outbreak. At that time the Sacs and Foxes were about the mouth of the Kishwaukee, and the engagement at Stillman's Run had already taken place. The information was received about noon [by the settlers], and that evening all started for Galena by the only conveyance at hand—a broken down yoke of oxen and the running gear of an old buggy,—as all the teams happened to be on a trip to Galena with lead. Everything was left behind, including their tools, 30,000 pounds of lead, and Dougherty's merchandise.

"Deviese went to Wiota and joined a militia company under Wm. S. Hamilton [son of Alexander Hamilton], and assisted in building the block house called Fort Hamilton. While they were forted here occurred the massacre of Spafford's farm, in which Omri Spafford, James McIlwaine, Abraham Searles, and a man called John Bull, were killed by the Indians. They were attacked in a corn field; Spafford would not run, but stood at bay, and was killed in the field. Francis Spencer, who owned part of the field, escaped through a ravine, as did also another of the party. The other men swam the river and were shot, as it seems, while trying to get up the farther bank. The men at the fort were soon apprised of the affair, and when the body of the man called John Bull was fished out of the stream, his watch had not yet stopped. Spencer was found some days afterward, under the floor of an old stable or hog-pen nearly crazed with fright. A few days later, on the morning of June 16 [1832], Henry Apple was killed near the fort, and Gen. Dodge rode soon afterwards into the fort and ordered all the mounted men in pursuit of the Indians. Col. Hamilton was absent, and had left the fort in command of Capt. Harrison, a relative of Old 'Tippecanoe, as was Col. Hamilton of the distinguished Alexander Hamilton.

"The men sprang to their horses, and Deviese mounting Capt. Harrison's horse in his haste, was off with the rest. Major Kirkpatrick's dog took the trail, and in course of the day the Red Skins were overtaken. After they were first seen they ran about two miles, and finally took shelter under the thicketed bank of a small lake or pond near the Pecatonica. They fired first, hitting in all four men. Dodge shouted, "charge them, G—d d—n them, every man sword in hand!" The amusing part of it was, there was not a sword in the whole command except his own. The horses had been left behind at the edge of the woods, in charge of a few men detailed for the purpose. After the Indian fire, Dodge's men charged and killed all but one, he thinks, at the first fire. That one was shot by Adj. Woodbridge as he crawled up the opposite bank of the lake. The Indians threw their arms into the water after their fire, not having time to re-load, and realizing, seemingly, that the game was up with them. Deviese thinks that when Dodge's men fired, the range was not more than twenty-five feet. After all was over, one of the party, who had succeeded in getting behind in some way, came riding up furiously, and "spoiling for a fight." The coat worn by Dodge in this fight, as in all others, was not really a coat at all, in the usual acceptation of the word, but a buck-skin hunting shirt.

"After the battle of the Pecatonica, most severe rains set in, occasioning a delay in operations for several days; after which they set out from Fort Hamilton and struck Rock river at the mouth of the Catfish. They kept the west side of Lake Koshkonong, and camped half way up the lake to wait for the troops. The command at this time consisted of about sixty men, besides a few friendly Menomonee's. Gen. Atkinson overtook them at the mouth of Bark river, and built block-houses where the village of Fort Atkinson now stands. A force went up Bark river to the mouth of the Whitewater, but finding no trail returned. After some other fruitless searching, Gen. Dodge, with Generals Posey and Henry from Illinois, went across with several hundred men to where Madison now stands, and thence struck the Black Earth, following it down to its mouth, where the battle of Wisconsin Heights occurred on the fourth or fifth day from Fort Atkinson. The Indians fired when Dodge was on the top of the bluff, but killed nobody. Dodge's fire killed eleven. The Indians plunged into the river and swam from island to island or hid in the tall grass. Dodge camped on the battlefield as night was just coming on. All that night shouting was heard from the opposite bluff. As they afterwards learned, it was Black Hawk calling in the Winnebago tongue to propose a treaty, he wrongly supposing that the whites had Winnebago's with them.

"From here the troops dispersed to the settlements for supplies. Gen. Posey went to Fort Hamilton. Deviese then went on an express alone to Fort Atkinson and back. Gen. Atkinson left Capt. Low* at the fort with thirty or forty men, and marched with the rest to meet Dodge at Helena, where there was a small settlement, and where they all crossed the Wisconsin. The Indians had followed the Wisconsin down to a point nine miles below Helena. The troops struck the trail at once, and followed to the mouth of the Bad Ax.

"Deviese did not leave here until the command had been gone for a day or two. That part of the journey between Dodgeville and Helena he made during the darkest night that he ever saw. He thinks that the only time he ever really suffered from fear during the whole war, was that night, when he probably had least to fear, except the possibility perhaps of going astray. When a day's journey beyond Helena, he was obliged to camp alone, though so near the command that he heard the drums beat next morning.

*Capt. Gideon Low, a native of Pennsylvania, was appointed an Ensign in the first U. S. regiment of infantry, June 1, 1812, and served during the whole war with Great Britain, having been promoted first to a Second Lieutenant, and then to a First Lieutenant, and was disbanded, when the army was reduced in June, 1815. In 1819, he re-entered the service as Second Lieutenant of Rifles, and serving in the line, and part of the time as Assistant Commissary of Subsistence, till August, 1828, when he was promoted to a Captaincy, served through the Black Hawk War, resigned in February, 1840, and died at Fort Winnebago, in May 1850.—ED.

"The night before the battle of Bad Ax, when about four miles from the Mississippi, Deviese with another man named Marsh, went on an express to Prairie du Chien. In the morning they were somewhat alarmed by fresh trails in the dew, made probably by deer, but reached Prairie du Chien late that night. Capt. Loomis sent the steamboat Warrior up the river. Deviese left his horse and went up on the boat, reaching the battle-ground early next morning. Dodge had sixteen wounded, and none killed, though Capt. Bowman, one of the wounded, died on the trip down. The boat also carried down the wounded Indians.

"From Prairie du Chien, Deviese, though worn down and nearly sick, went on an express to Capt. Low, at Fort Atkinson, having for a companion young Dougherty, son of the trader. They went by the way of Dodgeville, and their own settlement at Exeter. They found everything burned, building, goods and tools. Deviese thinks it was not done by the Indians, but by a Frenchman named Edward Beouchard, to spite Dougherty, with whom he was at disagreement. This Beouchard was a boastful, revengeful and worthless fellow who had been for some time at Blue Mounds. At last accounts he was still living at Mineral Point.*

"Capt. Low sent messengers to Gen. Scott at Rock Island, while he himself went back to his old post at Fort Winnebago. Jefferson Davis was at this time a lieutenant under Capt. Low, both at Fort Atkinson at Fort Winnebago— "and as gentlemanly a man as I ever saw," adds Major Deviese. The men went on their errand and met Gen. Scott where Beloit now is, on his way from Chicago to the Lead Mines. Scott turned down Rock river to Rock Island. Deviese went ahead to Fort Dixon where he was sick, and Scott sent him home. He was mustered out at Wiota, eventually receiving a dollar a day for the services of himself and horse during the war."

In speaking of the Black Hawk War, Miss Bingham, in her History of Green County, very truthfully says:

"Although this war lasted only three months, it must not, on that account, be passed by as unimportant. It cost about 300 lives, whites and Indians, and even the great rebellion was not a greater source of anxiety, in its time, than was the Black Hawk War to the early settlers. Prior to the war, in October, 1829, the southern part of Crawford county, including, of course, the greater part of the future county of Green, was organized as Iowa county, of which Mineral Point was the county seat. Most of the depredations of the Indians during the war were committed in the mining districts of Iowa county. Hundreds of miners left the country and never returned. The movements of the Indians were so stealthy and so rapid that the settlers, separated by long distances from each other, were in the wildest alarm. Their thoughts when awake, their dreams when asleep, were all of the Indians. Finally they sought refuge in the forts, of which the more important were Fort Union, near Dodgeville; Fort Jackson, at

* It is due to truth and charity to say, that such men as Beouchard, who have seen much of frontier life and border adventure, are apt to be thought as boastful, when in point of fact, their narratives, oftentimes strange and romantic, are nevertheless within the bounds of truth and probability. Beouchard was a native of Canada, and early engaged in the fur trade, and went over to the Pacific ocean. He returned by way of the Red river settlement, at a time when Lord Selkirk was on the way there in a half-starved condition; and Beouchard took a supply of dried meat, went, met and succored him, and conducted him to the settlement. He was, in 1822, employed by Col. James Johnson in effecting the purchase of the lead diggings of Old Buck, the Winnebago miner. During the Black Hawk War he was a trusted scout of Gen. Dodge, Judge M. M. Cothren, Hon. Moses M. Strong, and Major Charles F. Legate, for many years neighbors of Mr. Beouchard at Mineral Point, unite in testifying to his patriotism and kindness of heart, and regard him as reliable in his historical statements, as the uncertain memories of such aged men usually are.—ED.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

Mineral Point; Fort Defiance, five miles southeast of Mineral Point; Mound Fort, at Blue Mounds; Funk's Fort, near Gratiot's Grove; and Fort Hamilton, at Wiota. Other forts were at Platteville and White Oak Springs. Most of the forts were simply yards, with close fences made of upright, ten-foot slabs. There were houses in the yards to which settlers removed their families and household goods. It is the opinion of O. H. P. Clarno that the worst of the war was inside the forts. The children of the various families were soon arrayed against each other in a struggle in which an armistice was a thing unknown, and the mothers not only assisted them, but also engaged in such hostilities on their own account that a dispute as to the ownership of a frying-pan has sometimes been known to lead to the conversion of that pacific utensil into a weapon of war.

“Galena and all the villages of Iowa county furnished volunteers; and, after a few engagements, Black Hawk's forces were overpowered, and he himself was taken prisoner before the arrival of Gen. Scott, who, in eighteen days (a rapidity of travel that was thought remarkable), had transported nine companies of artillery from the seaboard around the lakes to Chicago.”

CHAPTER VI.

UNITED STATES LAND SURVEYS.

The policy pursued by the general government after obtaining possession of the northwest from Great Britain, in dealing with the various Indian tribes, has been to purchase of the savages their right to particular parts of the country, before presuming to enter upon a survey of it.

QUIETING THE INDIAN TITLE TO GREEN COUNTY AND CIRCUMJACENT TERRITORY.

The United States began to make treaties with the Wisconsin Winnebago's, in 1816. On the 3d day of June of that year, they held a treaty with them at St. Louis. This one (held soon after the war with Great Britain, in which the Winnebago's engaged on the side of the British) was for peace only,—no cession of land on part of the Indians being made to the United States.

In 1820, the Winnebago's had five villages on Winnebago lake and fourteen on Rock river. In 1825 the claim of this tribe was extensive, so far as territory was concerned. Its southeast boundary stretched away from the sources of Rock river to within forty miles of its mouth, in Illinois, where they had a village. On the west, it extended to the heads of the small streams flowing westward and southward into the Mississippi. To the northward, it reached as far as Black river and the Upper Wisconsin; in other words, to the Chippewa territory; but did not extend across Fox river of Green bay, although the tribe contended for the whole of Winnebago lake. Within their territory then, in 1825, was the whole of what is now Green county.

Early in 1829, a provisional boundary was established between the Winnebago lands, strictly such, and those belonging to, or expected soon to be purchased by, the United States. By this line, white people could settle on all of the present area of Green county west of Sugar river. East of this still remained Winnebago territory. By a treaty held with that tribe at Prairie du Chien Aug. 1, 1829, all their land (and much more) lying in what is now Green county west of Sugar river was relinquished to the United States. Three years later, at a treaty held at Fort Armstrong (Rock Island), the residue of the present territory of Green county (with a large amount besides) was ceded to the United States. This treaty was proclaimed Feb. 13, 1833; and, on that day, all the title of the Winnebagoes to this county passed to the United States.

The first surveys by the general government of lands in Wisconsin were made south of the Wisconsin river and the Fox river of Green bay. The northern boundary line of the State of Illinois fixed April 11, 1818, on the parallel 42 degrees 38 minutes north latitude, became, properly enough, the base line of these surveys (as indeed of all the surveys afterwards made by the United States in this State). A principal north and south line, known as the fourth meridian, was run at right angles, of course with the base line, and extending from it to Lake Superior. This meridian line is west of all the territory in Green county. It extends north from the Illinois State line, along the east side of Grant county, and thence divides

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

Richland, cutting it into two equal parts. It then runs north through the eastern parts of Vernon, Monroe, Jackson, Clark and other counties; until it strikes Lake Superior a short distance to the westward of the mouth of Montreal river.

Parallel lines to the fourth meridian were run every six miles on the east and west sides of it. The intervening six miles between lines are called ranges. Range 1 east, is the first six miles of territory east of the fourth meridian; range 2 east, is the second six miles, and so on, to Lake Michigan. However, on the west side of the fourth meridian, the ranges are numbered consecutively westward. Range 1 west, is the first six miles of territory west of that line; range 2 west, is the second six miles, and so on, to the Mississippi river.

HOW GREEN COUNTY WAS SURVEYED.

Parallel lines north of the base line (the north boundary line of the State of Illinois) were run every six miles, which crossing the ranges at right angles, cut the whole into blocks six miles square, called townships. These townships are numbered by tiers going north, from the base line; the first tier being known as township 1 north, the second tier, as township 2 north, and so on until the extreme north boundary of the State (not covered by water) is reached, which is, of course, the extreme north side of the most northern of the Apostle islands, in Bayfield county. Now, if we begin at the base line and count the tiers of townships so as to include the whole of Green county, we discover that we have numbered four of them.

Green county, then, lies in townships numbered 1, 2, 3 and 4 north. If we begin on the west side of the county, and count the ranges, we find that the county also lies in ranges 6, 7, 8 and 9 east; so we have in all sixteen equal blocks of territory, or sixteen townships of land, and these are numbered as follows:

Township 1 north, of range 6 east; township 2 north, of range 6 east; township 3 north, of range 6 east; township 4 north, of range 6 east; township 1 north, of range 7 east; township 2 north, of range 7 east; township 3 north, of range 7 east; township 4 north, of range 7 east; township 1 north, of range 8 east; township 2 north, of range 8 east; township 3 north, of range

8 east; township 4 north, of range 8 east; township 1 north, of range 9 east; township 2 north, of range 9 east; township 3 north, of range 9 east; township 4 north, of range 9 east. Range 6 East. Range 7 East. Range 8 East. Range 9 East.

Base Line (Illinois State Line).

After the several township lines were run, then each township was sub-divided into sections and quarter sections, called, in surveying language, "sectionized." As a section is a mile square, there is, of course, in every whole township, thirty-six sections of land. For convenience, these are always numbered as follows

7	8	9	10	11	12
18	17	16	15	14	13
19	20	21	22	23	24

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

In each whole section, there are 640 acres; and, when a section is divided into four parts, each quarter section contains 160 acres. It is usually in quarter sections that the land of the United States is disposed of; although, if desired, it will be divided into eighty acre tracts, or even forty acres.

The following is a history of the survey of Green county, including township lines and the subdivisions of townships “Peekatonlake” for “Pecatonica,” river (This stream is meandered). “Skinner’s creek” is noted by name.

T. 1 N., R. 7 E. (1833).

“Trail from Galena to Wallace’s,” from the southwest corner of the township nearly in a straight line to the northeast corner of section 3. “Pait’s house”† is marked on the southwest corner of the northwest quarter of section 16.

T. 1 N., R. 8 E. (DATE OBLITERATED).

Trail from Galena to Wallace’s in a northeast direction through sections 34, 35, 25 and 24.

T. 1 N., R. 9 E. (1833 AND 1834).

Trail through sections 19, 20, 21, 16, 15 and 14 to section 11, south side of the southwest quarter.

T. 2 N., R. 6 E. (1832).

Road to “Demunn’s Trading House,” on Sugar river, through sections 12, 11, 10, 15, 9, 8 and 7.

T. 2 N., R. 7 E. (1832).

“Skinner’s House and Furnace” are located just north of the south line of the northeast quarter of section 10, about eighty rods west of the southeast corner of the quarter just named. The road to Demunn’s Trading House on Sugar river runs through sections 7, 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12. A branch road runs from Skinner’s House nearly north to “Skinner’s Diggings,” situated near the northeast corner of the northwest quarter of section 3. “Diggings” are marked at the southeast corner of the northeast quarter of section 3, and at the northeast corner and southeast corner of the northeast quarter of section 10.

T. 2 N., R. 8 E. (1832).

Road to Demunn’s Trading House on Sugar river, runs through sections 7, 8, 4, 9, 10, 11 and 12.

*Explanation.--The dates given are those of the survey of each township, into sections and quarter sections. These dates are important, in this connection. Thus we see that, in 1833, the Pecatonica was called "Peekatonlake," and that, the same year, there is a house in the present town of Clarno, noted by the surveyor as "Pait'sHouse" (meaning, however, "Payne's House," undoubtedly); and so on.

†Undoubtedly intended for "Payne's House" (Joseph Payne).

T. 2 N R. 9 E. (1832 AND 1834).

Road to Demunn’s Trading House, on Sugar creek, runs through sections 7, 18, 17, 20, 21, 22 and 23, into section 14. Demunn’s Trading House is located on the west side of Sugar river, on the south half of the west half of the southwest quarter of section 14. A road runs from here up Sugar river on the west side. One runs east, crossing the river on the north half of the northeast quarter of section 23, where an *Indian village is located on the east side of the river. There is also an Indian village at Demunn’s Trading House. The two villages are about three-fourths of a mile apart Sugar river is called “Sugar creek.”

T. 3 N., R. 6 E.. (1832).

Trail runs northeast through sections 18, 7, 8, 9, 4 and 3, leading on to “The Four Lakes.” A road runs easterly through sections 30, 29, 28, 27, 26, 23 and 24, to Davis’ Diggings.

T. 3 N., R. 7 E. (1832).

Road running easterly across section 19, branches just at the east side of the section;—one road running southeast to Skinner’s Diggings—the other continuing on easterly to Dougherty’s.

T. 3 N., R. 8 E. (1832).

The road to Dougherty’s House and Furnace, runs northeasterly through sections 19, 18, 7, 8, 5 and 4, into section 3. Dougherty’s is located near the south side of the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 3. A road runs nearly south from Dougherty’s through the township.

T. 4 N., R. 6 E. (1833).

At the northeast corner, of the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 2, the surveyor says his needle was attracted 3 degrees east.

T 4 N., R. 7 E. (1833).

At the northwest corner of the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 1, is marked “Old Indian village.”* The huts extend across the section line north, into what is now Dane county. Trails run in various directions through this township.

T. 4 N., R. 8 E. (1832 AND 1834).

“Old Diggings” are marked on the south line of the southeast quarter of section 27, and “Diggings” on the east line of the northeast quarter of section 34.

THE COUNTY INCLUDED IN TWO LAND DISTRICTS.

By the end of 1833, a large amount of the public lands in Wisconsin, south and east of the Wisconsin and Fox rivers, had been surveyed. This fact being reported by the surveyor-general of the United States, two land districts were erected by an act of Congress, approved June 26, 1834. These districts embraced all the land north of the State of Illinois, west of Lake Michigan, south and southeast of the Wisconsin and Fox rivers, included in the then Territory of Michigan. The area was then divided by a north-and-south line, drawn from the base line to the Wisconsin river, between ranges 8 and 9 east. This line divided the territory of what is now Green county, throwing all of the surveyed townships of range 9 east, on one side; and those of ranges 6, 7 and 8 east on the other. All east of the line, in Wisconsin, was called the “Green Bay Land District;” all west, the “Wisconsin Land District.”

From what has been said, it will be seen that the area now constituting the towns of Brooklyn, Albany, Decatur and Spring Grove, and the incorporated villages of Albany and Brodhead, fell into the Green Bay district; while the residue of the territory now constituting the west three-fourths of the county was included in the Wisconsin district. A land office for the eastern (Green Bay) district was established at Green Bay; for the western (Wisconsin) district, at Mineral Point.

Public sales of the surveyed lands in the two districts were held, in 1835, at Green Bay and Mineral Point. Immediately after, the whole that remained unsold was open to private entry, at $1.25 an acre.

By an act of Congress of June 15, 1836, the “Milwaukee Land District” was erected out of the southern portion of the Green Bay district, including all the land lying between range 8 east and Lake Michigan, bounded on the south by the Illinois State line, and extending north ten tiers of townships (sixty miles). Of course, in this new district fell the townships in the present county of Green, lying in range 9 east, now the territory constituting the towns of Brooklyn, Albany, Decatur and Spring Grove, and the incorporated villages of Albany and Brodhead;—the same that, before that time, was in the Green Bay district

The land office for the Milwaukee district was located at Milwaukee, where the first public sale of lands which had been surveyed after the other lands had been offered at Green Bay and Mineral Point, was held. But, as all the lands in the east one-fourth of what is now Green county had previously been offered at public sale at Green Bay, of course they were not again put up; but parties desirous of entering land in that part of the county had thereafter to go to Milwaukee instead of Green Bay to make their purchases from the general government.

THE WISCONSIN LAND DISTRICT IN 1837.

(BY WM. R. SMITH.*)

The Wisconsin Land District is bounded westward by the Mississippi, east by the Four Lakes and Sugar river, north by the Wisconsin river, and south by the Illinois State line, comprising an extent of country about ninety miles from east to west, and about fifty miles from north to south, generally covered by the counties of Iowa, Grant, Dane and Green. the country east of this section is called the Milwaukee Land District, and embraces all the remaining counties of the Territory, except those on the western side of the Mississippi river.

*Spotted-arm's village—ED.

First impressions with regard to a new country, where everything appears different from what one has been accustomed to see, are always apt to please, whether the country be wild, rugged, rocky and mountainous, or composed of level plains, denuded sand-hills, and wide expanses of inland waters; such is the character of many parts of the great west; and even here, the first view pleases not only from its novelty of scenery, but abstracted from the idea of its utility to the various wants and occupations of man; no country in a state of nature can be unpleasing to the reflecting mind; no object on which the eye may not for a moment dwell satisfied, not even the coral rocks in the midst of the ocean. If such scenes may please, what then may you conceive first impressions to be with regard to Wisconsin, when I tell you that fancy must fail in imagining a more lovely country? The agriculturist, in vain, might seek for a richer or more productive soil; the mineralogist fruitlessly explore the bowels of the earth to discover veins of lead, copper, (and from many specimens, I believe also of iron,) richer than in Wisconsin! This unqualified picture of wealth in the new country, you may think is too strongly drawn; I cannot help it—such were my first impressions of the Territory; they have been the more realized, the more I have traveled in it, and the more information I have obtained. I appeal fearlessly to every person who has been three days in any quarter of the Wisconsin land district for the truth of my assertions. I believe from all that I have seen that there is not to be found ten acres in any 100 that is not fit for cultivation or for farmer's use. No one can say where mineral is not to be found; wherever it has been properly sought for, it has been obtained; and even, around Mineral Point, where are the richest lead diggings, and as poor a soil as any that I have seen in the Territory, the land will produce equal to any land in Pennsylvania with proper and equal cultivation. Mineral is also found in the richest agricultural districts, and under the finest soil in the Territory. The disadvantages attending the farmer in such a rich agricultural country must of course be very few, and I shall point them out, I trust, with candor.

In the first place there is a want of timber; in many sections of this country there is an abundance of timber for building, fencing, firewood, coaling and all other purposes, yet, generally speaking, in the rich prairies, the groves of timber are small and scattered, not affording sufficient wood for more than one or two large farms, for many miles in extent. Yet this want of timber can easily be remedied by planting the yellow, the white, or the black locust, and the chestnut; these trees are not indigenous; the general forest trees are white oak, burr oak, hickory, black and white walnut, sugar maple, cherry and ash. I am told that locust and chestnut flourish well by planting the seed, and if the farmer on the prairies will turn his attention to throwing up of embankments and thereon planting thorn hedges, which in many places I have seen commenced, the want of fencing timber can scarcely be felt; as for fire wood, a sufficiency may always be readily obtained within a short distance of any farm, and if the annual fires on the prairies are prevented or subdued by the care and exertions of the settlers, the timber of the country is of the most rapid growth. Thus, the objection of the scarcity of timber has more force in name than in reality, when the rapid growths of plantations, the easy cultivation of hedges, and the spontaneous production of indigenous forest trees, where fire is excluded in the prairies, are properly reflected upon.

But the objection presents itself with more force in regard to lumber for building purposes. As for oak, walnut, cherry and ash, and on the river the cottonwood, and in some parts the sugar maple, there is abundance for the heavy parts of buildings; but pine lumber is scarce, and of course dear; even the ordinary lumber of the country commands now $2 per hundred feet at the sawmills; this is owing to the scarcity of sawmills, and the consequent increased demand for the article. There is no pine timber in the country, except very high up the Wisconsin river, above Fort Winnebago, and up the St. Croix river, and the other tributaries of the Upper Mississippi. Pine lumber is worth $6 per hundred feet at Prairie du Chien, Cassville, and Galena in Illinois; these towns may be called the chief shipping ports of this part of Wisconsin Territory. Pine lumber is brought down the Ohio river from the tributaries of the Allegheny above Pittsburg, as far up as the New York State line, and taken up the Mississippi by way of St Louis; and instances have occurred of houses having been built altogether at Pittsburg, and at Cincinnati, and shipped in parts around to the Territory, and placed on the ground cheaper than they could have been built by procuring lumber from the Wisconsin river or the Upper Mississippi. The late treaty made with the Chippewa's, by which the pine region has been purchased by the United States, will hereafter insure a constant supply of building material, and greatly reduce its price in Wisconsin, and along the Mississippi to St. Louis, and even as far as New Orleans. Sawmills are already being established within the purchase.

Another objection, and the main one to be considered is the climate; as I have not passed a spring or winter month here, I give such information as I have obtained. The winter is long and severe, and yet the general temperature of the atmosphere is not colder than it is amongst the mountains in western Pennsylvania. The utmost duration of winter may be considered as of five months; this will include two months of wet and cold season in the spring and fall not properly called winter. From the beginning of May, until the end of October, the climate of this region to a Pennsylvanian is delightful. I can say for myself that I never experienced hotter weather than in some days in August in Wisconsin; this is generally the case in high northern latitudes. During the greater portion of the summer months, however warm may be some days, yet the general character is that of a temperature of 75 degrees to 80 degrees Fahrenheit. Frost commences in the middle of September generally; vicissitudes of climate, which bring frosts destructive to grain early in September, are not uncommon in Pennsylvania in the same month; nay, as early as the 25th of August, in the northwestern part of that State, I have seen whole crops of corn and buckwheat destroyed. But the frosts of September seldom injure the corn crops in Wisconsin. Corn is undoubtedly considered as more uncertain than any other crop here, and yet if attention were paid to the quality of the seed corn as regards nativity and first ripening, I have no doubt that this highly favored country may in time be as fine a corn growing region as any in our land. Understand me; as to nativity, I mean that the seed corn should be brought from our middle and northern States, and not from Kentucky, Missouri, and the south part of Illinois and Indiana; and as to first ripening, the farmers chief care should be to select the earliest ears for seed. By this mode of planting and selecting, and in its continuance, I make no question that corn may be acclimated, improved, and rendered a certain crop. In some parts of the eastern district of Wisconsin, I have been informed that the corn crop has been matured in ten weeks from its being planted.

Continuing my remarks on the winters, I understand, that when the cold weather has fairly set in, the snows fall, although by no means deep; snows continue to fall at intervals, until the winter is about to break up; there is no rain of any amount known to fall from October, until March or April. The cold is severe and the weather dry; no melting of the snow, no rains injurious to cattle, no wet sloppy time occurs in the winter, to occasion wet feet and drenched clothes, to the farmer and traveler, with all hosts of colds, coughs, rheumatism and consequent ills that attend on a variable winter. Winter is here, to be sure in earnest, and yet not colder than in the same latitudes eastward and when his icy hand is lifted from the locked up land, you leap as with a bound at once into delightful summer.

Spring wheat is here generally raised, and the reason given why the fall sowing does not equally prosper with the spring sowing, is the length and severity of the winter, and the want of protection for the grain on the prairies, over which the winds have almost unbounded sweep, and consequently drive the snow from its genial covering on the tender plant. Now, although this may be all true, yet remedies are to be found. Let us say to the farmer, sow your wheat early in September, and the plant will have gained sufficient strength to resist the evils complained of; the custom of October sowing, as prevailing in Pennsylvania, will not do in Wisconsin. If it were necessary to produce facts to prove a self-evident theory. I has been informed of two or three similar instance which substantiate it. Winter wheat was bled in after a corn crop had been taken off the stalks of corn, some standing and some fallen, afforded such a protection as to retain the snow on the wheat (luring the winter; a fine crop was the result. But this may be called slovenly farming; early sowing is the remedy, or rather preventative, of the effect of severe winters.

These appear to me as the prominent objections to the agricultural interests in Wisconsin; want of timber, coldness of climate, and length of winter. I have merely suggested some of the manner in which these objections may be obviated. Personal feeling in the coldness of the country is scarcely worthy of consideration; a family can be as easily kept most comfortably warm in winter, in Wisconsin, as in New York or Pennsylvania, and the absence of winter coughs and colds destructive to the human system will amply compensate for a thousand icy inconveniences. One further remark on the winter climate. The situation of this Territory being west of the great lakes of the northwest, the freezing and biting winds which prevail in parts of New York and Pennsylvania during the winter, deriving their character chiefly in passing over the immense waste of frozen lakes, have no effect in Wisconsin; and when the prairies become settled by farmers who will turn their attention to the planting and preserving of fruit and forest trees, I have no doubt that the climate will still more be a meliorated in every succeeding year, with the settlement of the country.

The advantages of the agriculturist, now, at least, greatly overbalance all his inconveniences. His land is purchased at the government price of $1.25 per acre; land of the richest soil in the world. His prairie ground awaits immediate cultivation. His crops will yield him from thirty-five to fifty bushels of fall wheat per acre, and from twenty to thirty bushels of spring wheat is calculated on as a sure crop; barley will yield from forty to sixty bushels, and oats from fifty to seventy-five bushels to the acre; corn will produce from forty to sixty bushels, and potatoes, turnips, rutabagas and all garden vegetables yield most abundantly. Potatoes, of a quality and size superior to any I have ever tasted, yield from 300 to 500 bushels to the acre; and with regard to this vegetable, I venture to predict that the time will arrive when the Wisconsin potato, par excellence, will become an article of trade in the best demand in the southern markets. I am satisfied that this country is peculiarly adapted to the cultivation of the sugar beet; and add to all these advantages the certainty of a ready and high-priced market, and there is every inducement for agricultural pursuits. The only evil to be feared is that the farmer may strike his plow into a lead vein, and then adieu to the plough and the harrow, and welcome the pickax and the crowbar, the windlass and the new smelting furnace; the prospect of a mineral is opened to the farmer at once, and he cannot resist the temptation of improving it.

The mining and agricultural interests of this country must always depend greatly on each other; they must flourish together, their mutual interests require their mutual protection. The milling interest always finds the farmer a ready market. The miner attends to his own business exclusively; he does not meddle with the soil except to see what lies beneath it; he very seldom even cultivates a garden; this fact, and the constant tide of emigration creating a demand far exceeding the supply every year, causes the price of produce to be astonishingly high, $1 per bushel for oats, and the same for potatoes, corn, onions, turnips and beets was paid when I was at Mineral Point; I am informed that the prices are seldom twenty-five cents below this average. The high price of wheat all over the Union for a year past is no general criterion, and yet flour is always high here, which is partly owing to the present scarcity of grist-mills.

The necessaries and the luxuries of life, the various articles of household furniture and every description of farming implements can be readily procured in the Territory, as the steamboats are daily arriving and departing, at the several points of shipment on the Mississippi, and the price of carriage is regulated according to the stage of the water and the number of the boats plying on the river.

Enough, I hear you say, of this talk, desultory and conjectural concerning the farming of Wisconsin; let us hear more of the country; its general appearance, its waters, its hills, its woods and its valleys; its aboriginal remains, its towns and their population; its lead and its copper; and write to me like a traveler who journeys and wishes to impart what he has seen in a country so recently rescued by the enterprise and valor of our hardy pioneers, from the wandering Indian, whose only occupation was to hunt deer and spear fish, although dwelling in a western Eden.

Be it so: I will endeavor to comply with all you ask, but before I commence, an observation rises in my mind, to which I feel that I must give utterance. It is not inconsistent with the wise and bountiful orders and dispensations of our Creator to believe, whilst viewing this beautiful country, that its fertility of soil, and its facility of being cultivated, may have been adapted to the capabilities of its primitive inhabitants. Such a soil as we here find, would yield abundance to a people who might be ignorant of the mechanical arts, and although I have no morbid sensibility on the subject of taking possession of a land which was in worthless hands, and under the dominion of roving savages; and as I am of the opinion that the earth was given to man for his inheritance, and consequently that the general good will justify the means by which that inheritance is claimed, yet I cannot help seeing that if there is any country on the face of the globe where a Nation might exist without the knowledge of the art of civilized life, a country capable of affording the greatest sustenance with the least labor, such a country is to be found in the valley of the Mississippi, and such a country is now before me in Wisconsin!

There is neither mountain nor forest, (properly so called,) in western Wisconsin, that is in the section which I have limited in my outset, in these remarks. The prairies may be passed over in any direction in a wheel carriage with ease and safety; the groves surrounding, and interlacing, and sprinkling, and dotting the vast ocean of open field can be treaded as easily with a carriage, as if you were driving through a plantation of fruit or forest trees, set or growing irregularly. The undergrowth is generally of small bushes readily passed over; the black currant, the furred and smooth gooseberry, the red and white raspberry, the blackberry, the cranberry of the vine, and of the bush; the haw, the wild plum, and the crabapple; all these indigenous fruits are found throughout the Territory; the strawberry literally covers the prairies and groves; and touching the size of this delicious fruit, I send you a paragraph from a Mineral Point newspaper; the fruit was measured by Major John P. Sheldon, and is not by any means of uncommon size; the hazel, with its nut-laden branches is the most common bush in the country; acorns, black and white walnuts, and hickory-nuts, are as plenty as hosts of swine may for ages desire. Indeed it is not possible to find a district of country better calculated for the raising of this description of stock than here.

If I can by any means, bring your imagination to bear on the appearance of the country generally, I will endeavor to do so. Suppose for a moment that you were placed in the midst of the most fertile and best cultivated parts of Lancaster or Chester counties, in Pennsylvania; the houses were all removed; the fences and hedges all leveled with the general surface; the grain fields all set in luxuriant grass, the strip of woodland interspersed amongst the farms, remaining as they are; suppose further, that the most beautiful flowers variegated in colors, and of countless descriptions, were waving their plumed heads, with every here and there the tall compass plant or prairie sunflower, overtopping all; suppose such a scene in an area of fifteen, twenty or thirty miles; such is Wisconsin, and such have I generally found it in various rides and rambles, and excursions on foot, on horseback, and in New York fashionable built carriages through a country into which the adventurous white pioneer first made his entry nine years ago, and which has only been free from the tread of savage feet, and the depredations of the Black Hawk War, within five years.

The flowers of the prairie are various and beautiful. I am not sufficiently a florist or botanist to class them, and generally speaking, they are not known in the eastern States as field flowers. The blue, red, white and purple chrysanthemum are very common; a yellow flower waving and drooping like an ostrich feather, is also generally found; some varieties resembling the prince's feather are common; delicate snow-drops and violets, diamond sparks that "love the ground" form the carpet whence springs the plumed stem of many colors, intermingled with the Masonic or mineral plant, and the compass or resin plant, or prairie sunflower. The mineral plant bears a bluish-purple flower, and is remarkable for the qualities attributed to its growth by the miners. It is said to indicate the presence of mineral. It sometimes spreads in spots over a large surface of ground, obscuring all but the grass beneath it; here the miner will dig with almost a certainty of striking on a lead mine. Sometimes the range of the flowers growth is in a straight, a curved, or an irregular line, indicating the range of the crevice mineral in the strata beneath; these indications are believed in and relied on by many of the miners. If they be true, and the plant actually points out the location of the mineral (galena), then, as I have before observed, no one can say where mineral is not to be found, for this flowering plant is the most common in the country, and yet, as its growth on the different parts of the prairies is so irregular in quantity and in direction, there may be something in the peculiarities of soil covering mineral which produces the plant; it is called by the miners Masonic, perhaps in derision, as it discloses the secret mine.

The resin or turpentine weed, or compass plant, deserves some notice. I have called it the prairie sunflower, from its near resemblance to the flower so called with us, except that the flowers and the seeds are much smaller; the largest one I saw was about four inches in diameter, exclusive of the surrounding yellow leaves. The stem of this plant rises to the height of five or six feet, and when broken in any part it exudes a white resinous fluid, which, on being exposed to the atmosphere, acquires a gummy consistence of the taste and smell of resin. But the strange peculiarity of the plant is, that its leaves invariably point north and south. In the writings of Dr. Atwater, who has visited some parts of this country, I remember that he has noticed this flower, remarked its peculiarities, and has given its botanical name as belonging to the Helianthus tribe; I have not the book to refer to. The leaves are very large, firm and stiff; those nearest the root are largest, some of them about eighteen inches long and about one foot wide, palmated and deeply indented; from the root the leaves start out from the stem on two sides only, at irregular distances, yet generally opposite each other, and these leaves invariably have a north and south direction. It is called the compass plant, because the Indians, in the absence of trees on the vast prairies, could at all times find a guide in the leaves of the prairie sunflower; and its resinous qualities might render it a good substitute for pine knots in giving light, and thus greatly enhance its properties to the benighted traveler. Horses and cattle eat this plant with avidity, bite at it in traveling over the prairies, and seek it out from amidst the hay in the stable. It is remarked that the wild indigo always accompanies his plant.

A remarkable and beautiful feature in the decorations of the prairies is, that the summer flowers, after having for a season displayed their gorgeous variety, and turned up their faces to receive the glowing beams of the sun, as soon as autumn puts on her sober brown, and the airs of heaven breathe more mildly, they droop, die, and instantly give place to a new galaxy of fine and beautiful flowers, particularly all the varieties of the chrysanthemum, and a splendid drooping bush of flowers that looks as if it were covered with snowflakes; the autumn flowers are more delicate and less flaring than those of summer.

I have said that there is no mountain in this district; extensive ranges of hills are found on the Wisconsin river, and in the northeast parts of the Territory, but the only hills in this quarter of the country are the Sinsinawa mounds, the seat of Gen. George Wallace Jones, delegate to Congress, (these are near the Illinois State line) the Platte mounds and the Blue mounds. These mounds serve as landmarks to the traveler over the prairies. The Platte mounds and the Blue mounds are about forty-five miles apart; the former comprising three, and the latter two hills. These hills, with the exception of the centre one of the Platte mounds, are from 200 to 300 feet high, well covered with timber and generally capable of being cultivated to the summit. They are seen from almost every part of the Wisconsin land district, and independent of their being of so much service to the traveler in the absence of roads and of other landmarks, they are objects of great natural beauty; for although the prairies are by no means a dead level, but on the contrary are most generally rolling and undulating, and in many instances may be termed hilly, yet these mounds very agreeably break, and diversify the otherwise monotonous view of prairie and grove, however luxuriant it may be in soil and vegetation.

I am disposed to believe that the general base of this country is of limestone. I judge from the fact that limestone is abundant and found in all parts of the Territory where I have been. It is discovered in small bodies of flat white stone lying on the surface of prairies, and at the points of the rolling hills, where the prairie dips into and unites with the natural meadow. Perhaps there is not to be found any region in the United States better watered than Wisconsin. The springs rise generally in the prairies, and their locality is always indicated by the growth of the dwarf willow near and around the fountain head. The water is pure, cold and deliciously refreshing; the springs after running over the prairies and through small ravines, unite in some natural meadow from a quarter of a mile to a mile or more in width, and meander through the meadow in a stream, some three or four yards broad and two feet deep, until in the accumulation of several streams, a fine large and navigable river is formed. These natural meadows present the most superb views of any part of the country. Interspersed with small groves, irregular in their course and shape, owing to the jutting points or hills of the prairie dipping into the meadow; the streams flowing in various directions over and through the low ground until they combine in some broad and deep channel the high waving grass mingled with the field and meadow flowers, all afford a picture more varied and therefore more beautiful than the high prairie grounds. It is worthy of remark that the character of the streams is different from what might be expected in the deep rich soil of the meadows. The waters generally flow nearly full with the banks, and the firm sandy and gravelly bottom always allows a safe fording place. Fine trout, perch, bass, cat-fish, eels, buffalo, muskellunge and other excellent fish are found in all the waters. I have seen the buffalo, muskellunge and catfish of enormous size brought by wagon loads to Mineral Point; they had been caught in the Pecatonica, and many weighed from twenty to thirty pounds and upwards. The white fish of the lake country is a delicacy which might well be desired by the gourmards of the east; its flavor needs no sauce, and its richness and fatness render butter or lard useless in dressing.

Game throughout the whole country is abundant. The deer are often seen sporting over the prairies, and in the groves and oak openings; they are frequently aroused out of the high grass, and as the rifle of the hunter has not yet sufficiently alarmed them in their secret lairs, they are in a measure less wild than in parts more densely settled; I have often seen them in my rambles, quietly gazing at the traveler, until he passed by. Elks are still found, I am informed, on the wooded shores of the Wisconsin. The prairie hen, grouse or moor fowl, is an excellent bird; they are very numerous and are found in families or broods; they are about the size of the common barn-door fowl, and I believe are the same bird as the Long Island grouse. Their flesh is delicious, juicy and fat; they fly heavily on the prairies and alight generally at a short distance, consequently they are easily bagged by the sportsman. Pheasants also are in great numbers, but the partridge or quail is not often met with, I saw three or four near some farms, and as this bird always follows and attends cultivation, the flocks will certainly increase with the opening of farms, and the raising of grain. Wild turkeys, I am told, are also numerous in many parts of the Territory; I did not see any whilst there.

Two species of wolf are found in the western part of the Territory; the gray wolf, which is common in the eastern States, and the prairie wolf; the latter is neither so large, nor so ferocious as the gray wolf, but still very destructive on game and on the stock of the farmer. Yet in so open a country as this, these animals must be extirpated or driven into the distant forests as fast as the settlements increase. I met at different times, in my little excursions, several of these prairie wolves; they appeared more alarmed than myself, and soon scampered off. Rabbits are also very numerous; indeed the abundance of fruit and of mast in this country affords ample subsistence to all kinds of game known in the eastern States.

Two kinds of rattle-snakes are found here; the brown and yellow rattle-snake, crotalus horridus, is sometimes of great size. I came across one on the banks of the Pecatonica, lying in my path; it measured between four and five feet in length, and at least nine inches in circumference; fortunately it was dead, killed by a traveler an hour or so before. I saw it; I confess to an alarm at the time, as my feet were nearly upon it before I discovered it. I saw several others in various parts of the country, but they are not more numerous here than in the western parts of Pennsylvania. It is well known that these snakes always recede from cultivation, therefore there is no more danger to be apprehended from them here than in any other new section of country. The small black rattlesnake of the prairie is also at this time common; these are said to be more dangerous than their larger yellow brethren, as they are not so magnanimous as to give the preparatory warning before they strike; the same remarks, as to disappearance, before the improvements of the settler, applies to the black rattle-snake.

Can the belief be sustained by argument founded on the general appearance of the country, the burial mounds, so numerous and so extensive in size, found in all parts of the Territory, and the vestiges of art, rude as they are, found in them and in many other places, that this highly favored region was once inhabited by a powerful Nation, and even partially cultivated? It is not my inclination, neither is it in my power, in the brief space of these remarks, to enter into any discussion on the subject; the question is merely made, and it is well worthy the most enlightened mind to make deep researches in respect to this interesting subject. One matter I state as worthy of observation: In a ride which I made exploring the country on one of the head waters of the Sugar river, in company with my son, Dr. William A. Smith, and our friend, John Messersmith, we found two long parallel mounds, which measured about 250 paces in length. Mr. Messersmith, who resides about thirty miles from the place in question, and who had often been over the ground, informed me that a short distance from these mounds there was a piece of ground which had every appearance of having once been cultivated. We drove in his carriage to this place, and as we passed over the soil through high grass which reached above the carriage wheels, the motion of the vehicle was similar to that of passing over the ridges of a corn field which had been for years out of cultivation, and on which sod had grown. We got out of the carriage and examined the ground; the ridges were parallel, as if they had been ploughed, or in some manner cultivated. They were very numerous, and constituted evidently an extensive range, in length and breadth; we rode several hundred yards over them, and the impression was irresistible that we were driving through an abandoned corn field; and this field, if such it was, a very large one. The land was bottom prairie, and a ledge of high land nearly encompassed it. Can these ridges have been caused by the action of water? Or where will the conjecture rest when such evidence of cultivation is apparent? I have related the fact, and I leave the matter for future investigation, which I hope one day shortly to make.

That the denuded state of the country has been caused by fire; originally, and the growth of timber kept down by the annual conflagration of the prairies, may be the truth; and yet it is also true, that in no part of the country, on the prairies, as far as I can learn, has any, even the slightest, appearance of charred wood been found. Surely, if this country had at any former period been well wooded, and the action of the fire had destroyed whole forests, where at this time are to be found immense districts of fertile prairie and meadow, why is it that no vestige or remains of a material so indestructible as charred wood have been discovered? Not in the very numerous diggings throughout the mineral region: not in the various cultivations of the farmer, can any evidence be found of the roots of trees; not even the fibre of a root throughout the vast prairies! How is this? The fact deserves not only to be borne in mind by all writers, in investigating the early history of Wisconsin, but it appears to me a conclusive proof that the prairies were never covered with forest. It is true that the annual conflagrations of the high and dry grass, sweeping over whole districts of prairie and natural meadow, will, of course, prevent the spontaneous growth of young timber; it is also equally true from present experience, that wherever the fire is kept out of the prairies, a young growth of hazel and ash commences immediately, and oak and cherry soon make their appearance. But this circumstance only establishes the fact that the burning of the prairies keeps down the growth of timber;

it does not prove that the prairies were once covered with wood. I repeat, that the total absence in the prairies of roots of trees, and of any pieces of charred wood, must lead to the conclusion which I have thus drawn.

A remarkable feature in this district is that no swamp, or accumulation of stagnant water in low places, is to be found, of any extent; indeed, I know of none which can be called swamp. The prairie is always undulating, not level; the springs rise on the high grounds, as well as at the points of hills, and in the meadows; the character of the country for throwing the water off is not only of the first importance with regard to health, but also of the highest recommendation to the agriculturist. in such a country miasma must be almost unknown, and in consequence, a host of disorders to which the inhabitants of the less favored eastern and southern States are subject, are here only known by name. Dr. Smith in his inquiries does not find that the professional services of a physician are often required in this part of the Territory. This fact, of itself, even if it were not coupled with the generally acknowledged truth that the inhabitants of cold and dry northern regions are of longer life than other people, would speak volumes of recommendations for the settlement of Wisconsin; health is of the greatest value to the settler in a new country, and here, indeed, health is to be found.

This country is well deserving of an immediate influx of emigrants, and it is fast filling up. Nine years since, the foot of the white man had scarcely penetrated beyond the State line of Illinois; five years since, the Indian depredations aroused the brave and hardy pioneers of the Lead Region of Wisconsin, and a band of volunteers, under the command of Col. Henry Dodge, took the field in defense of their new homes, their families and their hearths!

The Black Hawk War was prosecuted, and finished after the victory of Bad Ax. No body of men in any country ever behaved with more bravery than did the mounted volunteers of Wisconsin, the miners, as they may with truth be called. They were commanded by a brave spirit, by one whose experience in Indian warfare and in Indian character deservedly gave him claim to the distinguished station of their leader. His conduct gained him the applause of his country, and his services in the regular army for some years afterwards, during which time he executed some arduous and important expeditions amongst the Indian bands at the foot of the Rocky mountains, were highly beneficial to the interests of the general government. it would have been contrary to the feelings of brave and generous citizens if they did not give their full approbation to the act of President Jackson which made Henry Dodge governor of Wisconsin Territory; his civil life has justified the appointment.

I have said all this happened within nine years, and now towns are springing up everywhere; cultivation is advancing with a sure progressive step: the mineral wealth of the country is being brought effectually into operation; railroads and canals are in projection, and companies to form them have been incorporated; banks have been established, but these may do more harm than good, in encouraging a speculation; colleges and schools are in their infancy as yet, but the citizens of such a country as this cannot be long without the best instruction for their children. A university has been by law established at Belmont, and the public spirit of the citizens of the territory in all their acts is highly praiseworthy. To close my remarks on the rapid progress of settlement of this so late, Indian country, I saw in the month of September, 1837, at Mineral Point, to my utter surprise, one morning, huge bills posted on the tavern houses, announcing the arrival of a troop of circus riders and a traveling menagerie! The caravans arrived, and during a three days' carnival the eyes of the good citizens of the neighboring country were feasted with the goodly exhibitions of the enterprising eastern travelers, and I asked myself in astonishment, "Am I in Wisconsin?"

Thus much in general with regard to the Wisconsin land district.

CHAPTER VII.

PIONEER LIFE.

Records of pioneer times are interesting, and they are not without their lessons of instruction. By the light of the past, we follow in the foot-prints of the adventurous and enterprising pioneer. We see him, as it were, amid the labors and struggles necessary to convert the wilderness into a fruitful field. We sit by his cabin fire, partaking of his homely and cheerfully granted fare, and listen to the accounts which he is pleased to give us of frontier life, and of the dangers, trials, hardships and sufferings of himself and others, in their efforts to make for themselves homes in regions remote from civilization. Through these pioneer records, we make our way along to the present. From small beginnings we come to the mighty achievements of industry, the complex results of daring enterprise, subduing and creative energy and untiring perseverance.

Following on in the path of progress and improvement, we see once waste places rejoicing under the kindly care of the husbandman; beautiful farms, with all the fixtures and appurtenances necessary to make the tillers of the soil and their families contented and happy, are spread out before us; villages are built up as if by magic, and by hundreds human souls are congregated within their precincts; the marts of trade and traffic and the workshops of the artisans, are thronged; common schools, union schools and high schools have sprung up; young and ardent minds—children of the rich and the poor—may press forward together in the acquisition of science, literature and art; churches are built and a Christian ministry is sustained for the inculcation of Religious sentiments and the promotion of piety, virtue and moral goodness; the press is established, whence floods of light may emanate for the instruction and benefit of all; railroads are built to bring the products of every clime, and the people from afar, to our doors, and the telegraph “upon the lightning’s wing” carries messages far and near. Let the records of the pioneers be preserved; in after years our children and our children’s children will look over them with pleasure and profit.

THE LOG CABIN.

The first important business of the pioneer settler, upon his arrival in Green county, was to build a house. Until this was done, some had to camp on the ground or live in their wagons perhaps the only shelter they had known for weeks. So the prospects for a house, which was also to be a home, was one that gave courage to the rough toil, and added a zest to the heavy labors. The style of the home entered very little into their thoughts—it was shelter they wanted, and protection from stress of weather and wearing exposures. The poor settler had neither the money nor the mechanical appliances for building himself a house. He was content, in most instances, to have a mere cabin or hut. This was made of round logs light enough for two or three men to lay up.

The house would generally be about fourteen feet square—perhaps a little larger or smaller—roofed with bark or clapboard, and floored with puncheons (logs split once in two and the flat side laid up). For a fireplace, a wall of stones and earth was made in the best practicable shape for the purpose, in an opening in one end of the building, extending outward, and planked on the outside by bolts of wood notched together to stay it. Sometimes a fireplace of this kind was made so large as to occupy nearly the whole width of the house. In cold weather when a great deal of wood was needed to keep the proper warmth inside, large logs were piled in the fire-place. To protect the crumbling back wall against the heat, two back logs, one on top of the other, were placed against it.

For a chimney, any contrivance that would carry up the smoke would do. They were usually constructed of clay and sticks. Imagine a cold winter's night when the storm of wind and snow was raging without, the huge fire blazing within, and the family sitting around! It might be cozy enough if the cold was not too intense; and, in reality, before those fireplaces there was often something of cheer, as the farmer sat smoking—if he had any tobacco; and the wife knitting—if she had any yarn and needles.

For a door to his log cabin the most simple contrivance that would serve the purpose was brought into requisition. Before a door could be made, a blanket often did duty in guarding the entrance. But, as soon as convenient, some boards were split out and put together, hung upon wooden hinges, and held shut by a wooden pin inserted in an auger-hole.

PIONEER FURNITURE.

In regard to the furniture of the pioneer's cabin, it may be said that it varied in proportion to the ingenuity of the occupants, unless it was where settlers brought with them their old household supply, which, owing to the distance most of them had to come, was very seldom. It was easy enough to improvise table and chairs; the former could be made of split logs; the latter were designed after the three-legged stool pattern, or benches served their purpose. A bedstead was a very important item in the domestic comfort of the family; and the fashion of improvising them was as follows:

A forked stake was driven into the ground diagonally from the corner of the room, and at a proper distance, upon which poles reaching from each side of the cabin were laid. The wall ends of the poles were either driven into auger-holes or rested in the openings between the logs. Bark or boards were used as a substitute for cords. Upon this, the wife spread her straw tick; and if she had a home-made feather bed, she piled it up into a luxurious mound and covered it with her sheets and bed quilts. Sometimes sheets were hung against the wall at the head and side of the bed, which added much to the coziness of this resting-place—this pioneer bed-room. The sleeping arrangement was generally called a "prairie bedstead."

PRIMITIVE COOKERY.

If the settler arrived in the early part of the season and had not time to plant, or had no fields prepared for that purpose, he could, at least, have a truck-patch, where a little corn was planted, also a few potatoes and turnips, and some other vegetables were put in the ground. Of course this was only to make his small supply, which he had brought with him, reach as far as possible. His meager stores consisted of flour, bacon, tea and coffee. But these supplies would frequently be exhausted before a regular crop of wheat or corn could be raised, and as game was plentiful, it helped to eke them out. But when the corn was raised, it was not easily prepared for the table. The mills for grinding were at such distances away, that every other device was resorted to for making meal.

Some grated it on an implement made by punching small holes through a piece of tin or sheet-iron, and fastening it upon a board in concave shape, with the rough side out. Upon this the ear was rubbed to produce the meal. But grating could not be done when the corn became so dry as to shell off when rubbed.

some used a coffee-mill for grinding it; and a very common substitute for bread was hominy, a palatable and wholesome diet, made by boiling corn in a weak lye till the hull or bran peeled off, after which it was well washed to cleanse it of the lye. It was then boiled again to soften it, when it was ready for use, as occasion required, by frying and seasoning it to the taste. Another mode of preparing hominy was by pestling. A mortar was made by burning a bowl-shaped cavity in the end of an upright block of wood. After thoroughly cleaning it of the charcoal, the corn could be put in, hot water turned upon it, when it was subjected to a severe pestling by a club of sufficient length and thickness, in the large end of which was inserted an iron wedge, banded to keep it there. The hot water would soften the corn and loosen the hull, while the pestle would crush it.

PRIMITIVE THRESHING.

When breadstuffs were needed, they had to be obtained from long distances. owing to the lack of proper means for threshing and cleaning wheat, it was more or less mixed with foreign substances, such as smut, dirt and oats. And as the time when the settlers' methods of threshing and cleaning may be forgotten, it may be well to preserve a brief account of them here. The plan was to clean off a space of ground of sufficient size, and, if the earth was dry, to dampen it, and beat it to render it somewhat compact. Then the sheaves were unbound and spread in a circle, so that the heads would be uppermost, leaving room in the center for the person whose business it was to turn and stir the straw in the process of threshing. Then, as many horses or oxen were brought as could conveniently swing around the circle, and these were kept moving until the wheat was well trodden out. After several "floorings" or layers were threshed, the straw was carefully raked off and the wheat shoveled into a heap to be cleaned. This cleaning was sometimes done by waving a sheet up and down to fan out the chaff as the grain was dropped before it; but this trouble was frequently obviated when the strong winds of autumn were all that was needed to blow out the chaff from the grain. This mode of preparing the grain for flouring was so imperfect that it is not to be wondered at that a considerable amount of black soil got mixed with it, and unavoidably got into the bread. This, with an addition of smut, often rendered it so dark as to have less the appearance of bread than mud; yet upon such diet the people were compelled to subsist for want of a better.

GOING TO MILL.

Not the least among the pioneers tribulations, during the first few years of the settlement, was the going to mill. The slow mode of travel by ox teams was made still slower by the almost total absence of roads and bridges, while such a thing as a ferry was hardly even dreamed of. The distance to be traversed was often as far as sixty or ninety miles. In dry weather, common sloughs and creeks offered little impediment to the teamsters; but during floods and the breaking up of winter, they proved exceedingly troublesome and dangerous. To get stuck in a slough, and thus be delayed for many hours, was no uncommon occurrence, and that, too, when time was an item of grave import to the comfort and sometimes even to the lives of the settlers' families. Often a swollen stream would blockade the way, seeming to threaten destruction to whoever would attempt to ford it. With regard to roads, there was nothing of the kind worthy of the name.

When the early settlers were compelled to make these long and difficult trips to mill, if the country was prairie over which they passed, they found it comparatively easy to do in summer when grass was plentiful. By traveling until night, and then camping out to feed the teams, they got along without much difficulty. But in winter such a journey was attended with no little danger. The utmost economy of time was, of course, necessary. When the goal was reached, after a week or more of toilsome travel, with many exposures and risks, and the poor man was impatient to immediately return with the desired staff of life, he was often shocked and disheartened with the information that his turn would come in a week. Then he must look about for some means to pay expenses, and he was lucky who could find employment by the day or job. Then, when his turn came, he had to be on hand to bolt his own flour, as, in those days, the bolting machine was not an attached part of the other mill machinery. This done, the anxious soul was ready to endure the trials of a return trip, his heart more or less concerned about the affairs of home.

Those milling trips often occupied from three weeks to more than a month each, and were attended with an expense, in one way or another, that rendered the cost of breadstuffs extremely high. If made in the winter, when more or less grain feed was required for the team, the load would be found to be so considerably reduced on reaching home that the cost of what was left, adding other expenses, would make their grain reach the high cash figure of from $3 to $5 per bushel. And these trips could not always be made at the most favorable season for traveling. In spring and summer, so much time could hardly be spared from other essential labor; yet, for a large family, it was almost impossible to avoid making three or four trips during the year

WILD ANIMALS.

Among other things calculated to annoy and distress the pioneer was the prevalence of wild beasts of prey, the most numerous and troublesome of which was the wolf. While it was true in a figurative sense, that it required the utmost care and exertion to "keep the wolf from the door," it was almost as true in a literal sense. There were two species of these animals, the black, timber wolf, and the smaller gray wolf that usually inhabited the prairie. At first, it was next to impossible for a settler to keep small stock of any kind that would serve as a prey to these ravenous beasts. Sheep were not deemed safe property until years after, when their enemies were supposed to be nearly exterminated. Large numbers of wolves were destroyed during the early years of settlement. When they were hungry, which was not uncommon, particularly during the winter, they were too indiscreet for their own safety, and would often approach within easy shot of the settlers' dwellings. At certain seasons their wild, plaintive yelp or bark could be heard in all directions at all hours of the night, creating intense excitement among the dogs, whose howling would add to the dismal melody.

It has been found by experiment that but one of the canine species, the hound, has both the fleetness and courage to cope with his savage cousin, the wolf. Attempts were often made to capture him with the common cur, but this animal, as a rule, proved himself wholly unreliable for such a service. So long as the wolf would run the cur would follow; but the wolf, being apparently acquainted with the character of his pursuer, would either turn and place himself in a combative attitude, or else act upon the principle that "discretion is the better part of valor," and throw himself upon his back in token of surrender. This strategic performance would make instant peace between these two scions of the same house; and not infrequently dogs and wolves have been seen playing together like puppies. But the hound was never known to recognize a flag of truce; his baying seemed to signify "no quarter;" or, at least, so the terrified wolf understood it.

Smaller animals, such as panthers, lynxes, wildcats, catamounts and polecats, were also, sufficiently numerous to be troublesome. And an exceeding source of annoyance were the swarms of mosquitoes which aggravated the trials of the settler in the most exasperating degree. Persons have been driven from the labors of the field by their unmerciful assaults.

The trials of the pioneer were innumerable, and the cases of actual suffering might fill a volume of no ordinary size. Timid women became brave through combats with real dangers, and patient mothers grew sick at heart with the sight of beloved children failing in health from lack of the commonest necessaries of life. The struggle was not for ease or luxury, but was a constant one for the sustaining means of life itself.

CHAPTER VIII.

PIONEER REMINISCENCES.

I.—BY HENRY F. JANES, 1855.

I was born on the 12th of February, 1804, in Pendleton Co., Va., on Straight creek, one of the extreme head branches of the south branch of the Potomac. In 1819 my father moved to Ohio, and settled on the Scioto shore, at Chillicothe, there I remained till the 15th day of April, 1825, when I left the parental roof, on an old one-eyed horse, with two shirts and $4 in my pocket, all told.

At about the end of a week, I reached the vicinity where Lafayette, Ind., now stands. At that time Lafayette had no existence, except in name. There I married my wife, on the 15th day of March, 1827. I remained in that county till September, 1832, when I moved with my wife and two children, to Laporte Co., Ind. I remained in that county till April, 1835, when I moved to Wisconsin with my family, and settled in Racine county, six miles due west from the city of Racine. The February previous, I went to Wisconsin to select a location, and found but one white family in Racine county, being that of a Mr. Beardsley.*

*Elam Beardsley settled in Caledonia, Racine county, in January, 1835.—ED.

There was not a house, nor any sign of civilization between Grove Point, twelve miles north of Chicago, and Skunk Grove, now Mount Pleasant, in Racine county. We were at home wherever night overtook us; our fare was rather hard, but the bills were not high at that time.

Capt. Gilbert Knapp had some men at work in Racine, and I think he had a log cabin built, or partly built, at the, time. I first saw the place where the city now stands. I selected a situation for a farm on a branch of a stream; to which I gave the name of Hoosier creek; and so far as I know, it retains the name yet. I landed on my claim with my family about the first of May, and went to work in good earnest. On the 1st day of August, 1835, my son, J. W. Janes, was born, and was the first white child born in Racine county; he is now grown, and is a hale and active young man.

At that time there were no surveys of the land by the United States surveyors, and we all had to run the risk of the lines cutting us to advantage or disadvantage. Some time that fall the lines were run—that is, the town and range lines, and I ascertained that all my claim and improvements were on the 16th or school section This caused me to look around for a new location. By this time most of the choice claims were taken, or supposed to be taken; and I concluded to make a trip to Rock river, and started late in October in company with Levi Harness, a young man that I took to the country with me. We had little or no knowledge of the country, and started on foot as adventurers.

We reached Prairie village,* on Fox river, the first day; and there learned that a company†

*Since Waukesha.—ED.

†Instead of late in October. it was probably In November, when Mr. Janes started on this trlp; for the company referred to, who had just before passed from Milwaukee, consisting of John Inman, John Holmes, Thomas Holmes, William Holmes, George Follmer and Milo Jones, started from Milwaukee Nov. 15, 1835. with an ox team and wagon, with provisions and farming tools; and on the 18th of the same month. arrived at what was subsequently known as the town of Rock, at a point on Rock river opposite the "Big Rock;" where they camped in thir wagon until they built a log cabin. This was the first settlement in Rock country. See Guernsey's History of Rock County. pages 30 and 114: while on page 156, October is given as the time of this migration.—ED.

had gone out from Milwaukee but a short time before, and were still not far ahead; so we pushed on in good spirits, and camped between Mukwonago and where Troy now stands. Having been misinformed about the distance to Rock river at Prairie village, we supposed that we were not more than ten miles from the river. We started with light hearts as soon as we could see the Indian trail, (for there were no other roads in the country at that time,) one carrying our bed, consisting of a buffalo skin and blanket, and the other the gun, and knapsack with our grub. We ate no breakfast, expecting to be at the camp of our predecessors in two or three hours at the most. We had not got out of sight of our camp fire, when it commenced raining, and by the time we arrived at the place where Troy now stands, every thing, including ourselves, was completely thatched over with sleet. In this condition we trudged on, expecting, on seeing each hill; that we would be sure to see the camp of our friends, but we were doomed to disappointment.

At length, cold, wet and fatigued, we reached the Rock Prairie, and seeing the trail struck into it, and concluded to camp, having eaten nothing all day. We tried to strike a fire and found that all our fire apparatus, like ourselves, was wet; even the powder in the horn would not ignite. In this dilemma we concluded to make one more effort to find the camp or river. Accordingly we started on the trail, and took a kind of dog trot, and kept it up till it got so dark that we lost the trail, and finally my man declared that he could go no further. I got him on his feet, and told him we must get to the brush for shelter, or we would perish with cold and hunger. We then took the wind for our guide, and after some time reached the brush, where we sat down on the wet ground, and spread our blanket and buffalo skin over us. In this way I spent the first night I ever spent in Rock county. Our camp, if such it may be termed, was some eight or ten miles east of Janesville, and near where D. A. Richardson lived when I left the city. The next morning found us in a bad fix—cold and wet—the ground frozen hard enough to bear a horse, and snowing beautifully. After holding a council, we concluded to retrace our steps to Rock river. We started, and in the afternoon reached Turtle lake, where after some three hours hard work, we succeeded in getting a fire and dried ourselves, and camped for the night.

We reached home without accomplishing our object, and remained till some time in December of the same year. I started again in company with a Mr. Glen from Racine, and a man by the name of J. C. Kapp.* This time I took a horse, and we got through without any accident worth noting, and found Samuel St. John† and W. A. Holmes, living in a log cabin on Rock river, one mile below Janesville. The ground was covered with snow some inches deep, and we could get nothing for our horses to eat; we therefore left them here, and explored the country on foot up to Fort Atkinson and around Lake Koshkonong, and concluded to purchase the land at the outlet of the lake on the west side of the river, and marked out claims on the east side with a view of settling there. We accordingly returned, and in a few days I started in company with Alfred Cary, of Racine, for Green Bay. At that time there was not a house between Call's Grove and Rock river, and but one between Milwaukee and Green Bay, and that was Farnsworth's mill, on the Sheboygan river.

On the first day out from Milwaukee, we were overtaken by a young man of the name of Roark, who informed us that Dr. B. B. Cary had been shot the night previous, and wanted his brother to return. He accordingly returned, and Roark and myself went on. In four or five days we reached our destination without any accident worth relating. We had plenty of snow to make a soft bed to sleep in, and wolves enough to howl us to sleep at all times of night.

*perhaps Knapp.—ED.

†Mr. St. John emigrated from Vermont with his wife and three children, and became the first residents of what became Janesville, in November, 1835. Mrs. St. John was the first to find a grave in the new settlement, in June, 1836, caused by a decline of some months' continuance, induced by the want of medical attendance the previous winter, and the shelter and care so necessary to the mother of an infant babe. Her grave is marked by a tombstone upon an eminence near the road leading to Beloit. Mr. St. John survived her several years, and died while on a visit to his brother's, near town and his remains were deposited on the eminence beside those of his wife.—ED.

We found the members of the first legislature of Wisconsin, or the last Territorial legislature of Michigan, at Green Bay, waiting for Gov. Horner to put them in motion; but that dignitary was among the missing, and the whole matter ended in smoke. I found on examining the books at the town office, that all the land we had selected was sold, and I had my trip for my pay. So after looking at the town of Navarino, Fort Howard, and the sights we thought worth seeing, we laid in a stock of crackers, cheese, ham and tobacco, not forgetting some of the "critter," made our adieu to Green Bay, and in due time landed safe at home. Having made two trips to Rock river, and one to Green Bay, for nothing, and thinking perhaps the third one the charm; so I accordingly started the third time for Rock river in company with John Janes, a cousin of mine, who now lives in Bad Ax, now Vernon Co., Wis., and crossed Rock river somewhere near where Rochester now stands, and continued on and explored the country north of Janesville, to near the mouth of Whitewater; then turned down to St. John's and replenished our provisions; then explored the west side of Rock river up to the mouth of the Catfish, and up that to or near the First Lake; we then directed our course for Camp & Collins' Diggings, on Sugar creek, and made Mitchell's Grove in our route. We were some days traveling and exploring, and having run out of provisions, we concluded to repair to Camp & Collins' Diggings for supplies. Just at night we found the section, and quarter section, that we were informed they were on; but they were not there.

It had become dark, and very cold, and we were tired and hungry; so we concluded to make to some timber and build up a fire, and do the best we could. After we reached the timber, and commenced dragging some limbs out of the snow, we saw a spark of fire rise, and after some circles in the air disappear. Soon after we saw others ascend in the same manner, and concluded it was Indians. and that we would go and camp with them, rather than build a fire and lie in the snow all night, hungry and tired as we were. But judge of our surprise on reaching the place, to find it occupied by a white man, Michael Welch, who received us with all the hospitality with which a Wisconsin miner could receive a stranger; and any attempt on my part to describe that, would be but a failure to do justice to that noble hearted class of the citizens of Wisconsin. We were now snugly ensconced in a warm cabin, by a roaring fire, and soon had a stool placed between us, on which was a pyramid of potatoes, and a dish of pork swimming in a miniature lake of gravy, and each a tin cup of coffee. Ye upper tens! How does your nonsense sink into utter insignificance when contrasted with the pure, genuine hospitality of the frontier adventurer. Nearly twenty years have passed since the time of which I am now speaking, I do not know whether Mr. Welch is yet alive or not; but whenever I think of his kindness, it makes my heart throb with grateful pleasure.

We then went over to where New Mexico was afterward laid out, explored there two or three days, and then to Hamilton's Diggings, and finally back again to Rock river. I then selected the claim that Janesville is built on, and marked it as my claim, on the 15th day of February, 1836. By this time I had become snow-blind, and had to lay by some ten days before I could see to travel. My friend went to work for Mr. St. John, and as soon as I could see to travel I started for home. I took the line at the south end of Janesville and followed clear through to Call's Grove,* without seeing the face of a human being, or any trace of one, except the marks of the surveyors that had run the line that I was following.

*Since changed to Ives Grove.--Ed.

Previous to leaving Rock river, I employed Mr. St. John to put me up a cabin, and on the 19th day of May, 1836, about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, I threaded my way to my cabin along an Indian trail that passed up the river through the present city of Janesville. My family now made about the fourth family in the county. It may, and doubtless will, appear rather strange to some of the citizens of Janesville, that nineteen years and a half ago the whole city consisted of one family; and one log cabin, eighteen feet square, with the bark on the logs, and no floor in it, or shutter to the door-way. I had at this time not the least idea of ever building up a town; but in moving to Janesville I opened a track, and all the travel followed that route to Rock river. At that time, Wisconsin City, Rockport, and I know not how many more paper towns, were in existence along Rock river.

Sometime in the fall of 1836 I went to Camp & Collins' mines, and purchased two wagon loads of lead, and that completed a communication from Racine to the Lead Mines by my house, and there was a constant throng of travel on it, and no way to cross the river only to swim the horses alongside of a canoe, and cross wagons in the same way. The traveling community were constantly besetting me to build a ferry-boat, and I at length concluded to do so; and built one at no small expense. After I got it done, I went to Belmont while the legislature was in session, to get a charter; and not dreaming of any opposition, I took no pains to get a petition largely signed; and the proprietors of Rockport, Wisconsin City and Humes' Ferry united in a remonstrance. This then begun a war between the three points. I, by this time, concluded to lay out a town, and according did so. The next summer two of the other places found it was "no go" with them, and they compromised as far as Janesville was concerned, and dropped their towns, and took up a place they called St. George's Rapids, about half way between the other towns, and made common cause against me in general, and Janesville in particular. I attended the legislature at Burlington, Iowa, and at Madison, for some three or four years, got all the roads, mail routes, and all the legislation I asked for. But in getting the county seat located at Janesville, the county took a preemptory on that, and swept it from under me.* And having expended all my means in trying to build up the place, and all my improvements with it, to use a California phrase, I was completely strapped, and on the 24th day of August, 1839, I left the town to its fate. On the 15th day of May, 1838, my son Jasper was born in Janesville, the first male child born in the place†

II.—BY SAMUEL F. CHIPMAN, 1856.

The winter of 1842—3 was extremely severe. The first snow fell on the night of the 8th of November, and continued until the 7th of April, a period of five months with interrupted good sleighing. Much of the time was severely cold, with strong winds and drifting snow; which continued to increase until it had attained to a depth of nearly two feet. Road tracks across the Prairie [in Rock Co., Wis.] would catch the drifting snow until they attained to an elevation of two to four feet, which very much endangered the safety of meeting teams, as in turning out the horse stepping from the path would often sink and plunge so deep that the mate would fall on to, or over him, and both be floundering for life in the deep snow, with more or less icy crusts to cut and maim them. Freeport lay some forty miles southwest of us, to which place

*It may be soon in Guernsey's History of Rock County that the county seat was established upon Mr. Janes' location; and that much praise was awarded to him for his diplomatic tact in overcoming the obstacles which other local interests had cast in his way.

By a law of Congress the county could secure a preemption to the quarter section upon which the county seat would be located. Mr. Janes was ignorant of this, and found himself a tenant upon lands belonging to the county. A compromise was effected by which the county, for a nominal sum, agreed to deed back portions of the land to the original claimants and settlers.—Ed.

†It is stated by the Rev. H. Foote, in Guernsey's History of Rock County, that in January, 1836, there was an infant son added to the family of Samuel St. John, who is supposed to be the first white child born in the Upper Rock River Valley. His name was Seth B. St. John, and was living a few years since at Columbus, in this State.—Ed.

we used to go to get our corn and oats to feed, plant and sow. In a snow storm it was rather a hazardous route to travel. I may as well speak here of one of the many little incidents of that winter.

On one clear, cold, frosty morning I started [from Rock county] for Freeport for a load of corn. On reaching the summit of the ridge of prairie above Bachelor's grove, that divides the waters of Bass creek and Sugar river, near what was then called the lone tree, I discovered a team and sleigh, loaded with men, driving in a direction to cross my track some distance ahead. We soon met. They anxiously enquired for the nearest house. I directed them to the house of John Call, a distance of some two miles. They had started from Monroe for Janesville, two days before, had missed their way and wandered over the trackless prairie for two days and nights without food for man or beast, and had (as they said to me at that time) just concluded, should they not find some other relief, to kill one of their horses and roast the flesh or eat it raw. In such a dilemma one would be led to suppose they were not very much displeased to discover a team ahead. There were four gentlemen I think in the sleigh. If I mistake not, three of them were brothers by the name of Hart; half brothers of Daniel A. Richardson, who was then trading in Janesville. The name of the other gentleman I do not remember. Long will they remember their cruise on the prairie.

As an evidence of the severity of that winter, I will here state a fact with which most of the settlers of that day were familiar, which was, that coons were so emaciated that when on a pleasant day they ventured from their holes in the trees, in quest of food on the ground, they were unable to return for want of strength, and were frequently found by the hunters, frozen to death at the foot of the tree in which they had lived, thereby betraying the whereabouts of those who had been more cautious, or unable to get out. In the fall of 1841, while looking for a piece of land that I might be supplied with fencing timber and firewood, I accidentally run upon a dilapidated set of bogus tools in a small grove near the head of the south branch of Bass creek, southwest of my farm some three miles. There was a casting press weighing some eighty pounds, an iron bar, used, perhaps, as a lever with which to turn the screw to make the impression in coining. Also a small hand-vice, a steel spring, and steel punch with which to cut the pieces to be stamped; and German-silver plates cut into strips the width of half dollars, a small box containing a meal bag and a buckskin mitten, in which was found in an unfinished state thirty-nine half dollars. The effort was evidently a failure, owing either to inexperience in the operators or the imperfection of their tools. The press I still have in my possession. It serves as an anvil when I am disposed to do my own smithing. I have also the hand-vice, punch and spring, which I intend to preserve as pioneer mementoes. The lynching of black-legs at Rockford, Ill., and vicinity, was going on while I was on the road through Indiana and Illinois from Michigan to this place. The Driscols were shot and the gang dispersed. Perhaps the camp that I found was connected with the Rockford gang, and routed by the lynching league. I gave the grove in which their tools were found the name of bogus, by which cognomen it is known to this day.

The region of country embracing the county of Green, as it is now bounded, was not peopled by white men, and no tradition relating to it has come to my knowledge, prior to the year 1827. At that time we were attached to, or rather formed a part of, the county of Crawford, in the Territory of Michigan; the county seat being at Prairie du Chien. The first white settlement in our limits, was at Sugar River Diggings, near the present village of Exeter. Two men by the name of Boner and McNutt, erected shanties for the purpose of trading with the Indians, at or about the place where William Davies' [Deviese's] furnace was afterwards erected—the same furnace which was afterwards held and used by Kemp & Collins, about one mile southwest of Exeter. This was in 1828 [1827]. Soon after, during the same year, J. R. Blackmore, William Wallace and William Deviese came to Sugar River Diggings, and commenced operations in mining for lead ore.* The Indians had been engaged for many years, judging from the heaps of dirt, overgrown with grass, weeds and brush, in raising this valuable mineral; and their discoveries led the whites to that particular locality, where the first settlement in the county commenced. The persons above named, together with a Frenchman [Dutchman] by the name of Van Sickle, who acted as interpreter for the traders, Boner and McNutt, and two men who settled further south, in the fall of the year, by the names of [John B.] Skinner and [Thomas] Neal, formed the entire population of the county in the fall of 1828. We would at once think, that with that little population of white men, surrounded by the savages, and separated by several miles from other white settlements, peace and order would be in the ascendancy. All provisions, that were obtained, were purchased at great cost and trouble at Galena. All shared and felt as one family. And the malicious hand of homicide, we would suppose, would never be raised to reduce that little number. But unhappily, the same cause which produces so many cases now, operated then to accomplish the same result. [Here follows an account of the killing of Boner by McNutt, as given in Chapter XII, of this history].

*"It must not be supposed that [Ebenezer] Brigham was the first white man—the first American—at the [Blue] Mounds; but, although this was not the fact, yet he was the first permanent settler. Before him, as already explained, the diggings had been worked. William Deviese went there in the spring just before Brigham's arrival [the arrival of the last mentioned was in the spring of 1828], where he found two men named Moore, who were trading a little, in whisky at least, and one John Duncan, a very large and powerful man. But on the 12th of August [1828] Deviese moved to Sugar River Diggings, leaving James Hawthorn to continue the work there. So, it seems certain that Brigham, upon his arrival, found miners at work at the [Blue] Mounds, but none of them made a permanent stay. John B. Skinner had at one time a furnace there."—From C. W. Butterfield's History of Dane County, Wisconsin, 1880, p. 347.—Ed.

About the same time, and, indeed some say the year before, 1827, Mr. John [B.] Skinner and [Thomas] Neal came to Skinner's creek, about five miles northwest of Monroe, and commenced mining, and erected a log smelting furnace, the first one in the county.* These men, together with those referred to at Sugar River Diggings, constituted the entire white population of the county for two or three years, and until the agricultural settlement was commenced, by Andrew Clarno and others, in the south part of the county.†

In 1829 William Davies [Deviese] built a furnace near the old trading house of Boner & McNutt, and the remains of this furnace, which are but a heap of ashes and cinders, overgrown with grass, in an open uncultivated prairie, form the only monument to mark the place of the tragedy we have narrated. The only Indian settlement in this county, at that time, was located near the present village of Dayton. There the Indians raised corn, and had an extensive encampment in the summer season.

In 1830‡ Andrew Clarno made a settlement on the old farm where his widow now resides, and which was the first agricultural improvement in the county. His name is perpetuated in the name of the town where he settled, and in which he continued to reside till his death, which occurred some four .or five years since. He was a man of a warm and a generous heart, in whose company the writer has spent many pleasant hours, listening to his rude history of the times of the Black Hawk War. This war broke out in 1832, at which time Joseph Payne, whose name is familiar to all in this vicinity, had just erected and moved into a cabin, together with William Wallace, in the same neighborhood with Mr. Clarno, and at the first out-break of hostilities, on the 5th of May, they fled from their cabins with their families, and

* This is undoubtedly a mistake as to the time of the coming of Skinner and Neal. It was in 1830.—ED.

† This "agricultural settlement" began in 1832.—ED.

‡ This date should be 1832. He took a claim In 1830, but did not move on to it until two years after.—ED.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY

the same day their deserted houses were fired by the Indians. These fugitives camped the first night on the ground where Monroe now stands. Here they spent a restless night, occasionally hearing the savage whoop of the blood thirsty Indians, but were lucky enough to get off undiscovered, with a quick and light tread, in the morning, in the direction of Hamilton's settlement, where they staid the next night, and thence to Fort Gratiot, where they remained till the close of the war.

About the year 1834, several new settlers came into our confines, and among them Leonard Ross, late of Exeter, and Hiram Rust, of Monroe; also, John W. Dennison and Abner Van Sant, who located about three miles southwest of Monroe. These last named gentlemen erected the first flouring-mill in the limits of this county. During the year 1835 the lands of this county first came into market, and the settlers were enabled to procure undisputed titles to their farms. The privations and hardships of the first settlers can only be understood and appreciated, from the lips of those who preceded us. Provisions bore an almost incredible price, and could not be obtained nearer than Galena, some fifty to seventy-five miles distance.

At the first session of the Wisconsin Territorial legislature, at Belmont, on the 9th of December, 1827, the county of Green, detached from the county of Iowa, was established. The county of Iowa, of which we then formed a part, was represented in the Territorial legislature in part by William Boyles,* of Monroe; and to him, as the representative of the region of the newly proposed county, was left the selection of the name to be given it; and he selected the name of Green—indicative of the bright color of the vegetation of this region. Another member of that legislature, with whom I conversed some years since, suggested to our member that Greene would be a more appropriate or more honorable name in memory and honor of the distinguished Gen. Greene, of the revolutionary war; but the present name was preferred by Mr. Boyles, and, through courtesy the name remained as desired by our immediate representative.

The act of the legislature, creating the county of Green, was passed, as already stated, at the first session of the Territorial legislature; and at the next session, held at Burlington, in what has since become Iowa, an act was passed, Jan. 15, 1838, fully organizing the county of Green for judicial purposes, and declaring the new county indebted to the mother county of Iowa for a proportion of the old county indebtedness. Notwithstanding the solemnity and force of legislative law, the people of Green, although often sued in the courts of the State, have refused, (whether justly or not, I will not here digress to say,) to pay the whole, or any part, of said indebtedness. And this war with old Iowa is the only war in which we have participated. Our miniature wars, as exhibited in personal broils, have been numerous, but such as are common to all civilized countries.

The first court of record ever held in Green county was the United States district court, Chief-Justice Charles Dunn presiding, in April, 1838. The first clerk was the late George McFadden, of Dane county, who was shortly after succeeded by M. Bainbridge, Esq. After the first term, the United States courts were for many years presided over by Hon. David Irvin.

Although our growth, at the earliest stages of our existence as an independent county, was not so rapid as some others in the State, and consequently our influence not so extensively felt in the Territorial and State governments, yet no county in Wisconsin has been, or is now, settled by a more industrious, enterprising and thrifty population. The principle business of nearly her entire population has been, from the first, that of agriculture; and the consequence is, that her wealth is generously divided among all her citizens. Nearly the entire population have the means and the will to support themselves. Pauperism and crime, the sure concomitants of large commercial communities, have made no inroads within our borders; and taking into consideration the richness of our soil, the abundance of our timber, and the great number of our water-courses, we can certainly expect to rank as one of the best counties in our flourishing State. The county is about twenty-four miles square, having an area of 576 square miles; traversed through its center by the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad, from east to west, passing through Monroe, the county seat. The south and west parts of the county are nearly covered with a heavy growth of timber. Walnut, ash, oak, sugar tree and linn exist in great abundance, affording great facilities for building, and the manufacture of all kinds of wooden wares. The population of Monroe, the principal town, is about 2,000, while that of the county, by the census of 1855, was 14,727, which has since largely increased. Decatur, Brodhead, Albany and Dayton are flourishing villages.

IV—BY ALBERT SALISBURY, 1871.

Moved by an interest in the early affairs of this, my native State, I spent a part of my last summer vacation in looking up and “interviewing” some of the surviving pioneers of this portion of Wisconsin.* True, it is rather late to be seeking reminiscences, but “better late than never,” especially since the men whom I have dug up, as it were, have thus far been almost wholly overlooked in all the many narratives that concern their times. A special interest attaches to them, moreover, from the fact that they have so long survived the events which made up the chief episodes of their lives.

WILLIAM DEVIESE.

William Deviese was born March 16, 1793, near Huntersville, Pocahontas Co., Va., of French and Scotch lineage. In March, 1826, at the age of thirty-three, he left Virginia, with a surveying party, bound for Arkansas; but on reaching the mouth of the Ohio, reports of the sickliness of the country caused him to turn aside into Illinois. At that time Cairo had hardly begun its existence, there being but a few “squatters” on or near its present site. Going on foot to Vandalia, he passed there the winter of 1826—7. There he saw Abraham Lincoln in the legislature then in session.† In the early spring of 1827, Deviese went by wagon to St. Louis; thence by steamboat to the Des Moines Rapids; thence on foot to Shullsburg, Wis., stopping over night at Galena. At Vandalia he had made the acquaintance of James Hawthorn, who accompanied him on this journey and was his subsequent business partner. They reached Shullsburg March 28, 1827. They found there a Dutch trader named Shull, and four or five cabins occupied by perhaps forty or fifty miners, mostly Irish.

Deviese began mining about three-quarters of a mile east of Shullsburg, selling his ore to smelters. After spending a year here, he went, in the spring of 1828, to Blue Mounds, leaving Hawthorn to continue the work at Shullsburg. At the Mounds he found two men named Moore, who were trading a little, in whisky at least, and one John Duncan, afterwards well known throughout the region, and whom he thinks to have been the largest and most powerful man he ever saw.

Col. Ebenezer Brigham came to the Mounds soon after Deviese, and Jenkins and McCraney built a smelting furnace in the same year. It was while he was at Blue Mounds that the tragedy was enacted at Boner & McNutt’s trading post, near what was afterwards Exeter village.* He had known Boner and McNutt at Shullsburg. They had been led to establish themselves near Sugar river by the same information which also led Deviese to go thither at a later day for mining purposes. A man named Burks, in attempting to cross the Territory, had become lost, and had chanced upon the Indian diggings while making his way towards Shullsburg, on horseback. Deviese, in his account of the Exeter affair, agrees substantially with that given by J. W. Stewart, in Vol. III, Wisconsin Historical Collections, except that he says that Van Sickle was not a Frenchman but a Dutchman—an excellent interpreter, but a great liar.

In July, 1828, Deviese went down to this old trading post to prospect the old Indian diggings already mentioned, and afterwards known as Sugar River or Exeter Diggings. Being successful in "prospecting," he returned to the Mounds, and on August 12, of the same summer, he started to establish himself permanently on Sugar river, leaving Hawthorn to continue work at Blue Mounds, as he had before done at Shullsburg. In the autumn, William Wallace and wife, and Josiah R. Blackmore, went down as employees. Blackmore stayed two years. He is the man from whom Mr. Stewart chiefly derived his reminiscences of early days in Green county, and is said to be still living at Warren, Ill.

In the spring of 1829, Deviese built a smelting furnace near the old stand of Boner & McNutt, one and a half miles west of Exeter. Other diggers had come down during the winter, and his smelting business became quite lively in the summer of 1829. That summer he broke and planted a turnip patch. In the fall he went to Fulton and Peoria counties, Illinois, and brought up a drove of hogs. The following summer, 1830, he broke sixteen acres, and put in corn, pumpkins, turnips and oats.

The lead smelted meantime was hauled to Galena, by oxen, sometimes as high as eight yoke being attached to a single wagon. It commanded, generally, about eighty dollars a ton, but in the spring of 1829, it was very low, owing to the tariff excitement that accompanied the election of Andrew Jackson to the Presidency.

In 1830, many miners were leaving, panic struck. He thinks it was in that year, instead of 1828, as stated by Mr. Stewart, that John B. Skinner and Thomas Neal commenced at Skinner's Diggings, a few miles north of Monroe.* Skinner had previously owned a furnace at Blue Mounds. Andrew Clarno was living with Skinner in 1830, and began on a farm in the town that bears his name, in 1831,† as Deviese thinks.

Deviese had all along done something at trading, besides his mining operations; but in 1831, John Dougherty set up a trading stand on the present site of Exeter. This was a dull year, but Deviese kept on smelting with four employees, and put in a crop in 1832.

[After the Black Hawk War was over, in which conflict Deviese took an active part,]* he went back to [what is now the town of] Exeter and began to re-build in the latter days of August or first of September [1832]. He found his oxen, cut hay, and re-established himself as best he could. He kept on smelting till the next year, when he sold his furnace to Dougherty and went to milling exclusively, continuing at this until 1850. By 1835, he had become worth a considerable figure, but suffered severely from the crash of 1837. It was estimated that during the time he was in the lead business, he made and spent (or lost) about $40,000. In 1835, Kemp & Collins bought out Dougherty. [What was then the village of] Exeter saw its palmiest days in 1839, 1840, and 1841 and was platted in 1843. In those days, a great deal of money was handled there, which is now, perhaps, the most forlorn hamlet in the State.

Thus far Deviese—almost in his own words, and without addition or embellishment; but, of the years that follow, he does not wish to speak. Some particulars were added concerning the state of society among the early miners, the method of making claims, etc.; but, to our interrogatories touching later years, he quietly replied,—“that is all that is worth telling.” Though in his seventy-ninth year, he seems to have clear and definite recollections of the interesting times now nearly half a century gone by, but has little or none of the boastful garrulity so often observed in men of his age and experience.

*See Mr. Stewart's statement next preceding this one of Mr. Salisbury, where he says "About the same time [that is, in 1828], and some say the year before, 1827, John [B.] Skinner and [Thomas] Neal came to Skinner's creek, about five miles northwest of Monroe." The idea Mr. Stewart desires to convey is, that "some say" they came in 1827. But Mr. Deviese is undoubtedly correct as their not working in what was afterward the "Skinner Diggings" until 1830.—ED.

Since the Black Hawk War, he has but once been outside of [what are now] Green and Dane counties. A dozen years ago or more, he spent part of one summer in following up some indications of lead that he had seen while scouting in the Bad Ax country [now Vernon county] in 1832. For the past eighteen years he has been a member of the household of Hollis Crocker, residing three miles west of Belleville, Dane county, whose wife, by the way, the mother of ten children, is a native of Wisconsin, having been born at Gratiot’s Grove. Deviese has always lived a bachelor. As he says,—at the time he ought to have been marrying, he was going out of the marrying world into the wilderness.

“His most noticeable infirmity is a partial deafness. Though not vigorous, he is still able to walk to church every Sunday morning, a distance of over a mile. It may interest the few who may have known him in the days of his reverses, to learn that for the last sixteen years he has entirely abstained from strong drink, and lived an exemplary member of the Methodist church.

“Major Deviese has not been without some scanty and imperfect notice in the historical records of Wisconsin; but his name is always incorrectly given.*”

JAMES HAWTHORN.

“Uncle Jimmy Hawthorn” was born Oct. 22, 1797, in Orange Co., N. Y., and lived in that region up to the age of nineteen. When New York city was threatened in the War of 1812, though but a boy of sixteen, he was among the volunteers stationed at Brooklyn. Among his recollections of that time is that of seeing launched one of the earliest steamers on the North river.

“A young man had no chance there,” and so with a view to make his own opportunities, he went on foot to Pittsburg in 1817, carrying his total effects in a knapsack. From Pittsburg a flat-boat conveyed him to the mouth of the Scioto; thence he went by land to an uncle then living near Old Chillicothe. After working at Chillicothe a year, he went on a flat-boat to New Orleans, and thence took passage for New York in a brig, for it was before the day of ocean steamers. He paid $25 for his passage, boarding himself.

After spending three years in his native county, he again clambered over the mountains to Pittsburg, and thence went on to Hamilton, Ohio. May 9, 1822, he started down the Big Miami on a flat-boat, loaded with flour, for New Orleans. He received $40 as wages for the trip. By this time there were several steamboats on the Mississippi, and on one of these he returned from New Orleans, at a fare of $12; the passage to Louisville occupying twenty two days.

From Hamilton he next went to Edwardsville, Ill., where he worked at “carpentering” about two years. He then went to Vandalia, where he worked for another two years. During the winter of 1826—7, he fell in with William Deviese; and in March, 1827, they left Vandalia for the mining country. Going by wagon to St. Louis, they there took passage for Galena on a steamboat; but, on account of low water, were unable to get over the rapids near what was then known as Fort Edwards. The captain of the boat refunded half the passage money, and a party of about twenty went forward on foot. From Rock Island they got their provisions carried by teams that were going up. On Apple river they made a scanty breakfast of their last "grub," not knowing at that time anything about their distance from new supplies, but they reached Galena that afternoon.

Hawthorn and Deviese began mining near Shullsburg, where Hawthorn remained till October, 1828, when he followed Deviese to Blue Mounds. There he found Col. Brigham, Jenkins* and Thomas McCraney, and, he thinks, Esau Johnson also. He remained at the Mounds about two years, mining there while Deviese was on Sugar river. [Here follows an account of the trial and acquittal of McNutt for the killing of Boner, as given in Chapter XII of this book.]

Another trial which excited much interest, was that of two men for the killing of Clopton. Clopton and Van Meter were traders near Dodgeville, and had become involved in a dispute with one Wells and another man over a mineral claim. Matters had gone so far that Clopton and Van Meter were approaching the claim with the avowed purpose of driving off the other claimants, when they were fired upon by them. One ball passed through Van Meter's leg and hit Clopton, as did also the other ball. Wells and his comrade escaped, but a reward of $2,000 having been offered for their apprehension, they went into St. Louis, and got a lawyer named Bates, to deliver them up and take the reward as a fee for defending their case. Bates was the best lawyer in St. Louis, and, Hawthorn thinks, the same who was in later years Lincoln's Attorney General.* They were acquitted.

At length Hawthorn and Deviese dissolved partnership, and Hawthorn went back to Shullsburg, where he prospected through the summer of 1830. He then went into partnership with John Armstrong, near Gratiot's Grove,

*Probably Thomas Jenkins, who participated in the battle of Pecatonica, June 15, 1832, and was severely wounded there.

*Hon. Edward Bates, who was born in Goochland Co., Va., Sept. 4, 1793, and died at St. Louis, March 25, 1869, was at the period referred to, one of the most eminent jurists in the west. He settled in St. Louis in 1814, and subsequently filled many important positions, including that of Attorney-General of the United States.—ED.

where, they worked a wet mine. They "ran up a water level," and cleared $3,000 in eighteen months., The mineral after smelting, was sent to Galena A tax of one tenth was paid by the smelters to the government.

In the summer of 1832, he "sauntered about," staying for awhile at Funk's Block-house, as he had an excellent rifle, whose services the inmates of the Block-house were anxious to retain. In the autumn of that year, Hawthorn went to St. Louis, there bought a horse, and rode all the way to the Hudson river, a two months' trip, passing through Vandalia, Indianapolis and Chillicothe. He paid $65 for his horse, and sold it in Orange Co., N. Y., for $100.

The next spring, 1833, he came by way of Buffalo to Detroit. The stage then ran westward from Detroit only to St. Joseph, from which latter place he got conveyance by wagon to Chicago and Ottawa. From Ottawa he went by steamboat to St. Louis, and thence to Dubuque, where the excitement over the new lead discoveries was then at its height. Dubuque then consisted of a few miners shanties. Anticipations proved delusive. But little lead was found; cholera made its appearance, and as we may infer, a stampede ensued. In October, 1833, Hawthorn returned to Green county, and located the farm where he still lives, two miles south of what is now Monroe.

He relates that in the ensuing winter, as he was one day coming in from making rails in the woods, he saw his cabin door standing open the wrong way. Some Indian guns were standing outside, which he might have got possession of, had he retained proper presence of mind. He first stood in the door with his ax drawn, but then sprang for his own rifle which was hanging inside. He did not see an Indian pass him, but when he got back to the door, the nearest one was standing some distance away, with gun raised ready to shoot. The others were out of sight. Thirty or forty dollars in silver were in his saddlebags, but the attention of the Red Skins had been so closely given to his stock of cold victuals that they had made no other plunder.

Joe Paine, who afterwards killed a man and left the country, William Wallace and J. R. Blackmore, both formerly employees of Deviese at Exeter, and Andrew Clarno, were in the same vicinity before him. All had but twenty acres broke when Hawthorn came. Clarno broke his first land in 1830 or 1831. Hawthorn thinks with Deviese, that it was in 1830 that Skinner and Neal opened the diggings north of Monroe. After Hawthorn came Hiram Rust, Capt. Ross and others.

The first marriage in the settlement was that of Blackmore to Wallace's daughter, in the fall of 1834. Hawthorn was married next, in 1836; and after him, Cameron. The first white child born in Green county was Charles R. Deniston, in 1834.

"Uncle Jimmy" is still living on the farm that he opened in 1833, and, though not married till the age of thirty-nine, has raised thirteen children, some of whom are already pioneering in the far west. He is still a hale, jolly man—well-to-do in the world, and likely to remain therein for years to come.*

FRENCH LAKE.

French Lake is, in the fullest acceptation of the term, an original character. He is one of nature's greatest successes in the line of oddities. No connected narrative could be obtained from him, he was so fearful of getting into print.

He is a Virginian by birth, having begun life in that part of the Old Dominion which was devastated by the Potomac army. He is still a Virginian; has visited his native region since the war; is as bitter over its ruin as any lover of the "Lost Cause" can possibly be; and "does not wish to be identified with Wisconsin at all, though a resident since May, 1828. Woe betide the writer hereof, should this sketch ever come to the eyes of "old Lake." When I was first introduced to him on the street, a dozen men had gathered in the corner store to see what manner of reception I would meet. As I proceeded to make my wishes known, I was somewhat apprehensive, after all that I had been told, of his ample cowhide boots; but all went well until the idea of publication began to develop, when, with an emphatic and profane explosion, he bolted for the other side of the street. Nothing daunted, however, I gave pursuit, and the final result was a promise that if I could find my way out to his place some day he would talk over old times.

*He is now (1884) living with Thomas Millman, his son-in law, in the town of Clarno, in good health, but with mind weakened by age.—ED.

He lives in "Spring Grove Woods," about eight miles southwest of Brodhead, and four or five miles southeast of Juda. Like all the old Virginian and Pennsylvanian settlers of this region, he had selected the close vicinity of a spring as the necessary place to build; and so I found him living close by the site of his original cabin, which is still standing, though built thirty-five years ago, and surrounded on all sides by heavy timber, with his nearest plow land nearly half a mile away. He owns, if I remember rightly, over 1,200 acres of land, all valuable timber or plow land. He raises large numbers of horses, sometimes keeping them strangers to the harness till eight or ten years old, refusing all offers, even though extravagant; while, on the other hand, a man that strikes his fancy may very likely get a team at half the real value. In all other traffic he is no less eccentric.

I obtained from him an account of the battle of the Pecatonica, which he had received from a young fellow called "Pony Fletcher," who was a participant; but after all that has been said about that little fight, it is hardly worth while to add yet another version.

Lake left Blue Mounds in the autumn of 1833. After the opening of the land office at Green Bay, he, with a few others, went thither to enter land. They went to Fort Winnebago, and followed down the Fox river, walking the whole distance except the last day's journey, for which they hired passage in a canoe.

On his return, he, with another man, took a contract to furnish the troops at Fort Winnebago with hay, and spent the autumn in hay making upon the Portage marshes. They made well at it, earning from $3 to $4 each per day—no small sum in those days.

He settled at his present abode in May, 1836, living for many years a bachelor; but is now a widower, with growing sons and daughters. And, with all his peculiarities, the State has many citizens whom it could better spare than French Lake.*

V.—BY EDWARD D. BEOUCHARD, 1876.†

I presume an old pioneer, who has resided in Wisconsin for fifty-seven years, will not appeal in vain to the State Historical Society for space to set aright his own services, and to vindicate the truth of history.

I was born in Montreal, Canada, Oct. 4, 1804, and left there in the spring of 1816, for the Selkirk colony on Red river; went there in the canoes of the Hudson Bay Fur Company, and paid $45 for my passage. While there, I was employed by the fur company to go on business through the Caribou mountains to the Pacific coast. After many hardships and adventures, I returned to the Selkirk settlement; and, in the fall of 1819, went to Prairie du Chien.

*Mr. Lake is still (1884) living at his old home.

†In a sketch of several Green county pioneers, which was printed some years ago, reflection was made on the character of Mr. Beouchard, charging him with having burned the buildings, goods and tools of Wm. Deviese and John Dougherty at Sugar River Diggings—this, apparently, in revenge, on account of some disagreement with Dougherty. It was added that Mr. Beouchard was a boastful, revengeful, worthless fellow. Also, several of the facts related in Mr. Beouchard narrative given in Smith's History of Wisconsin, were disputed and contradicted; and Mr. Beouchard was further spoken of disrespectfully. The sketch spoken of was that written by Albert Salisbury to be found in this chapter; but the reflections upon Mr. Beouchard we have, in this connection, thought best to omit. Mr. Salisbury made them on the authority and dictation of Mr. Deviese and French Lake. What these several allegations were will sufficiently appear in Mr. Beouchard's denial—ED.

Dr. Moses Meeker, in his narrative, in the sixth volume of collections of the State Historical Society, has stated that Col. James Johnson came to Galena in 1822, I desire to set this error aright. I was, in that year, at Prairie du Chien, running a keel-boat on the Mississippi for Jean Brunet and one Disbrow. Col. Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, was then stopping at Prairie du Chien—the same who had served at the battle of the Thames, and has since figured so prominently in public life. It was then that Old Buck, a Fox Indian, not a Winnebago, came to Prairie du Chien to sell some diggings he had on Fevre river, near Galena. Col. R. M. Johnson, in the fall of that year, hired the boat of the owners, Brunet and Disbrow, and they sent me down with him, in charge of the boat, to Fevre river; and I had orders that if Johnson bought the diggings of the Indian, Old Buck, and wanted some help to put up cabins, to remain and assist him in the matter. He bought the diggings, and I aided in putting up three houses in 1822. Johnson then started for Kentucky, and left at the diggings Thomas January, Amos Farrar, one Anderson, nick-named "Kentuck," myself, and two other Frenchmen, one of whom was named Trepanere and the other Barney. I sent back the boat and hands to Brunet; and, by request of Johnson, and consent of Brunet, I staid there that winter. Johnson never returned; but in June, 1823, James Johnson, his brother, came with provisions, tools and several Negroes.

Major Legate mentions that Col. Johnson sent me with goods with which to buy old Buck's diggings. I only conveyed Col. R. M. Johnson from Prairie du Chien to Galena, with his goods, to buy them. I am certain that it is a mistake that anybody came to Galena in the fall of 1822 from Cincinnati; but a good many did come in the spring of 1823. During the winter of 1821—22, there were but the six of us there all winter, whom I have named.

After Col. James Johnson's arrival, I quit working for the Johnson's, and engaged in the employ of A. P. Van Meter and David G. Bates, continuing with them until the spring of 1826, when I went to digging mineral on my own account. I, in company with eight others, went prospecting, and discovered the New Diggings, and did well there.

Sometime in August, 1828, in company with John Sweetslow and Major Adney as partners, I came from the mouth of Big Platte, to Sugar River Diggings, at Exeter; my partners not liking the place, soon took their departure. About that time Mr. Deviese came there, and proposed to join me in digging mineral and trading with the Indians, and I accepted his offer, but he had no interest in the smelting business. We then sent to Galena for provisions and goods, and in the meanwhile put up cabins and went to work. The Indians troubled us a good deal. The Winnebago village of "Spotted Arm" was about eight miles north, and that of "White Breast" about twelve or fifteen miles south of our diggings, on Sugar river; each of which had about eight or ten Indian houses. Now Mr. Deviese knew very well that he could not stop there, had I not been there myself to keep the Indians off. It is well known that Mr. Deviese and I had three houses at Exeter, near to each other, with a garden spot; we built them as partners, and had an equal ownership in them. He says I burnt his place to spite a man by the name of Dougherty; now that man Dougherty had no property there at all, but he had a cabin about a mile and a half east of us; and I can prove in Mineral Point to this day, that had I felt disposed to do so, I could have cow-hided that Dougherty any time that I chose. Had I wanted to injure such a man, is it reasonable to suppose that I would burn my own, and my partner's houses and property to spite him? On the contrary, from Mr. Deviese's own statement, is it not reasonable to conclude that the Indians burned them during his absence that summer of the war?

Mr. Deviese makes his statement as though I was not at Sugar river during all this early period. I was there, however, all the time, up to April, 1832, when I left. I did not sell or transfer my interest in the houses and improvements because I intended to return, but the war soon breaking out, I did not go back until May, 1833. When I departed from Sugar river in April, 1832, there was not, according to my judgment, 5,000 pounds of mineral at the diggings. From that time until May, 1833, the period during which the buildings and property at Exeter, on Sugar river, were burned, I state unequivocally that I was never nearer Sugar river than the Blue Mounds, Mineral Point and Col. William S. Hamilton's, at Wiota; I did not, and could not, have burned them. Messrs. Deviese and Lake have done me great wrong and injustice, to wait forty years, and then make such misstatements. I never heard of these accusations until I saw them published, and cannot imagine any reason why Major Deviese should do so, never having had any disagreement him, and he having paid me a friendly visit, and spent several days at my house in Mineral Point, long since the occurrence of these transactions. As to French Lake, it may be that he does it out of revenge; for when I commanded the fort at the Blue Mounds, I was obliged several times to reprove him.

The battle of the Pecatonica occurred on the 16th of June, 1832. Mr. Deviese says that one man came up after the battle, "spoiling for a fight." He seems to refer to me, for I was the first who came. I had command of a party of friendly Winnebago's on foot,* who, of course, could not travel as fast as Dodge's command on horseback, but I was not more than 400 yards behind. When I got up to the battle ground I was ahead of my Indian party. Adj. Woodbridge told me that he had shot one of the hostile Indians as he was rising the bank on the opposite side of the pond. By that time two or three of my Indians had overtaken me. I told them of the one Woodbridge had shot, when they went around the pond, found the dead Indian, and brought back his scalp.

* Forty-nine in number, as stated by Mr. Beouchard in his narrative in Smith's History of Wisconsin.

They also searched in the water, and found the remainder, eleven in all, securing also the guns and lances of the defeated enemy.

Mr. Deviese says that Col. Hamilton was absent from his station, Fort Hamilton, just after the fight was over, and the dead Indians and their guns and their lances were found; Col. Hamilton came up with his party of friendly Menomonee's. My Winnebago's now asked Col. Hamilton's Indians to take some scalps; they said: "No, the scalps don't belong to us, they belong to him"—pointing to Gen. Dodge—meaning that they, the Menomonee's, were too proud to appropriate and display scalps from enemies whom they had not slain.

We then went to Col. Hamilton's fort at Wiota, and started home. When we arrived at the fort at Dodgeville, Gen. Dodge ordered me to go to the Wisconsin river and collect all the Winnebago's that I could get to go with us to Rock river, after the Sacs and Foxes. On the 20th of June, 1832, I was ready to start; I was then at the Blue Mounds. My horse being ready, and while taking leave of my friends, George Force and a man by the name of Green, started to ride out. Presently we heard the firing of guns; I spoke and said that they were Indian guns. On looking in the direction of the gun reports, we saw Green running toward the fort, and a good many Indians after him. I threw the baggage off my horse, and started to meet him, but the Indians overtook him before he got half-way to the fort. I saw a good many around him, perhaps fifteen or twenty. On reaching the fort, I told the people, and then started for Gen. Dodge's at the Dodgeville fort about half-past eight in the morning. I reached there at 10 o'clock, and gave the general intelligence of the presence and depredations of the Indians. I then returned to the Blue Mounds, and found that two men had gone after Thomas McCraney and his family, who were then living on their place between the Mounds and Peter's Grove, and I started after the body of Green, brought it into the fort, and we buried it the next day.

Previously, on the 6th of June, when Capt. James Aubrey was killed, I started out from the fort by myself to get his body, and after I had gone a half mile or so, John Dalby and Jefferson Smith came after me on horse back to assist me, and we got the captain's body and brought it in. I had, on that occasion, asked Lieut. Force to go with me, to get Capt. Aubrey's body, but he refused to go, and I told him if he got killed, and was only six feet off, I would not go for his body. When Force and Green were killed, on June 20, and I went and got Green's remains, and brought them to the fort, they asked me if I would hold spite against a dead man. I replied that I would do what I said, whether a man was dead or alive, and Lieut. Force's body lay where it fell for four days.

While at Gen. Dodge's, my orders about going to the Wisconsin, to collect Winnebago's, were countermanded. Four days afterward, Gen. Dodge and his troops came to the Blue Mounds fort, buried Lieut. Force, Col. Gratiot being present at the burial. Gen. Dodge told me that I would have to go with the army to pilot them to Rock river, and if need be, to act as interpreter. After preparations we started, and kept on until we got out of provisions; when we reached Fort Winnebago, my horse got lame, and I was sent back as express to Dodge's Fort. I remained there until the battle of the Wisconsin, when I was ordered with a party of men to go to Helena to build rafts, on which to cross the army in pursuit of the fleeing enemy.

The next morning after we got there, one of the guards told me that my horse and others were in the field of Mrs. Green. I jumped up and ran into the field, the grass and everything was wet, and I got wet up to my neck and by 10 o'clock I was almost speechless. Gen. Dodge sent me back to his fort, with some other men, who had lame horses, or were themselves unwell. I remained there until after the battle of Bad Ax. After the capture of Black Hawk, I had to go to Rock Island to make my return to the commissioner, Gen. Winfield Scott, of my agency at the Blue Mounds, and of the delivery to me, at the Mounds, of the captive Hall girls, by the Winnebago's. When Capt. James Aubrey was killed at the Blue Mounds, I, as lieutenant, succeeded in command at the fort there. So soon as Gen. Dodge came, he ordered an election for captain, and I was beaten by one vote. Col. Gratiot, Indian agent, then appointed me his sub-agent, to look after and care for the Winnebago's about the Mounds. On my return to the Blue Mounds, I was ordered to Fort Winnebago, to receive four Winnebago Indians, who had joined the Sauk's during the war. I staid there until they were brought to me, and I delivered them to Capt. Plympton, commander at that place, and there I was discharged, Nov. 19, 1832.

Now, I do not want to speak of a man after he is dead; but for the sake of truth, I must say one thing about the rescue of the Hall girls, as given by John Messersmith in Gen. W. B. Smith's History of Wisconsin. Had I seen the account before, I would have given it a notice. Mr. Messersmith says that an express came to the Blue Mounds, and they found that the dispatch with which he was charged was on public business, and they prevailed on me to open it, as perhaps it would be of benefit to us all.

In the first organization of the militia at the Blue Mounds, I was elected first lieutenant; Messersmith, McCraney and some others did not like to be commanded, using a rough prefix to the word, by a "foreigner," and the same rude language was used at the election for captain, after Aubrey's death.

Now I leave it to anybody that knows me, if I would go to men who were my enemies for information or instruction. No, sir: it is well known that at that time the commander, in addition to his military duties, acted as postmaster; now this express arrived there after Capt. Aubrey's death, and I, as lieutenant, had succeeded to the command. There were present Col. Ebenezer Brigham, Esau Johnson, John C. Kellogg, and others of my friends, who supported me. Messersmith had no more to do with the letter or express than the man in the moon. On getting the letter, I spoke to Col. Brigham and others of my friends, and by their advice opened and read it to the crowd; then sealed it up, and got a man by the name of Henry Starr to take it to Gen. Dodge, who was requested to send it on to Col. Gratiot; he did so, and Starr returned to the Blue Mounds.

An old settler, whom I do not now remember, has said that Col. Hamilton went to Dubuque and got Menomonee and Sioux Indians to the number of 500 for the Black Hawk War. This is a mistake, so far as the Sioux are concerned, for the Sioux and Menomonee's were always at war; when they met at Prairie du Chien, or at other places, they always attacked each other. I only saw Col. Hamilton's Indians at the battle of the Pecatonica, and I think he had thirty or forty, possibly fifty or sixty, and all Menomonee's; and my Winnebago's were generally about fifty or sixty. But this seems to be the way in which history is too often written.

In May, 1833, I returned to my old diggings at Exeter. Mr. Deviese was not there. After cleaning up what mineral I had there, I went to Dubuque and remained there until 1834, when I came to Mineral Point, where I have since resided. I was some time at Centerville, on Blue river, and some time at the New Diggings.

I have no knowledge of Grant, who is said to have given name to Grant river, and since to the county of that name. Grant river was so called when I first came to Prairie du Chien in 1819.

I served as a private in Col. James Collins' regiment of Illinois volunteers, from August, 1847, to July, 1848.

For forty-two years Mineral Point has been my home, and I am satisfied that none of my old neighbors, those who have known me longest and best, and for whose good opinion I care the most, will give any credence to unkind and unworthy reflections cast upon me. Those who know me best, I am sure, will acquit me of all such charges and insinuations as foreign to my character and nature.

MINERAL POINT, SEPTEMBER, 1876.

VI.—BY ROBERT L. REAM.

In the latter part of April, in the year 1838, I first visited Madison. I traveled there in company with Mr. Wells, who, with a two-horse team, was supplying the people of Madison with produce from his farm in Green county. Madison then consisted of not more than a dozen houses, built and in process of erection, counting every shanty and cabin within three miles of the capitol, and was the only market for Green county farmers.

Mr. Wells and I left Monroe, then called New Mexico, in the morning, and reached Grand springs, near Sugar river, late in the afternoon, and camped there for the night. This was before the land there was entered by Mr. McFadden, and the springs had not yet been named. We built a large log fire (to keep off the wolves, as Mr. Wells said), and fried our bacon and boiled our coffee. The aroma of our dainty dishes must have soon filled the atmosphere; for the prediction of Mr. Wells was verified in an incredibly short space of time, by the surrounding of our camp with prairie wolves in droves. Then commenced such a snarling, fighting, barking and howling, as I never heard before or since. They made the "night hideous," and kept up the music with a thousand and one variations until morning's dawn. During the night we chopped down more trees, cut them into logs, and kept up a rousing fire, the roar and crackle of which made a splendid accompaniment to our opposition concert in camp, which consisted of Negro melodies and camp-meeting songs, which we had learned from Hoosier prairie-breakers in Green county, where it had been my good fortune to serve an apprenticeship at prairie-breaking. Thus we spent a sleepless night (my first night in Dane county). We struck camp early next morning, without bidding our recently made acquaintances a very formal adieu.

We found the then traveled road very crooked and winding, and running at almost all points of the compass, and when within five or six miles of Stoner's Prairie, we halted and took observations. After determining the proper course to take in the direction of Madison, I went ahead with an ax, blazing trees. Mr. Wells followed with his team. We struck the prairie where George Vroman's farm was afterward located. The road which I then blazed, was afterward adopted by the public, and traveled for many years; After passing through the prairie, we followed the old trail to Madison, where we arrived the second day.

From Madison back to Monroe, there was no mode of conveyance, and I made this journey on foot, in one day. It was then fully forty miles by the meanderings of the road. There were no bridges, and I was obliged to wade Sugar river and its tributaries as well as several large marshes, in some of which the track lay knee-deep under water, and I suffered severely with the rheumatism in consequence thereof. In the latter part of May, of the same year [1838], I made another trip to Madison, when I negotiated with Mr. Peck for the Madison House, and in the month of June removed my family there and took possession as the landlord. *

VII.—BY HIRAM BROWN, 1884.

I was born on the 23d of September, 1803, in the town of Sommers, in Holland county, State of Connecticut, and about twenty-two or

*Says Mrs. Roseline Peck: "The old log house, which we used as a hotel for over a year, then leased, or rented to R. L. Ream, and by him kept as a house of entertainment until we left the place, has since been removed. Mr. Ream was the father of Vinnie Ream, who was born in the cabin after we left it." it is hardly necessary to say that Vinnie is the famous American sculptor. She is the wife of Richard L. Hoxie—ED.

twenty-three miles in a northeast direction from the city of Hartford, in that State. When I was about three years old my parents moved into the State of New York and located about 100 miles west of Albany, in the town of Madison, Madison county, on the Cherry Valley turnpike road, or thoroughfare from Albany to Buffalo. My parents lived there till the death of my mother in 1837. My life up to near that time was occupied at least till I was about twenty-one years of age in assisting father in procuring the necessary things for our daily living—spiced with some little wanderings as to locality to near the time of my majority, but always with the knowledge and consent of my parents. A part of this time I was at work in a cotton mill at low wages ($1 per week, including board and washing) was supposed to be learning the trade of managing or overseeing the carding room; but they instructed me slowly, keeping me most of the time at cleaning the cards. After one month's work at that, I could do it as well as the best and as quick also; but after some nine month's labor at that craft, I bid the cotton-mill good day and sought some more lucrative business and found it in being a farm hand. I soon was able to command the wages of a common hand to-wit: $8 per month, washing and mending thrown in. This was in the summer season; in the winter I found work at threshing out grain with a flail and got every tenth bushel of wheat, and for rye and oats I sometimes got every eighth or ninth bushel. Sometimes this included my board. At other times I got an occasional job of cutting a few cords of wood at twenty-five cents per cord and boarding myself, or twenty cents per cord and boarded. The timber was mostly beech, sugar and maple. In the spring of 1827, I started for Chautauqua Co., N. Y., some 250 miles from home; and there I found work with an old school-mate at $10 per month and washing. That year, about the 1st of June, Gen. La Fayette passed through Fredonia on his way east. The military, in that vicinity. were all called out to give the general a reception, and most nobly did they obey the call, thinking themselves highly honored to assist in the reception of a man who had assisted, both by his sword and purse, the colonies in their struggle for that freedom which they were then enjoying.

The general, by special request, took the overland route from Cleveland to Fredonia, and thence three miles to Dunkirk, where a steamer awaited to carry him to Buffalo. It was expected that he would arrive about 1 or 2 o'clock P. M., so, in order to have things ready at the proper moment, they improvised a sort of telegraphic communication for some fifteen miles above by putting trusty men on the housetops along the line with a flag which was to be raised as soon as the general arrived at the first station; and that was the signal for the man at the second station to raise his flag; and his flag raised was the signal for the next man to raise his; and so on to the last one. But, with delays and receptions, he did not arrive till between 1 and 2 o'clock in the night; then a reception-speech and answer, and the military passing in review, and each one shaking hands with him, detained him so long that it was not till sunrise that he reached Dunkirk, where the steamer was still in waiting to convey him to Buffalo. Fredonia was illuminated with a lighted candle at each light of glass in every front window and at Buffalo, there was a similar illumination.

The next winter, by the aid of friends, I got a school in a back district, as teacher, at $8 per month, and boarded among the scholars. In the spring, or forepart of the summer, I attended a select school more particularly to get a better knowledge of grammar. The teacher was known as a good grammarian and a fair writer. These comprised most of his qualities as a teacher. The next winter I got a school at $12 per month, and the succeeding winter at $13, at same place. My health not being good, I found light work, attending bar at a hotel or tavern, and other light work, till the fall of 1835, when I found myself some two and a half miles down the Susquehanna, below Wilkes-Barre, where I kept a school for three terms. I then took a wife and started the same day for Wisconsin, where my wife had a brother, John Inman. We took a steamer at Buffalo, for Michigan City, where my wife had several relations; but when we arrived at Chicago we were politely told if we would wait till they got ready they would take us there.

We then took a stage and went to Michigan City, where, the next day, John Inman came. After a few days spent there in visiting, we started for Wisconsin where we arrived on the 13th day of September, 1836, with provisions sufficient to last us five or six weeks, and between $84 and $85 in money, without a stove or the first hoof of any stock. My wife, for some four years, had the charge of her brother's son, a lad then some ten or eleven years old. She boarded, clothed and schooled the lad for four years without any pay, though he supposed she was getting her pay quarterly.

We moved into his (Mr. Inman's) house just below Janesville, mine making the eighth family in Rock county. The house was a log one, 12x14 feet inside, with a fire-place about half in the house, and the other half out doors, and the chimney entirely outside. The house had one window by the side of the door, consisting of two lights of glass, 8x10 inches. The door was made of shakes nailed to two sticks, with a sort of wood hinge. There was a wood latch, the same being raised with a string.

Mr. Inman got a team and went to Chicago for some winter provisions, where he got some sour flour at $7 per barrel and two barrels of pork, at $20 cash. he also got a few groceries such as coffee, tea and sugar with some rice. He there learned that his brother with a large family would be along in a few days. Finding his load of provisions heavy, he left one barrel of pork some twenty-five miles out from Chicago, which be afterward sold for $45. The pork we got was of a miserable quality, poor and scant of salt and soured. It consisted of heads and shanks, hardly affording fat sufficient to cook itself in; but, bad as it was, what with all of us together it did not last till January. We could get fish all we wanted but we lacked any fat to cook-them with. No butter, no milk, no grease of any kind.

About Christmas Richard Inman moved on to his claim a little above Afton on the east side of Rock river. We (that is, my wife; her girl, say eleven years old; John Inman and his boy) by dint of good management, made our flour last until the middle of February, when I went to Rockford with one of my neighbors—he to get grain for his horses and I to get flour. There had been a thaw the day before we started which made it difficult to cross ravines. Sometimes we had to go up them and at other times, down. At Roscoe, we had to cross a small stream which was swollen. It was without a bridge and the water had washed off the snow and left the banks icy and very slippery. A person living on the opposite side told us to keep up as high as we could and we tried to cross according to his direction; but the current took both horses and wagon down stream, so that my neighbor jumped into the water and got hold of the horses bits but could not get them over. I then jumped into the water and got ahead of him and took hold of one of his hands to help him and the team out, but as I stood on smooth and slippery ground, I could help but little. The man living there then waded into the stream and took my hand, by which assistance we got the team and wagon out and across the stream, but we were wet to the middle. We went into the house to dry ourselves and finally staid there all night. We went to Rockford next day where I bought a barrel of flour at $16 offering to take two at $15 each, which was refused. On our return, we passed through Rockton where we found two barrels of flour at $15 each of which my neighbor took one and I took the other. We left them there, with the understanding that I should take his team and get them home in two or three weeks. The Turtle creek at Beloit had then become impassable for teams to cross; but I got across by the help of some of the half-breeds living on the north side, who took me across in a canoe, and I made tracks for home. When this flour was gone I bought another barrel of Daniel Smiley, now living in Albany, Wis., paying him $19 for it. When that was gone (which was not till after harvest) I went to Fox river above Elgin and got flour there. Along in April and May, when we had to live on flour and fish, we could hardly keep body and soul together. As to myself, I know I could hardly walk straight from mere weakness; but as vegetation came forward we got a few greens to boil, and seasoning them to some extent with wild onions, they certainly made a change of diet and little more relish. I also got an old Indian shotgun about this time, and could once in a while get a duck, which made a sort of a feast for us. If it was a small one, it was better than none at all; but as we had some garden and a little corn, and in the summer raised some buckwheat, the next winter was passed quite comfortable.

I, that winter, kept a school—the first one kept in Rock county, and had for one of my scholars Daniel Stone, now living at or near the mouth of the Catfish.

In the spring of 1838 there was to be elected in the district then comprising Rock, Walworth, Racine and Kenosha counties, three county commissioners and one assessor;—and as there were two sets of candidates, there was considerable strife as to which should be the successful party. As I had previously held some written communications with the sheriff of this district, he and Fred. S. Lovell came to my house to enlist my services toward electing their favorites, in which I became a cheerful volunteer; and as I then knew every man in the county, it was supposed I might be worth to them more than a mere voter. As events turned, their friends were elected.

I learned that the assessor could appoint as many deputies as he pleased. I made application for the place of deputy assessor for Rock county, which I obtained without difficulty; but it was necessary that I should go to Kenosha or Southport to be sworn into office by the said Lovell, who had been appointed as clerk of the board of commissioners—distance sixty-five miles. This journey I made on foot, there and back, in three days.

There were but few inhabitants at this time in Rock county, and none of them on the west side of Rock river, nor was there any land to assess in the district except on the west side of Rock river. After providing myself with plats from the land office at Milwaukee, showing the entries of lands, I proceeded to the assessment of that part of my district. At one time I was four days on the west side assessing, using the plats as best I could, endeavoring to find at night some wood and water near each other. I often, when thus assessing, thought what a laughable picture I should present to my friends at the east, by representing me with a quilt on my back for a bed at night, my provisions in a sack, with a coffee-pot on the top of my pack to make my coffee in, and a tin dipper to be used as occasion might require,—and myself examining my plats to see what I should assess.

It was part of my duty to call to my aid two assistants when assessing city or village lots. There was at this time, no less than four cities or villages in each county to be thus assessed, some of which had been surveyed and staked out and others merely platted on paper. Lots were usually assessed at 25 to 80 cents each for corner ones, and for inside lots 15 to 20 cents each.

As I passed along, I took something of a description of the country for future use. The entries were mostly fractions on the river, or heavy timber in the interior, and were assessed from $1.50 to $3 per acre,

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

At the time I made my assessment return to the board of commissioners, the sheriff, Edgar R. Huganin, who was ex-officio collector of taxes, proposed to me to collect the taxes in Rock county, but thinking it would not prove to be a lucrative business, I declined his offer, telling him, however, that I thought I knew a person who perhaps would like the position. On inquiry, I ascertained that I could get no one whom I would recommend, and so informed him by letter. In the latter part of August, or fore part of September, he came to Rock county to post up some election notices, when he again asked to take the collection of taxes in Rock county, but as my ideas were that I would not get much pay, I again declined. However, I made him the offer to do the collecting for fifty cents a day, but if I had to be away from home over night he should pay my bills. This offer he declined to accept; but still urged me to accept the position, saying he would not ask me any bonus, and further said he had no doubt but that I could make more than fifty cents per day clear. He said he would not come there and collect the taxes for all he could get. He would sooner pay the personal property taxes himself than bother with them.

As I felt under some obligation to him, I told him I would take the collection of the taxes as we had talked about before, provided I could get bondsmen satisfactory. On his return home, he sent me a blank bond except as to the amount, which I got some of my friends to sign, and I returned the same to him. I shortly afterward got the appointment in due form to simply collect the taxes due from the residents of the county. This would not have paid me fifty cents per day, but I got some taxes paid by non resident holders of land on the west side of the river.

I had to publish a notice of sale of lands for taxes due as delinquent, but as there was no newspaper published in either of these counties, I had to go to Milwaukee to have the publication made as required. When the time came to sell the lands, the sheriff was on hand to pay the taxes on some lands to the amount of some $30 more or less. I had to open the sales however, and I offered a few pieces of which were rapidly sold. I then stopped to take the taxes from individual owners of land who were present. I soon took in over $100, and then again I commenced selling, which was done as quick as I could call off the description of the land with the taxes and costs added. Bidders were so plenty that they sat around a large table and each took his turn in the bidding. When I finally closed the sale, I found I had averaged some $4 per day instead of fifty cents, and that after giving Mr. Huganin the taxes which he was to pay me, a prouder fellow in rags than myself one did not often meet.

The next season I bought on time, the land on both sides of Bass creek, near its mouth, and where Afton now stands; but after putting up a house and doing some fencing, I sold out the next season, and in the spring afterward removed to Green county. Two years after my settlement in Green county, I was elected assessor for the four east townships in the county, and was re-elected. I was then elected as county commissioner and subsequently was honored with a seat in the first Constitutional Convention. Not far from this time Alvinza Hayward proposed to me to buy some law books with him and go into the practice of law. I told him it was all proper for him to commence the study of law, but as to myself I was too old to undertake to study a profession.

The following winter after the suggestion of buying some law books by Mr. Hayward, of which I have spoken, he went into the pinery on the Wisconsin river, and worked in a logging camp, and when the raft went out he went with it to St. Louis where the raft was sold and he was paid off. He then bought $130 worth of law books and came back to his home in Exeter, where he again made the proposition to sell me one-half interest in the books, and both study them as best we might, he keeping a part and I a part; we were to exchange as we might desire. It becoming known in that neighborhood that I had an interest in the books, and rather aspiring to make myself somewhat acquainted with law proceedings, I was occasionally called upon to plead some plain cases, (as most clients have plain cases, any way) with Mr. Hayward as opposing counsel. In one of the first suits tried, when we called a certain witness on the stand to give his testimony in the case, Mr. Hayward objected to him, as he intended to impeach his testimony. My reply was that possibly the witness might not state anything objectionable to his case, and that, at least, he should wait till the witness gave in his testimony before he attempted to impeach it—to which he said he should not object. We were then, both of us, as ignorant of the rules of impeachment as we were of the Bible, if not more so. After the witness had given in his testimony, Mr. Hayward called on a man as an impeaching witness, and after the impeaching witness was sworn, Mr. Hayward asked him if he was acquainted with such a man (witness to be impeached). Answer, "yes." Second question: "Would you believe him under oath?" Answer, "No, I would not." He then turned the witness over to me for cross examination. First question:

"Has this man ever been convicted of crime, punishable by imprisonment for a length of time in the States prison, and not pardoned?" "No, I don't think he was ever in any States prison." Second question: "Do you live near him?" Answer: "Yes." Third question: "Is he a fair neighbor?" Answer: "Yes, one of the best I ever knew." Fourth question: "Well, if a good neighbor, and you have no knowledge of his ever committing a crime, why would you not believe him under oath?" Answer: "I once heard him say that if he had a brother who had perhaps committed a crime (when in reality, the person injured was the aggressor), and the officers in pursuit should call on me to know if my brother was not there, (although I had in reality secreted him), I would deny it, as was done in a case that had occurred in the county some time previous—and under like circumstances, he would do as that other man had done."

Counsel for defense asked if I had no other questions, as he liked the way I was doing. He had merely asked the witness if he would believe the witness under oath—but that proved the reason why and thus strengthened the point beyond a cavil or doubt. In his remarks to the court and jury he said the plaintiff had no case, as the testimony of the impeached witness must be taken for nothing, and that being thrown out, we had no case (which was true).

In answer to Mr. Hayward, I replied that he had not impeached our witness at all; but, if there was any impeachment, the impeaching witness had impeached himself. He swears he would not believe him under oath, and yet he believes him some when not under oath, and could only make the case applicable when a parallel case was under examination. Such was not the case then and there to be tried. I further stated this riddle for counsel and jury to unravel: When a man says he lies, does he lie or does he speak the truth. If he speaks the truth then he lies and if he lies he speaks the truth. The jury decided the suit by giving me the case, which proved to be a feather in my cap.

Mr. Hayward was admitted to the bar in some twelve or fifteen months after, with honor to himself and the profession. Some eight or ten months after, I bought the other half of the law books, and he went to California, and there became, in due time, a millionaire; since he went there, I have not seen him.

Subsequently I was admitted to the bar, whether well-fledged or not. I have had cases when from both evidence and pleadings (proper), I ought to have had judgment for damages, but got none; and, at other times, it has been the reverse, faithfully proving what a lawyer in Hartford, Conn., once told me when I went to him for counsel: "We lawyers say that there is a glorious uncertainty in the law;" which I have found literally true.

In my peregrinations, I, at one time, found myself in Staffordshire, England; this was in 1854. I went there mostly at the request of Walter Tait, whose father's family then lived in England. It was thought he might have some money there belonging to him from entailed property. The property was entailed to Walter Tait's oldest son—had Walter been the oldest legitimate son. His mother was married twice to the same man; and after some years from the first marriage when she had presented to her husband some two or three sons and some daughters, there was some talk that another branch of the family might get the entailed property, and they went over to Scotland and were there married again. Walter was the only male heir under that marriage. Now if he could show that the first marriage was not legitimate and thus make the children by the first marriage illegitimate (his father being dead), then he could inherit a fortune. But the law as declared by the highest authority (the Chancellor), said, if parties lived together as man and wife and were so known among their neighbors till one of them died, they would be considered as lawfully married. An elder brother after his father's death had got the entail cast off, spent the money, and died. Having no further business there, I returned home, bringing with me two crates of crockery, which I sold in Albany, Green county, after keeping out enough to last our life-time, (wife and self) and we are now using it.

VIII—BY MARGARET MCCOY.

It was a bright and sunny morning, with a pure atmosphere, that seemed to bathe all nature with gladness, when I left the "Cream City." "The world all before me," but not "where to choose," as my husband had preceded and located on a quarter section of township 4 north, range 9 east, section 17, (now the town of Brooklyn). The warmth of the day made only light wraps necessary, and as the teamster had placed my baggage in the very bottom of the wagon, under a load of sundry merchandise, such as soap, salt, tea, coffee, etc, I was left without a chance to get at heavier garments. There were no railroads in those days, and it took some days to reach our destination. The next day was ushered in by a "sun burst," and we were in hopes of fine weather, but alas! for our hopes, the scudding clouds indicated rain, and the blue mist made nature seem in a weeping mood, too soon it poured down, and my situation perched on a salt barrel, with only an umbrella and a thin shawl as a wrap, was anything but envious. I was literally drenched. Soon the wind changed north and then froze, but when reaching the "Bale Tavern," I was in no need of the many inventions we have now-a-days to make clothes stiff, as mine were thoroughly so, by the process of freezing. I vividly remember my getting down from that barrel, and trying to induce circulation. Young reader, you who can travel in 1884, in your "Cushioned Pullman's," cannot realize the hardships of primitive traveling in 1848.

After resting at the "Bale Tavern" all night, and feeling refreshed, our teamster started the third day with hopes of reaching our goal. We made as much haste as the horses and roads would permit, until within two miles of the now thriving town of Evansville, when one of the horses took sick. We had to dismount, and try to find some place to stay over night. I called at a house. I think the name of the owner was Foster. The lady of the house was at a neighbors, caring for some sick person, and had sent a young girl from there to take care of her children. I slept with that young girl. Next morning I learned from Mrs. Foster that my bed-mate was a squaw of the Mackinaw tribe, and was a clean, pleasant looking brunette. So on we go, through the "grove," as it was then called, with only a few houses and the Methodist church. We pass unheeded—through miles of prairie. We pause at a hut to inquire our way, and are told we are not on the right track. We retrace our steps for a mile and a half, when we reach "Father Egglestone's." There we stay for dinner, and make the acquaintance of his wife, a sweet, delicate little lady. There, also, we met two men to whom I had given a letter of introduction to my husband while in Milwaukee. He helped them to locate on a quarter section. Soon we reach the log mansion secured by my husband from a widow, who had buried her husband and was going to Walworth county with her two children—one of whom is our present townsman, Mr. Roots.

I well remember knocking at the door, and, "like patience on a monument," standing leaning against the rough portal (as I did not then enter), inquired where Mr. McCoy was. There were three women there; two were wives to those Fee brothers whom I met in Milwaukee. The third was a Mrs. Shell, whose husband had come from Poland with Mr. Root. One of the ladies sat in Arabic fashion, as chairs were minus.

I was told "he was off chopping, and they did not know where, as they could not cross the fence lot lest they would get lost." I asked in what direction. "Oh, he goes by the back of the house." So by the back of the house I went, and took a straight line for the next settlement through the marsh, and at length reached a house where the lady was pulling up beets for the winter's use. Her husband sat beside her in the garden, on a chair, as he was in the last stage of consumption, and died in about three weeks afterwards. His name was Carpenter. In answer to my inquiries he told me to turn an angle of his fence and I would come before long to where Mr. McCoy's lot was. I followed his directions, but soon "tired nature" asserted her rights, and I sat down to listen for the sound of an ax. Yes! there it was, as the echo reverberated through the woods; soon it ceased, and shortly after I espied a man in the distance, whose walk I knew, emerging from a tangled opening, with an ax on his shoulder, dressed in a swallow-tailed English broadcloth coat, pants of the same, fancy vest and a silk beaver stove-pipe hat, with seventeen blisters on his hands, his business suit being in our baggage, which I then brought. On reaching our future abode, the teamster deposited the freight, was paid, went his way, and I must here describe the interior. There was a cook-stove, two trunks belonging to the Fee's, and a bedstead in one corner, formed of poplar poles, which had been made by the lady who owned the house, for her husband had been an invalid and died a short time previously. By way of courtesy, the Fee's extemporized pallets "up chamber," and left me the bedstead. Our trunks served us for chairs, and a large "chest" which had seen "marine service," was a substitute for a table, rather out of character with the damask linens which sometimes covered it. When he went to Milwaukee to buy lumber for our house he purchased chairs, table, bedstead and a crib. The lumber was brought out by teams which hauled produce, etc. We lived in the log house the first winter, which needed no modern modes of habitation, I assure you. The great problem of housekeeping was now to be solved, and being a novice in that line, I had to gather information from every one who was within reach. My next neighbor, Mrs. Shell, was very kind on all occasions. Then there was Mrs. Gray, and Mother Stopp, who was verily a "Queen of Cuisine." I thought if others knew how, I could learn also. Here my first lesson in washing linens was rather severe. Not having soft water, we had to "cleanse," and so I in my ignorance put a triple portion of lye in the hard water. Consequence, fingers stripped of the skin. I never repeated the operation. The winter was severe, but as our wardrobe was ample, we did not suffer. But there were rails to haul and a yoke of oxen were bought, and a sled manufactured most primitively, which deserves a designation here. It was of sawed timber, generally done at "Winneshiek sawmill," and having holes bored for four stakes at one (the back) end a chain fastened across, with a few boards on the bottom and one at each side, formed the box. When we "went to meeting" or visiting we threw a quilt over the chain, and thus formed a seat, protected from the wintry blast. I must not let our oxen pass unnoticed. Had I the genius of a Scott or a Dickens, they should be immortalized in history or song, beyond a "Marda," or a "Linda," for many times they outstripped in speed the horses of our neighbor on the road to Exeter meeting. As there were then no "excursions" or "picnics," or "apple parings," we had to depend on the wild grapes, currants, plums, etc., of Sugar river the winter was environed by "bees" of various nature, combining pleasure and profit. There were chopping, sausage, sewing, quilting, and many a kind mother was thus helped. along.

"Our neighborhood" then took in a circle of three miles or more, and in sickness every one outdone the next in "helping," and many were the social gatherings enjoyed. One I remember well, held at Amos Kirkpatrick's, where John Dalrymple now resides. The elder ladies met to sew, the men to chop. The day was cold, but the thermometer stood high (had there been one there) under that hospitable roof. The young people staid to "trip the light fantastic toe" until "the wee sma' hours," but we sober matrons left early. After wrapping and being seated in our model sled, I found I had forgotten my furs, so Mr. McCoy returned to the house for them, which he had no sooner done than off went Buck and Bright like an arrow over the "spring run," up the hill, down to the dale, across the creek, dashed along heedless of any oxen lore I possessed, my whoa's only accelerated their speed. At length, and in a short time too, they reached the gate. I got out, opened it, then very instinctively they turned around an angle and went straight for a hay stack. I then entered the "cabin," started a fire, put on the tea kettle, had it boiling when my husband came in, almost breathless after a run of two miles. We sometimes went with said oxen to the south corner of the township to meeting. At one time a humorous incident occurred. A man arose to clear a local preacher of the charge of stealing corn. He said he had a line from father, and that the bag, instead of corn, only had a beetle and wedges. Thus "the spice of life" kept ennui at a distance. Every one seemed hopeful, because they were young and had an object to work for. The spring of 1849 came, and with it new work. We had our house to build, which was done by Mr. Lozin, and as we are fond of the antique, we still reside in it, with some "additions" as the family needs increased. The lumber was hauled from the lakes. That year prices for produce were low; we bought our wheat at twenty-five cents per bushel, our pork at $2.50 dressed, flour $1.50 per hundred-weight, potatoes twenty cents per bushel, corn eighteen cents per sixty pounds shelled. I remember a young man bringing a load of barley to Milwaukee, and after being seven days on the road came home with two cents, as the proceeds of his load. What an argument in favor of railroads!

We had to go five miles for our mail, to the village of Exeter; when oxen were busy on the farm had to walk. Exeter was notable for its mineral then, and also for there being a store, post office and tavern. Here we were waited on by the clerk in Mr. Safford's store, who has since made his mark in the county as merchant, banker, etc., and never forgets his early friends.

I think our township was early an advocate of temperance. Once a "raising" was being held in a joint district, and, in the absence of a good meal, a whisky jug was introduced, when the men staggered around as if drunk, with it in their hands, until they broke it and spilled its contents on the ground.

We were indebted to the visits of a colporteur for the books used in our Sunday school, and as we had no stated ministry, we were from time to time favored with preachers of widely different theological views—sometimes it was a Methodist or a Congregationalist, or a Mormon, or a Christian, a Universalist, etc. One I remember who still lives, made use of such “highfalutin” phrases that he appeared to belong to the “Partington” school.

Time passed on in its course, town duties loomed up, and though the ladies never had “their say” in the business, yet I think there were many who did their share in the work, for instance, when the “braves” were in town council at dry prairie rendezvous, Mrs. Anderson, wife to Jerry, and his daughter, Mrs. H. Allen, made them many a rich repast, disdainful remuneration, and in latter years, when our “unpleasantness” called for husbands and sons, many resigned them to their Nation’s need, one or whom bitterly remarked (who had lost her husband in camp), that she had a notion to erect a hospital for the lame or sick Yankees, and unnaturalized foreigners.

The flora of the woods in the spring was delightful to the vision. Many a time have I looked in rapture on their varied hues—the anemone, cowslip or shooting star, lupine, and bitter-sweet, woodbine, and so on, were the only sources of aesthetic enjoyment. Combined with the ornithology of the woods, we could study nature in the grandeur of its primitive state, before the rude ax desolated the forests—but there was more real, earnest work to do. The fields had to be formed by “breaking,” stones dug up, “grubs” taken away and burned, fences made, etc., and then came the harvests rich in grain, but the “one man” had to “cradle,” rake and bind, and do all the out-door chores alone, except when he was fortunate to be near a neighbor where he could “change work.” Money was scarce—this was no Eldorado. Many had to keep their taxes long before, lest they could not find enough at the time. The coarsest garments were worn; at one time a lady asked in a store for to look at “poverty,” meaning a kind of material which went by the name of “hard times.” Many of our early pioneers had both energy and brains, and had there been the chances then there are now for making money, they would have been successful—but the distance to market, and financial depression in 1848 were great drawbacks.

Twenty-five of the men who voted at the first town meeting, held at Nelson Patterson’s house, were voters in 1873. Now only ten remain in town, on the farms they first entered from Uncle Sam. Their names are Anson Starkweather, Harvey Starkweather, James Eggleston, Franklin Patterson, William Smyth, Emery and Jonathan Smyth, Willis Hazeltine and James McCoy—some have retired to towns, and many more are gone the way of all the earth. So time passes.

IX—BY J. R. CROCKER, 1884.

Uncle Tom Bowen, who lived south of Monroe on the State line one mile north of Oneco, Ill., started with a double team of horses in the month of May, 1842, for Chicago to get his niece, her two children and your humble servant and bring us to my uncle’s, Stephen Estee, who lived over two miles east of Oneco. I came up the lakes with my aunt and her two children, Daniel and Abigail Estee, in the beautiful steamboat Great Western. In consequence of a heavy sand bar at the mouth of Chicago river our boat could not come up to the wharf, but remained outside until by the aid of two immense scows, she was unloaded of her goods to such an extent that she passed over the bar and alongside of the wharf about 3 o’clock P. M. All this time I was making good use of my eyes looking at the panorama. Old Fort Dearborn was in a dilapidated state, the palisades were broken down, but the block houses were well preserved. On looking up the river I could see a long line of low wooden buildings on the left hand bank, while on the right hand they were more scattered. I was not quite twenty-two, and as a consequence was unconscious of the flight of time, being very much absorbed in what was going on. Just at this critical juncture. I heard my name shouted “Crocker.” On looking around I perceived my aunt and her two children being hurried off on the double-quick by a large burly man who proved to be Uncle Tom Bowen. The next morning we were off early; I was seated on the top of dry goods boxes clinging to the ropes that fastened them to the wagon box to keep myself from being precipitated into the sloughy marshes under the wagon wheels. At the end of nine miles we struck hard ground; the horses were covered with mud and water and they panted severely. We were all of us glad to get off the wagon on to the ground and rest up. The journey the rest of the way was delightful. The prairie schooners attracted my attention very much. They were large wagons covered with white canvas, filled with pork, bacon, white beans, and lead from the mines, drawn by oxen, from three to five yoke being hitched to a wagon.

Finally, on the 19th of May, we landed at my uncle's. We shoved the boxes on to the ground and Uncle Tom 'scud' for home. The next Sunday we started on foot for Uncle Tom's (myself and uncle). The first thing that attracted my attention was a carding machine on Richland creek, where subsequently I played Paddy with a wheelbarrow fixing the dam. This carding mill was owned and run by Mr. Rossman and was in sight of Oneco village. Just across from the carding mill and somewhat up stream, lived Grandpa Winchell and family and his son-in-law George West, who was an own brother to my aunt, Armida Estee, with whom I had come up the lakes. As Winchell and West had been here some time they had quite a start for new beginners. On passing up the valley to John K. Brewster's house, we met a tame deer with a large red band about his neck. As this was the first deer I had ever seen I was very much interested. On arriving at Brewster's I found as nice a man and woman as ever broke bread—no wonder they were universally popular. Bisil Belknap and wife and family lived in a house quite convenient to the same spring of water. Mr. Belknap afterwards helped me put up a log house just into Dane county. Here I was introduced to Author Smith, who was afterward murdered for his money, just below Monticello in the township of Mount Pleasant. The next house was Uncle Tom Bowen's. I found Aunt Eliza Bower and family living right up to the handle and in a splendid condition.

The year before Uncle Tom, his two oldest girls, Ann and Avis and Author Smith had raised on the farm 4,000 bushels of grain.

Think of this ye boys and girls of today. On going out back I beheld a little village of corn cribs filled to their very summits with corn. At this time corn was but ten cents a bushel. Uncle Tom declared very emphatically that he would not take less than twenty-five cents a bushel for that corn and he would be d—d if he would take any more. I think the ensuing winter was called the "hard winter," and people came from far and near to him for corn, hence his place was called "Egypt." When asked why he did not take a dollar a bushel for his corn, he replied he had given his word and sealed it with an oath, that twenty-five cents was all he would take and that he would not peril his soul's salvation by taking more. I could tell a good many anecdotes of Uncle Tom, but one more must suffice. One day he had snapped his rifle three times at a deer before it run; Tom came to the house in high dudgeon. Sitting down before his fire-place he commenced warming the lock (it was a pill lock) and snapping it. After a while he sat down in a chair, laying the gun across his lap with the muzzle pointed across the room, and commenced snapping as before. His oldest girl, Ann, was opposite at a chest of clothes. She had pulled out a pillow case, and, just as she let the lid fall back to its place, the gun went off, the ball passing through both legs just above the knees, striking the chest lid in its descent, plunged into one corner of the chest and made a little mouse nest in its gyrations among the fragments. In an instant Uncle Tom sprang, caught her in his arms, laid her on the bed, straddled a horse and shot like an arrow for the doctor. Dr. Bankston after a thorough examination of the wounds exclaimed, "Bowen you could not do that again if you should shoot a thousand times. The ball has not touched a bone nor a cord nor an artery. If the girl had been standing up straight and firm the ball would have made serious work." As it was the wounds healed rapidly.

Sometime in June, 1842, my uncle, Capt. Estee, Author Smith and myself, went "claim hunting," as it was called, up into Dane county. We stopped for dinner at Uncle John Porter's, who lived on the Camp and Collins' place. His daughter, Almida, did the honors of the occasion. After dinner we went into the village. It must be remembered that Old Exeter was a mining town and was filled with bachelors, old and young. They were discussing fast and furious (whisky was cheap in those days), which was the prettiest girl anywhere around. The balance was trembling between Old Durgin's girl and Miss Porter. We three cast our votes for Miss Porter—we would not go back on the girl that got us a good dinner. Miss Porter subsequently married John Ferguson and raised a large family of nice children, and she is so well preserved in form and features that it would be a sin to call her an old woman.

On our way back to Oneco, we crossed Little Sugar river where Gillette's cheese factory now stands, and bearing southwest, crossing over high ridges. About noon we came to a man shingling a log house, on the top of a ridge. It proved to be Uncle Sylvester Hills. He said he could not let us have dinner, as his family had not moved up yet. He directed us to keep on the top of the ridge until we got to a certain point, when we should turn to the left, go down into a valley, where a young married couple by the name of Bragg lived. He was very particular to tell us that the maiden name was Noble, and a noble woman she proved to be, and she got dinner for us in forty minutes, baking biscuit, boiling potatoes and making tea. We ate with thankful hearts, paid our hostess in silver, returned many thanks and went our way. On the inside of three years ago, I rode to her house with Mr. Whitcomb, the music teacher. After awhile we sat down to dinner. It was a long extension table well supplied with the solid comforts of life, but above all it was surrounded with rosy cheeked girls and boys, to be a stay, a staff and support to them in their declining years. It so happened that I sat opposite Mrs. Bragg at the table. I says to her, "you have forgotten me." She did not recognize me even then. I recalled the facts to her. She laughed heartily and said the reason why she got dinner so quick, was that she was all alone and that she was as afraid as death of us, and got rid of us as soon as possible. She wanted to know what had become of the other two men. I told her that Smith was murdered, for his money, in less than two years, and that Capt. Estee, of company H, of the Eagle regiment (the 8th), was severely wounded at the assault on Vicksburg, May 22, 1863, and died September following, and I alone was left to tell her.

Coming back to Uncle Hills: He lived to a good old age and was gathered to his fathers. He raised a large family of nice children, having been married twice. One of his boys, a tow-headed youngster, went to school to me when I taught in the early forties in the Amos Sylvester district. Since then this boy has come to man's estate, has married the Hon. R. E. Davis' sister, and both, that is the sister and young Sylvester, are keeping the Nichols House in Albany, Green county, where you can be done up brown for $2 a day. We reached Oneco in due time. Shortly after this, Smith got Mr. Belknap's horse, mounted into the saddle, went to old Mr. Shook's, on Green's Prairie, and finally drifted into Dane county, and made three claims, one for each of us. We loaded up two ox teams and started back immediately. We hired a yoke of cattle of Capt. Leonard Ross and went to breaking on sections 29 and 30, town of Montrose. By the next summer, Estee and Smith had altered their notions. My uncle settled south of Belleville, in Green county, and Smith went on to section 17, the township of Mount Pleasant.

Author Smith and I were together the most of the time until he moved below Monticello. We cut hay on Sugar river flats twenty days and laid on the soft side of a puncheon floor and ate boiled redhorse fish instead of meat. We bunched our hay with wooden forks and took a yoke of cattle and a wooden sled to haul the hay off with. One day while engaged at this work old John Armstrong shrieked to us. We run up on a high bank and he showed us a very large white wolf. It was a monster in size, so much so that we thought it was an Indian pony. I have seen him once since. About three years ago Frank Smith and myself saw a white wolf on nearly the same ground—a very large one.

The last of September my father and mother and two brothers came on from the town of Salem, Washington Co., N. Y. My father had not been with Smith more than ten minutes before he found out that his father had been my father's old school teacher in Vermont. As you may suppose our entire family became very much attached to him. Smith boarded with us until he went below Monticello, and made another claim, and just before he was killed he was up to our house for seed potatoes and other things. He was the living embodiment of good health and robustness. He was above the medium height, well-built and heavy limbed, with black hair and eyes and rosy cheeks. He was very retiring and quiet in manner, but warmed up to intimate friends, and even after the lapse of forty years we feel wonderfully stirred when we think of him.

The other day (Monday, April 28, 1884,) while standing on the ground where he was foully murdered* my breast was torn with conflicting emotions, the warm mist came to my eyes, and I would have restored him to life if possible. But I must hasten to the awful catastrophe which ended his life. Smith had a log cabin built on the north side of his claim, near the river bank. We let him have a spotted dog, the sole companion of his lonely hours, and if that dog could have talked, the murderer could have been found out. After Smith had made a certain amount of improvements, he took a notion to sell out his claim. Accordingly, some time the last of May, 1844, he sold out to Abram Pratt for $200, in English sovereigns. These sovereigns were put down flatwise in a buckskin pouch until it was filled. This pouch was secreted in a pattern for pants, put into his trunk with other things and locked up, the said trunk being in his log house, this dog being the only one to watch it in Smith's absence. Right here I will say that the public don't know as yet who murdered him, but we sincerely hope that the real murderer can't die until he confesses. A great many men have been suspicioned.

After Smith was killed (I have consulted quite a number just recently) he lay about two weeks. After awhile old Squire Pierce's boys came across Smith's cattle in the yoke. Those boys were honest enough to kick up a dust about it. The whole country was alarmed and turned out en masse. One of the Pierce boys mounted a horse, alarmed Monroe and went down to Uncle Tom Bowen's. A crowd turned out, George West among others. Some went to dragging the Sugar river, others went hunting in the woods. When Joe Payne and his crowd came from Monroe they went to Smith's break-plow and after diligent search Smith's remains were found down a steep bank in wet ground and in tall grass. Then when his skull was found the horrible truth dawned on them that Smith had been murdered instead of being lost. The story was that he was lost. No one suspicioned that a peaceable, inoffensive man like Smith would be murdered, but when the crowd went to Smith's cabin and found the trunk broken open and the $200 in gold, gone, the whole truth flashed on them.

A coroner's jury was impaneled to hold an inquest on the remains. Justice of the Peace, Major Downing, chose the following jurors:

Robert Whitter, John Ferguson, Gabe Long, Lewis Nixon, old Mr. Foster and Leonard Ross. These two last names we are not so certain about. I will now state that Robert Whitter and Gabe Long tied handkerchiefs over their mouths and with the aid of long sticks rolled Smith's remains on a sheet and the whole was put into a box for interment. The skull was taken over to the tavern and also the ax. The jury after a short session at the house of Stedman adjourned over to the tavern, kept by Robert Whitter, in the village of Exeter. I was at this examination myself; it was at night. By this time suspicion had pretty well settled on William Boyls. His own testimony under oath confirmed the belief. He was tried down at Monroe, but nothing could be made out and he was set free. Soon after this he left the country. Rumor has it that death bed confessions have been made in Missouri and California, but as to that we don't know. The remains of Smith were interred near to where he was killed and about three years ago he was taken up and re-interred in the cemetery at Monticello.

CHAPTER IX.

FIRST THINGS.

The first school, with which Green county was favored, was taught by Ralph Hildebrand. This was a subscription school. Andrew Clarno, William Bowen, Bennett Nowlin and William Boyls, thinking it unwise not to provide for the education of their children, engaged Mr. Hildebrand to teach them, and thus was formed a neighborhood school. Having at that time no school house, a small log building, set on a hillside, on section 36, in what is now the town of Cadiz, the lower part designed for a root cellar and the upper part for a smoke-house, to which uses it had already been devoted, was taken, and the upper part converted into a school room. This was in the winter of 1836. The first school house in the county was built in the vicinity of Mr. Clarno's in the year 1837, on section 30. The second was built at New Mexico, in 1838. They were of logs and very rude structures.

The first preachers were Methodists. Daniel Harcourt and A. C. Delap came in 1836 and preached in the different settlements, using the cabins or the groves as meeting houses. Soon after came a Campbellite preacher by the name of William Blunt, who afterward went to Texas with the view of advocating his pro-slavery sentiments. He was received there as a hypocrite and driven out. He returned to Green county somewhat changed in sentiment, and full of revengeful wrath. After this experience, he is said to have entertained some doubts as to slavery being a divine institution. He afterward entered the Union army in the late war. He only got in by deception. In 1847, Rev. J. D. Stevens, a Congregationalist, settled at Monroe, and preached regularly at the school house. The first church in the county was built by the Methodists, in 1847, at Monroe.

The first marriage celebrated in Green county, took place at the Clarno settlement, in 1834, between Josiah Blackmore and Nancy Wallace. Blackmore afterward moved to Warren, Ill. The second marriage was between James Hawthorn and Massey Boyls, in August, 1836, near Monroe.

The first frame house in the county was built in 1836, by Joseph Payne, a Mr. Billinger and O. C. Smith, at an expense of $1,500. The lumber for this building was brought from the Allegheny, down the Ohio, and up the Mississippi to Galena, and from there hauled on wagons to New Mexico, where the house was erected. This house was used as a store.

The first grand jury held their session in a log blacksmith shop, known as "Buckskin" Brown's shop.

The first white child born in Green county, was Louisa Wallace—afterwards Mrs. Charles Thomas. But this must be considered constructively; as the child drew its first breath in Galena, Ill., Aug. 7, 1830, its parents having their home, at that date, in Exeter, Green county. The first white child actually born in Green county, was a daughter of Nicholas Hale and Eliza Hale, in the year 1834, at the house of Andrew Clarno. The next child born was Charles R. Deniston, son of John W. Deniston and Maria Deniston, in 1835.

The first election in Green county for county officers was on the 5th of March, 1838, at the house of Jacob Ly Brand, in what was then called New Mexico, now a part of the city of Monroe. Two hundred and thirty-one votes were cast. Only county commissioners were selected. These were Daniel S. Sutherland, William Bowen and Daniel Harcourt.

The first annual election was held in August, 1838, when one commissioner of the county, one treasurer, one register, one coroner, one assessor, and one collector were elected; but no one received a certificate, as the election was held on the wrong day. Another, and this time a legal election, was held Sept. 10, 1838.

The first county fair was held in November, 1853, at the court house in Monroe—$100 being paid in premiums.

The first regular physician who practiced in Green county was Dr. Bankston, who lived just south of the State line in Illinois. The second was Dr. Peter Springstead who came soon after Dr. Bankston.

John A. Bingham settled at Monroe in the year 1842, and was the first lawyer in the county. John W. Stewart was the second.

The first hotel in the county was built in 1837, by Payne, Billinger & Smith, at New Mexico. The building was two stories high, the main part 26x36 feet on the ground, with a wing 16x18 feet. This was a great step in advance; and for a long time, the inhabitants looked with pride at the building as a grand affair.

The first court of record held in Green county was the United States district court, in the month of April, 1838. It was presided over by Chief Justice Charles Dunn; George McFadden (late of Dane county), clerk, who was succeeded by M. Bainbridge. After the second term of this court, David Irvin succeeded Judge Dunn, and continued to preside until the organization of the circuit court under the constitution and laws of the State of Wisconsin in 1848.

The first election for members of Congress, and State officers, in which the people of Green county participated, was held on the second Monday of May, 1848. By the State constitution the county of Green was assigned along with Milwaukee, Waukesha, Jefferson, Racine, Walworth and Rock, to the first congressional district, to elect one member. At this first election William Pitt Lynde was the successful candidate to represent the district in the 30th Congress. The county was by the same fundamental law made a part of the 8th senatorial district of Wisconsin. E. T. Gardner, of Monroe, was the choice of this district for senator. Green county at first constituted but one assembly district. Henry Adams, of Monticello, was the first to represent the county in the assembly of the State.

The first term of the circuit court held in Green county commenced its session on the 4th day of September, 1848, and was presided over by Judge E. V. Whiton.

The first election in Green county after Wisconsin became a State, and under town organization, was held Sept. 3, 1849, for the election of a county judge. John A. Bingham received 448 votes out of the 702 polled, and was elected.

Time first homicide of a white man was the killing of Boner by McNutt, in what is now the town of Exeter in 1828.

The first person tried by a jury was Daniel Harcourt. He was charged with removing and destroying the boundaries of a lot of land. Verdict: "Not guilty."

In October, 1839, Frederick Bedtner made the first declaration of intention to become a citizen.

John Thorp, the first naturalized citizen of Green county, took the oath on the 14th day of April, 1841.

The first court in Green county was held at the house of Jacob Ly Brand.

The first county seat was located about two and a half miles northeast of what is now the city of Monroe, and was named "Roscoe."

The first public improvement contemplated in any part of Green county was the making of a canal or slack-water navigation from Mineral Point to the Illinois State line in the Pekatonica, by the "Pekatonica Navigation Company." This company was incorporated, in 1839. It is needless to say that slack-water navigation of the Pekatonica was never accomplished.

The first grave to receive a white settler was one dug by the pioneers, in what is now the town of Exeter, in 1828, to receive the mortal remains of Boner, who was killed by D. McNutt, at what was afterward called "Sugar River Diggings."

The first deed known to have been executed for land within the present limits of Green county, was the following, which conveyed title to "the west half of the northwest quarter of section 30, in township 4 north, of range 9 east" (in the present town of Brooklyn), containing seventy-six and eighty-one hundredths acres:

"This indenture made the fourteenth day of March, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, between Thomas A. Holmes and Ursula, his wife, of Milwaukee, of the first part and Abraham Bolser of the same place, of the second part, witnesseth:

That the said parties of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars to them in hand paid by the said party of the second part, the receipt whereof is hereby conferred and acknowledged, have granted, bargained, sold, remised, released, aliened and confirmed, and by these presents do grant, bargain, sell, remise, release, alien and confirm, unto the said party of the second part, and to his heirs and assigns forever, the one equal and undivided half of all that certain tract of land known and described on the receiver's certificate of the land office of Green Bay, to-wit: The southeast quarter of section No. 3 and lot No. 2 of section No. 27, in township No. 4 north, of range No. 11 east, containing 198.68 acres; also the west half of the northwest quarter of section No. 30, in township No. 4 north, of range No. 9 east, containing 76.80 acres.

"Together with all and singular hereditaments and appurtenances thereunto belonging, or in anywise appertaining; and the reversion and reversions, remainder and remainders, rents, issues and profits thereof; and all the estate, right, title, interest, claim or demand, whatsoever, of the said parties of the first part either in law or equity, of, in, and to, the above bargained premises, with the same hereditaments and appurtenances: To have and to hold the said premises as above described with the appurtenances, unto the said party of the second part, and to his heirs and assigns forever. And the said parties of the first part, for themselves, their heirs, executors and administrators, do covenant, grant, bargain and agree to and with the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, that at the time of the ensealing and delivering of these presents, they were well seized of the premises above conveyed as of a good, sure, perfect, absolute and indefeasible estate of inheritance in the law, in fee simple, and that the above bargained premises, in the quiet and peaceable possession of the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, against all and every person or persons, lawfully claiming or to claim the whole or any part thereof, they will forever warrant and defend. "in witness whereof the said parties of the first part have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

The first mortgage executed by a citizen of Green county was the following:

"This indenture made this twelfth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine, between Joseph W. Smith, of the county of Green, and Territory of Wisconsin, of the one part, and Jacob Ly Brand, of the county

FIRST ENTRIES OF LAND.

Lots No. 3 and 4 in section 23, in township 2 north, of range 9 east, containing 71.86 acres, were entered by Jesse Armstrong, Aug. 17, 1835; and Lots No. 1 and 2, and northwest fractional quarter of same section, township and range, containing 230.39 acres, by Isaac Bronson, Aug. 21, 1835; also by the person last named, the northwest quarter of section 24, in the same township and range, on the 21st of August, 1835.

The east half of the northwest quarter of section 30, in township 4 north, of range 9 east, was entered by Burley Follett, Dec. 14, 1835; and the west half of the same quarter by Thomas A. Holmes, March 7, 1836.

Township 1 north, of range 9 east, east half of section 9, May 9, 1836, by French Lake; also by the same, on the same day, the northwest quarter, the west half of the southwest quarter and west half of northeast quarter section 8, in same township and range. The next day he entered the east half of the northeast quarter and the northwest quarter of the northeast quarter of section 18, in same township and range.

The east half of the southeast quarter and the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 30, in same township and range, was entered by Darius Daniels, May 9, 1836. There were many other tracts entered in what is now Green county, afterward during the year 1836.

MISCELLANEOUS "FIRST THINGS."

The first settlement in the county was in 1827, at "Sugar River Diggings," in what is now the town of Exeter.

The first people known to have mined for lead within what are now the limits of Green county were the Sac Indians.

The first flouring mill erected in Green county was built by John W. Deniston and Abner Van Sant.

The first bounty offered by the county board for wolf scalps was in January, 1840. The sum specified was $3 for each scalp.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

The first court house in Green county was “a two-story frame house, 20x30 feet,” and was built in “the town of Monroe,” by James Campbell and J. Sutherland, in 1840. It was completed and accepted by the county board November 4, of that year. It soon was destroyed by fire.

The first jail in the county was authorized to be erected by the county board in May, 1842.

The first meeting of the county board of Green county was on the 26th of March, 1838.

The first business entered upon by the county board was the appointment of Hiram Rust as “clerk for the commissioners” court.”

The first account allowed by the commissioners of the county as a valid claim and ordered paid by them was one to Jacob Ly Brand, amounting to $4.25.

The first election precinct formed included the whole county of Green—March 26, 1838.

The first person who acted as district attorney for Green county was James Churchman.

The first tavern license was issued under an order of the county board to Joseph Payne, and paid by him Jan. 7, 1839.

The first road supervisor in Green county was Bennett Nowlin. He was appointed by the county board Oct. 2, 1838. He refused to serve, and Andrew Clarno was appointed in his place.

The first county seat was located “on the east half of the northeast quarter of section twenty-five (25), in town[ship] 2 north, of range 7 east, at a point designated by a stake,” in the present town of Monroe.

The first-school district “set off” in Green county was in 1840, and was called ‘Roscoe.’”

The first grand jury was composed of the following named persons: Elijah Austin, Amos Harris, Mordecai Kelly, Joseph Woodle, Jarvis Rattan, Hiram Rust, Thomas Bowen, William Blunt, Peter Wells, John Blunt, Mathew Wells, Joseph Kelly, Jacob Andrides, Hanson Irion, Julius Austin and Augustus Chilton—Hiram Rust was appointed foreman.

The following was the first civil suit begun in Green county;

Volney R. Kimball and William Christmas, merchants and partners trading and doing business under the name and style of V. R. Kimball, Vs. Robert L. Bean.	}	Amicable Action of Assumpsit
--	---	------------------------------

The first person admitted to the bar of Green county as an attorney was James Churchman. The date of his admission was April 2, 1838.

The first clerk of the “district court of the United States” in Green county was George McFadden, who was appointed pro-tem. He only served one day.

The first indictment by the grand jury—a “true bill”—was against Elizabeth Gage. The case was docketed as follows:

The United States vs. Elizabeth Gage.	}	Adultery.
---	---	-----------

T. S. Wilson was the first person who served in Green county as attorney for the Territory of Wisconsin. He was appointed by the court on the first day of the term (April 2, 1838). His was a pro-tem appointment.

The first court crier in Green county was John W. Deniston. He served during the first (April) term, 1838.

The first deputy sheriffs of Green county were Alfred G. Houghton and Charles Boyls.

The first person admitted to bail on a criminal charge in Green county was Elizabeth Gage, charged with adultery. Her bail was fixed at $100.

The first company enlisted in Green county during the late War for the Union was company C, of the 3d Wisconsin regiment.

The first railroad in Green county was known as “the Southern Wisconsin Branch of the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad.”

The first recorded village plat was that of “New Mexico,” within what is now the city of Monroe.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

The first meeting house commenced in the county was begun by the Methodists, on the land given them for that purpose in the then village of Monroe, in 1847. It was finished in 1848.

The first bridge built in the county was one erected in 1842, a little northeast of the site of what was afterward the village of Decatur, at the place where the river was crossed by the Indian trail from Sand Prairie to the northern part of the county, and by the Territorial road from Janesville to Galena.

In August, 1852, H. C. Burchard, now superintendent of the United States mint, held at the seminary, in Monroe, the first Teacher's Institute, in Green county. It continued several weeks.

The first bank in the county was opened in Monroe, in May, 1854, by J. A. Bingham and A. Ludlow.

Abner Van Sant and his son-in-law, John W. Deniston, built the first mill in the county. It began as a feed-mill but grew, finally, into a flour mill. It was located on Honey creek.

A Methodist camp meeting, the first in the county, was held in the present town of Jefferson, in the summer of 1841.

The first debating society organized in the county was in what is now the town of Sylvester, in the winter of 1839—40.

The first out-spoken abolitionists in the county were Jacob Ly Brand and J. W. Rogers, of Monroe, and Hollis W. Button, of Jefferson.

At the residence of Matthew Wells, Daniel Harcourt, in August, 1885, preached the first sermon ever listened to in Green county.

The first religious society organized in the county was one by a Methodist minister—Rev. James McKane, who lived in the State of Illinois, and was connected with the Rock River Conference. The society thus organized was composed of the following members: Matthew Wells, his wife and daughter, Mrs. Maria Blunt and William Baird.

The first coffin made in the county was for Mr. Patterson. The lumber of which it was constructed was brought from Galena by Mr. Hawthorn to make a cabin door.

The first Norwegian who settled in Green county was Lars Larson. He located in the present town of Jordan.

The first laid out Territorial road in Green county was one from Janes' Ferry (Janesville) in Rock county, through Rockport, on Rock river, to "Centreville" and New Mexico, in Green county, thence to White Oak springs and so on westward to the Mississippi. It was "blazed" in the woods and "staked" in the prairies in the spring of 1837, but nothing further done.

The first public school taught in the county was by Daniel R. Howe, in the town of Clarno, the term commencing Dec. 1, 1839. Mr. Howe is now (1884) pastor of the Christian Church in Monroe.

CHAPTER X.

GREEN COUNTY FORMED AND ORGANIZED.—LOCATING THE COUNTY SEAT.

The first civilized claimants to the country now included within the boundaries of Wisconsin were the French, as already explained in this history. The whole of the northwest was claimed by France from 1671 to 1763, when it was by treaty surrendered to the British. By the "Quebec Act" of 1774, all of this region was placed under the local administration of Canada. It was, however, practically put under a despotic military rule, and so continued until possession passed to the United States. Before the last mentioned event, and during and after the Revolution, the conflicting claims of Virginia, New York, Massachusetts and Connecticut to portions of the country were relinquished to the general government. All these claims were based upon supposed chartered rights,—Virginia adding to hers the right of conquest, as she contended, of the "Illinois country" during the Revolution.

As early as October, 1778, Virginia declared, by an act of her General Assembly, that all the citizens of that commonwealth who were then settled, or should thereafter settle, on the western side of the Ohio, should be included in a distinct country, which should be called "Illinois." No Virginians were then settled as far north as the southern boundary line of what is now Wisconsin; and, as none thereafter located so far north before Virginia relinquished to the United States all her rights to territory on the western and northern side of the Ohio, it follows that no part of the country which subsequently became Wisconsin Territory (now the State of Wisconsin) was ever included in "Illinois county", as a part of Virginia; nor did the last mentioned State ever exercise any jurisdiction over any portion of what is now Wisconsin either civil or military, or make claim to it by right of conquest. It would be as improper, therefore, to say that what is now Green county was once a part of Virginia as to say that it was once a portion of New York, Massachusetts, or Connecticut. All laid claim to this region, but none ever exercised jurisdiction over it.

Notwithstanding the passage of the ordinance of 1787, establishing a government over the country northwest of the Ohio river, which region was acquired by the treaty of 1783 from Great Britain, possession only was obtained by the United States of the southern portion,—the northern (and the larger) portion being held by the British government until 1796. Arthur St. Clair, in February, 1790, exercising the functions of governor, and having previously organized a government for the country under the ordinance just mentioned, established in what is now the State of Illinois, but then known as a part of the Northwest Territory, a county which was named "St. Clair." But, as this county only extended north "to the mouth of the Little Mackinaw creek, on the Illinois," it did not include, of course, any part of the present State of Wisconsin, although being the nearest approach thereto of any organized county up to that date. In 1796, Wayne county was organized, which was made to include, beside much other territory, all of what is now the State of Wisconsin watered by streams flowing into Lake Michigan. But no part of the area now constituting Green county came within its jurisdiction.

This immediate region, therefore, although a part of the Northwest Territory, had not been erected into, nor did it form a part of any county.

From 1800 to 1809, what are now the limits of Wisconsin were within the Territory of Indiana, and, in the last year mentioned, passed into the Territory of Illinois. Previous to this time, the county of St. Clair had been extended north, including, beside much other territory, that which now constitutes Green county, but there was not a white settler within the present area of the last mentioned county for about a quarter of a century thereafter; meanwhile, two other Illinois counties took in this immediate region. They were, first, the county of Madison, erected Sept. 14, 1812; second, the county of Bond, organized Jan. 4, 1817. However, in 1818, what is now Wisconsin became a portion of Michigan Territory and now counties were formed—the present county of Green becoming a part of a new county erected out of a portion of that Territory.

By a proclamation of Lewis Cass, governor of Michigan Territory, dated Oct. 26, 1818, the counties of Brown and Crawford were formed. Brown county originally comprised all of what is now Wisconsin east of a line passing north and south through the middle of the portage between the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, except a small portion of the peninsula lying east of Green bay, which was included in the county of Michilimackinac. The limits of the county extended north into the territory of the present State of Michigan so far that its north line ran due west from the head of Noquet bay.

An east-and-west line, passing near the northern limits of the present county of Barron, separated the county of Crawford from the county of Michilimackinac on the north; on the east, it was bounded by the county of Brown; or on the south, by the State of Illinois; and or west, by the Mississippi river.

By referring to any map of Wisconsin, the reader will readily see that what is now the county of Green fell into Crawford county, except a strip about three miles off its east side, which formed a part of Brown county. This strip included, of course, the east half of the present towns of Brooklyn, Albany, Decatur and Spring Grove, and the whole of what is now the incorporated village of Brodhead.

By an act of the legislative council of the Territory of Michigan, approved Oct. 29, 1829, to take effect the first day of the year following, the county of Iowa was established, embracing all the present State of Wisconsin south of the Wisconsin river and west of Brown county; in other words, it included the whole of what was previously Crawford county lying south of the Wisconsin river; so that now, all of the area now constituting Green county, except a strip about three miles in width off its east side, constituted a part of Iowa county.

On the 6th of September, 1834, the eastern boundary of Iowa county was fixed upon the line between the Green Bay and Wisconsin land districts. This line, as shown in another chapter of this history, was the one between ranges 8 and 9 east. By the same act, all that district of country before that time in Brown county lying south of a line drawn east and west at a distance of sixty-six miles north of the Illinois State line, was erected into a new county called "Milwaukie" (now written "Milwaukee"). The territory now constituting Green county fell, by the passage of this act, into the counties of Iowa and Milwaukie; that it is to say, the tier of surveyed townships now constituting the towns of Brooklyn, Albany, Decatur and Spring Grove, and the incorporated villages of Albany and Brodhead, were in the last mentioned county; while the territory now constituting the city of Monroe and the other towns, remained a part of Iowa county. This division continued until after the formation and organization of Wisconsin Territory.

FORMATION OF GREEN COUNTY.

Green county was formed and named by the following act of the legislature of Wisconsin Territory

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

An act to divide the county of Iowa.

“SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of Wisconsin. That all that part of the county of Iowa, lying west of the fourth principal meridian, be and the same is hereby constituted a separate county, to be called Grant.

“SECTION 2. Townships 1, 2, 3 and 4 north, of ranges 6, 7, 8 and 9 east, of the fourth principal meridian,* shall be and the same are hereby constituted a separate county, to be called Green, and the seat of justice is hereby established at the town of New Mexico, in said county.

[Section 3 establishes the limits of Iowa county, and locates the county-seat. Section 4 fixes the time for the organization of Grant county. Section 5 appoints commissioners to locate the county-seat of Grant county, permanently, and establishes it, temporarily at a point named. Section 6 provides for holding the district court in the county last mentioned.]

“SECTION 7. That all suits, prosecutions and other matters which are now, or shall on or before the 4th day of March, next, be commenced or pending in the district courts of the United States, for the counties of Brown, Iowa, Crawford and Milwaukee, or in the county court for either of the said counties, or in the Supreme court of the Territory of Wisconsin, or in the District courts in any of said counties, or in any judicial district in said Territory, or before any justice of the peace in any of said counties, shall be prosecuted to final judgment and execution before the same courts and in the same county, as they would have been if this act had not been passed; and the same proceedings shall be had in all such suits, prosecutions and other matters as would have been had if this act had not been passed.

*For a diagram of the county, showing in outline, the various townships, which by this act were erected into the county of Green, see Chapter VI—United States Land Surveys.—ED.

[SECTION 8 provides for payment of the commissioners, to locate the county-seat of Grant county.]

“SECTION 9. That this act shall be in force from and after the 4th day of March next.

“P. H. ENGLE,

“Speaker of the House of Representatives.

HENRY S. BAIRD,

“President of the Council.

“Approved, Dec. 8, 1836.

“H. DODGE.”

The territory set apart by this act, as Green county, was again defined to be the proper area by the Revised Statutes of 1849 (Chap. 2, Sec.12), as follows:

“The district of country included within the following boundaries shall form and constitute the county of Green, to-wit:

“Beginning at the southeast corner of township 1 north, of range 9 east of the meridian aforesaid [fourth principal meridian], in the boundary line of this State; running thence north, on the range line between ranges 9 and 10 east, to the northeast corner of township 4 north, of range 9 east; thence west, on the township line, to the northwest corner of township 4 north, of range 6 east; thence south on the range line, to the southwest corner of township 1 north, of range 6 east; thence east on the boundary line aforesaid, to the place of beginning. [Same in Revised Statutes of 1859 and 1878].”

By the peculiar wording of this act (Section 7), it will be seen that after the 4th day of March, 1837, there was no provision for the commencing, by the inhabitants of Green county, of suits in any courts of the Territory of Wisconsin. An amendment proposed to the act just recited, attaching this county to that of Iowa, for judicial purposes was postponed. After the date last mentioned, Green county was not only without any government or legal organization, but also outside the jurisdiction of any court in the Territory. It so continued until the county was organized.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

At the time of the passage of the "act to divide the county of Iowa," one of the representatives of that county in the Territorial legislature, was William Boyls. He was a resident of what is now the town of Cadiz. Concerning the origin of the name given to this county, Miss Bingham, in her history, says:

"About the same time that Wisconsin was separated from Michigan, Iowa county constituted, with her portion of the future little Green, one election precinct. Henry Dodge, the first governor of the new Territory, apportioned to each county its number of councilors and representatives, and the number allotted to Iowa county entitled her eastern election precinct to one representative. The election was held where Monroe has since grown up, at the blacksmith shop of a Mr. Brown (familarly known, from the material of his clothes, as Buckskin Brown), and resulted in the election of William Boyls, of Cadiz. Other things than political affiliations determined a candidate's success in those days. There were very few young women in the country, and it is said that every single man in the precinct favored the election of Mr. Boyls, because he had eight unmarried daughters. At the first session of the first Wisconsin legislature, which convened at Belmont, Iowa County, in the fall of 1836, Mr. Boyls presented a petition (which had been drawn up and circulated by Daniel S. Sutherland), asking for the organization of a county which should have the limits of the present county of Green, and be called Richland. The petition was granted, so far as setting off a new county was concerned, but some one objected to the name because it was "too matter-of-fact," and Mr. Boyls was invited to select another. According to one account he selected Green, as indicative of the bright color of the vegetation, and refused to change it to Greene, in honor of Gen. Greene. Another account says he selected Greene, and when the act of the legislature was printed, the final e was omitted by mistake. Be this as it may, for some years the name was usually written Greene"

Iowa county, notwithstanding the act creating the county of Green, claimed jurisdiction over the latter,—going so far as to appoint two of the residents within the limits of the last mentioned county, as justices of the peace—Daniel S. Sutherland and William Bowen. They were directed to cause an election to be held at the same time with that in other parts of Iowa county—for county officers; but the people were not desirous of recognizing the authority longer of the mother county; so the people, although a number assembled on the day designated, refused to vote. Very naturally this state of things could not long continue. The residents of Green made haste to have their county organized, which was effected by the passage of

AN ACT TO ORGANIZE THE COUNTY OF GREEN.

"SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Council and House of Representatives of Wisconsin Territory, That from and after the passage of this act, the county of Green shall, to all interests and purposes, be and remain an organized county, and be invested with full power to do and transact all county business, which any regularity organized county may of right do; and that for the purpose of electing the first county officers, the polls of election shall be opened at the house of Jacob Ly Brand, in the town of New Mexico, and thereafter at such times and places as are or may be prescribed by law.

"Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, that the inhabitants of the county of Green aforesaid, are hereby required to pay to the county of Iowa, according to the number of inhabitants, their equal proportions of the debts remaining unpaid by the county of Iowa.

Sec. 3. That the county treasurer of the county of Green shall audit and pay over to the sheriff of the county of Iowa, such sum as may become due to the county of Iowa, under the provisions of this act, out of the first monies that may come into the treasury of the said county of Green; and the said sheriff is hereby required to pay the same into the treasury of the county of Iowa for the use of said county.

“Sec. 4. That the county of Green shall be attached to the first judicial district. There shall be two terms of the district court, held annually at the seat of justice in said county of Green. The said district court for the said county of Green, shall have and enjoy all the power, right and duties, which courts in the other counties of this Territory have and enjoy, and shall be subject to all the restrictions imposed upon said courts by the act entitled “an act for establishing judicial districts and for other purposes,” passed at the first session of the legislative assembly; and that the courts hereby authorized to be held in the county of Green, shall be held at the town of New Mexico, until otherwise ordered by law.

It will be noticed that the first election for county officers under the organic act was to be held in the town of New Mexico. By this it is to be understood a village of that name; as there was no town organizations at that date. The election was held “in the town of New. Mexico” on the fifth day of March, 1838, according to law, resulting in the selection of the following persons as county commissioners, no other county officers being voted for:

Daniel S. Sutherland,	66votes;	elected.
William Bowen,	72 votes;	elected.
Daniel Harcourt,	53 votes;	elected.
Jeremiah Bridge,	35 votes.
William Woodle,	11 votes.

The three first named, having been declared elected, took the oath of office and became the first county officers of Green county.

These commissioners organized what they called a “Commissioner’s Court,” (equivalent to a county board of the present day, in its functions) on the 26th day of March, 1838. At the meeting of the electors, when these commissioners were chosen, there were polled 231 votes, indicating quite a population for Green county. Of course, there was but one voting place—the house of Jacob Ly Brand—and the voters, some of them, had pretty long distances to travel, to exercise the right of suffrage. But, by the election and swearing into office of the three county commissioners, the wheels of the county government were not all set in motion. It needed that other officers should be chosen, and these were to be elected at the coming annual election to beheld in August—as the good denizens of the county supposed; so, on the 6th day of that month, they again assembled to enjoy the inestimable privilege of the elective franchise—voting for the following officers, with results as indicated

But there were “breakers ahead.” By a special act of the Territorial legislature of June 23, 1838, the general election before held in August, was postponed to the second Monday (the 10th) of September, but all this time the citizens of Green county had remained in blissful ignorance of the fact. But now, luckily, it was discovered just in time to save the issuing of certificates to the gentlemen supposed to have been triumphantly elected in the previous August.

At the next exercise by the electors of the right of suffrage, they, besides certain county officers to vote for, also cast their ballots for a territorial delegate to Congress and for a member of the territorial council, and of the territorial house of representatives. Green county, at this time, formed a portion of a territorial district, comprising the counties of Green, Dane,

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

Dodge and Jefferson; all of which participated in the election of territorial officers. For delegates to Congress, Thomas P. Burnet had fifty-two votes, George W. Jones thirty-seven votes, and James D. Doty two votes. For the legislative council, Ebenezer Brigham received in Green county, ninety votes. He was voted for in the counties of Dane, Dodge and Jefferson, in addition to Green, and was elected to represent them in that body. For representative D. S. Sutherland received in Green county eighty-two, and L. E. Boomer two votes. Sutherland was the successful candidate in the four counties just named, representing them in the legislative assembly. The county officers elected on the same day were A. G. Houghton, assessor; J. McCracken, treasurer; William Rittenhouse, recorder. James Riley and Daniel Harcourt were selected as county commissioners, and A. Harris, coroner.

The "swearing in" of these county officers and the entering upon their respective duties, (a term of the district court of the United States having already been held in the county) set all the wheels of the county government in motion, and Green county was not only fully organized, but had proceeded to business.

However, before dismissing the subject of the organization of Green county, it must not be overlooked that there was a matter closely connected with it which has not been considered. We therefore now call the attention of the reader to

IOWA COUNTY VS. GREEN COUNTY.

It will be remembered that by the second section of the act organizing this county, the inhabitants were "required to pay to the county of Iowa, according to the number of inhabitants, their equal proportion of the debts remaining unpaid by the county of Iowa." Here was an excellent chance for lawyers. How to make them pay that "equal proportion" was the question and for that matter it is still the question. But Iowa county soon took steps to bring the matter before her neighbor—Green county; but the latter did not respond by paying up. The ball was opened by a formal call upon the county commissioners by an attorney with the exact amount figured up claimed to be due from Green to Iowa. Just here, let us copy from the county records:

December 17, 1840.

"The Board of County Commissioners of the county of Iowa, in the Territory of Wisconsin, by their attorney, Robert C. Howard, produced to this Board, a certified statement of debts against said Iowa county, up to March 4, 1837, in which said Iowa county demands of the said county of Green, her proportionable part thereof, under the act to organize the county of Green, approved Jan. 15, 1838, which amounts to $517 and fifty-three cents; and, after mature consideration, the adjustment of said claim is continued to the next January session of this Board."

January 7, 1841.

"Upon an examination of the claim of Iowa Co., Wis., against Green Co., Wis., as exhibited to this Board by Robert C. Hoard, Esquire, the Board here being sufficiently advised of and concerning the same, is of the opinion that it belongs to the treasurer of Green county to audit and pay over the same if any due, to the sheriff of Iowa county, and that the Board here has not jurisdiction of the matter; and, "Ordered, That the Clerk of this Board transmit a certified copy of this order together with the said account on file against Green county, to the Clerk of the Board of County Commissioners of Iowa county,"

But the Treasurer of Green county would not audit and pay the claim, and Iowa county resorted to the courts for satisfaction. "But," says Miss Bingham, "though the claim was urged as late as 1850, and though the lawsuits to which it gave rise cost the people of little Green as much as the amount claimed, yet they always insisted that, as they had derived no benefit from the expenditures for which they were charged, the claim was unjust and should not be paid; and it never-was paid.”

CIVIL DIVISIONS OF GREEN COUNTY.

Green county was divided, by the Board of County Commissioners, on the 10th and 11th of January, 1849, into the following towns:

- Cadiz, township 1 north, range 6 east.
- Clarno, township 1 north, range 7 east.
- Jefferson, township 1 north, range 8 east.
- Spring Grove, township 1 north, range 9 east.
- Decatur, township 2 north, range 9 east.
- Sylvester, township 2 north, range 8 east.
- Monroe, township 2 north, range 7 east.
- Jordan, township 2 north, range 6 east.
- Adams, township 3 north, range 6 east.
- Washington, township 3 north, range 7 east.
- Mount Pleasant, .. township 3 north, range 8 east.
- Albany, township 3 north, range 9 east.
- Brooklyn, township 4 north, range 9 east.
- Exeter, township 4 north, range 8 east.
- (New Glarus,) township 4 north, range 7 east;
- York, township 4 north, range 6 east.

The first change made after the erection of the county into the fifteen towns just named, was the setting off of the east half of the town of York into a new one to be called New Glarus. This was done by the board of supervisors of the county, Nov. 16, 1849. On the 20th of the same month, the north half of section 6, in township 3 north, of range 9 east, (town of Albany) was taken from the last mentioned town and attached to, and made a part of the town of Brooklyn. Afterward (and in the interest of temperance) two several parts of sections 2 and 3, in the town of Clarno (both of which are now in the city of Monroe) were detached and added to the town of Monroe. Finally by a law approved March 25, 1882, the city of Monroe was incorporated, forming a new civil division, entirely independent of the towns of Clarno and Monroe, including the following territory:

“The east half of the northeast quarter of section 34, and the southeast quarter of section 34, and the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 34, and so much of the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 34, as is included [in] Scott’s addition, and the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter and the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 34, all of section 35, in town 2 north, range 7 east, and fractional lots No. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 11 and 12, of section 2, in town 1, range 7 east, and fractional lots 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11, of section 3, town 1, range 7 east.”

The incorporated villages of Albany and Brodhead (the only ones in Green county at this date, 1884) are not wholly divorced from the towns in which they are located; but are governed by both town and village laws. They are civil divisions of the county only in a qualified sense; they have separate representation on the county board. The village of Albany is in the town of Albany, and the village of Brodhead is in the town of Decatur.

The civil divisions of Green county at the present time (1884) are included, therefore, in the surveyed territory described in the United states surveys as follows:

- Cadiz, township 1 north, range 6 east.
- Clarno and south part of city of Monroe, township 1 north, range 7 east.
- Jefferson, township 1 north, range 8 east.
- Spring Grove, township 1 north, range 9 east.
- Jordan, township 2 north, range 6 east.
- Town of Monroe and north part of the city of Monroe, township 2 north, range 7 east.
- Sylvester, township 2 north, range 8 east.
- Decatur and Brodhead village, township 2 north, range 9 east.
- Adams, township 3 north, range 6 east.
- Washington, township 3 north, range 7 east.
- Mt. Pleasant, township 3 north, range 8 east.
- Albany town and village and part of the town of Brooklyn, township 3 north, range 9 east.
- York, township 4 north, range 6 east.
- New Glarus, township 4 north, range 7 east.
- Exeter, township 4 north, range 8 east.
- Brooklyn (nearly all), township 4 north, range 9 east.

LOCATING THE COUNTY SEAT.

The "town of New Mexico," mentioned in the act creating Green county, where the "seat of justice" was established, was a village laid out by Jacob Andrick; but, at the date of the passage of the law above mentioned, his plat had not been recorded. It was located within what are now the southern limits of the city of Monroe. As this was the point intended by the law for the location of the county seat, it was believed by some of the pioneers that investments here "would pay." Among the number holding this belief was Joseph Payne. Indeed, he rather coveted half the prospective "seat of justice," and made proposals to "Judge" Andrick for its purchase, but this was refused.

Mr. Payne, not being successful in his endeavors to purchase an interest in "Judge" Andrick's village, concluded to lay out a village of his own contiguous thereto. It was immediately north of the "town of New Mexico," and extended so as to include both sides of that now occupied by the railroad track in the city of Monroe. But while the survey was going on, he concluded to make a last effort to purchase an interest in Andrick's village; but his visit to the "judge" was barren of results. "Mr. James Campbell, who was Mr. Payne's surveyor, remembers," says Miss Bingham, in her History, "that while they were surveying, Mr. Payne stopped work to make a last effort to purchase a share in New Mexico, and that he remarked on his return from his fruitless visit to Judge Andrick, 'New Mexico isn't recorded, and if the old fool won't let any one else have half the county seat, he shan't have any part of it himself.'"

In order to accomplish his purpose, Mr. Payne resorted to a very cute "Yankee trick;" he finished the survey of his "town," named it, when platted, "New Mexico," and then hastened to Mineral Point, the county seat (for Green county was not organized) to get it put on record. The news of this strategy reached the ears of the "judge" soon after Payne's departure and he at once mounted a horse in pursuit with his "New Mexico" in his coat pocket. But he was too late. The last "New Mexico"—the one platted by Payne—was the first to go on record; and the "judge" was believed to be circumvented. But there is "many a slip between the cup and the lip." The people now took the matter in hand.

A petition was circulated to have so much of the law creating the county of Green as fixed the "seat of justice" at the "town of New Mexico" repealed, and to have commissioners appointed to locate the county seat. The petition was not only sent to Mr. Sutherland, the member of the Territorial legislature, to be presented to the House, but to induce him to exert himself, a large number of voters pledged themselves to abide the decision made by the commissioners should a law pass as requested setting aside "the town of New Mexico." Mr. Sutherland's efforts resulted in the passage of the following law:

"An act to repeal so much of 'An act to divide the county of Iowa' as establishes the seat of justice of the county of Green at New Mexico, and to provide for the location of the seat of justice of the county of Green.

"SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of Wisconsin, that so much of the second section of an act entitled, 'An act to divide the county of Iowa,' as establishes the seat of justice of the county of Green at New Mexico, be and the same is hereby repealed.

"SEC. 2. James L. Thayer, J. F. Ostrander and George W. Hickox are appointed commissioners to locate and establish the seat of justice of said county of Green.

"SEC. 3. The commissioners aforesaid, or a majority of them, shall meet at the dwelling house of Joseph Payne, in said county, on the second Monday of February next, or as soon thereafter as practicable, and before proceeding to the discharge of the duties assigned them by this act, shall severally take an oath before some person legally authorized to administer the same, to perform the duties of their appointment faithfully, without fear, favor, affection, or any reward or hope thereof; and if either of the commissioners shall violate the above oath, he shall be liable to all the pains and penalties of perjury.

"SEC. 4. It shall be the duty of said commissioners to make a careful examination of said county, having regard to its present and probable future population, and to locate the seat of justice of the same where, in their opinion, it will be for the best interest of the county.

"SEC. 5. So soon as the said commissioners shall have made the location as aforesaid, it shall be their duty to make report of the same to the clerk of the board of county commissioners of the county of Green, who shall record the same, and shall immediately certify to the governor of the Territory where the selection of the seat of justice of said county has been made by the said commissioners, and the governor shall thereupon issue his proclamation declaring the place so selected to be the seat of justice of said county.

"SEC. 6. The said commissioners are allowed $5 per day each, to be paid out of the treasury of said county of Green, for every day so necessarily employed.

"Approved Dec. 19, 1838."

The commissioners appointed by this act took the oath prescribed, and proceeded "to make a careful examination of said county, having regard to its present and probable future population, and to locate the seat of justice of the same where, in their opinion, it will be for the best interest of the county." But, as the sequel shows, they made a choice not at all acceptable to the people. Their report was as follows:

"To the clerk of the board of county commissioners of the county of Green:

"We, the commissioners appointed by the legislative assembly of the Territory of Wisconsin to locate the county seat of the county of Green, agreeably to an act entitled, 'An act to divide the county of Iowa as establishes the seat of justice of the county of Green at New Mexico, and to provide for the location of the seat of justice of the county of Green,'* approved Dec. 19, 1838, respectfully report,

"That, after having discharged the duties required by said act in examining said county, have unanimously agreed to locate, and have located the seat of justice of said county of Green on the east half of the northeast quarter of section twenty-five (25), in township 2 north, of range seven (7) east, at a point designated by a stake driven by us on said east half of the northeast quarter of said section twenty-five (25),—to which we have given the name of 'Roscoe.' All which is respectfully submitted.

"JARED J. OSTRANDER,
"JAMES L. THAYER,
"G. HICKOX.

"Roscoe, Green Co., Feb. 16, 1839."

* The act that the commissioners here attempt to describe was the one just given—"An act to repeal so much of 'An act to divide the county of Iowa' as establishes the seat of justice of the county of Green at New Mexico, and to provide for the location of the seat of justice of the county of Green."

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

As already intimated, the place fixed upon by the commissioners was not acceptable to the people. So, upon representations made to the Territorial legislature, they passed the act which follows, submitting the question of the location of the county seat to the electors of the county:

“An act to provide for [and] establishing the seat of justice of Green county.

“Be it enacted by the Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of Wisconsin, as follows:

"SECTION 1. For the purpose of permanently establishing the seat of justice of the county of Green, an election shall be held on the first Monday in May next, at which election, every free white male inhabitant who at the time of the passage of this act was an actual resident of the county and is of the age of twenty-one years, shall be entitled to cast his vote for such place or point as he may choose for the seat of justice.

“SEC. 2. The polls of election shall be opened at the usual places of holding elections in said county, and be conducted and the votes canvassed in all respects as is prescribed by the law regulating general elections.

“SEC.. 3. The clerk of the board of county commissioners shall, certify to the result of the election, which certificate shall within ten days thereafter be transmitted by the sheriff of the county to the governor of the territory, and if, upon examination, the governor shall find that any one point voted for, has a majority over all the places voted for, he shall issue his proclamation of that fact, and the place so having the greatest number of votes shall from the date of such proclamation be the seat of justice of said county.

“SEC. 4. If upon examination of votes, the governor shall find that no one place has a majority of the whole number of votes polled and returned to him, he shall issue a proclamation for a new election in said county.

“SEC. 5. The governor shall in his proclamation fix the time of holding said election and it shall be conducted and returns hereof made in the same manner as the first election, and if there is no decision by a majority of the votes, agreeing upon any one point, then the governor shall issue his proclamation for a third election, and so on from time to time until the question is decided “SEC. 6. Before the governor shall issue such proclamation, declaring such place to be the seat of justice, the board of county commissioners shall make and execute a deed re-conveying all donations which may have been made to the county at the present seat of justice, to the donor or donors, and any and all bonds which may have been executed in consequence of the present location shall be surrendered.

“SEC. 7. This act shall take effect from and after its passage. Approved March 9, 1839.”

It would naturally be supposed that Mr. Payne’s village, now that the votes of the people were to determine the question of the location of the seat of justice, would find strong supporters at least among his own friends, but an unforeseen obstacle now arose. It was a question of water supply. It would not do to undertake to build a county seat where water could not be obtained—at least by digging wells; but a well sunk to the depth of forty feet on Payne’s site resulted in the finding of no water. This blasted his hopes. The pioneers would not consent to vote for so dry a spot. And, for some reason Mr. Andrick, too, abandoned the idea of making his “New Mexico” the county seat. So it was that “Roscoe” and the two “New Mexico’s” were thrown overboard and other points fixed upon for competition in this interesting race for the seat of justice.

Combinations were now formed. One was the “Andrick, Wilcoxon and Sutherland” combination,—these gentlemen bringing forward a site which they claimed ought to be the one where justice in the future should be meted out; another was the “Payne, Ly Brand and Russell” combination,—these men, desiring the votes of the electors for the county seat at a different point—one considered by them as the champion location.

The result of submitting the question of locating the seat of justice to a vote of the people, is best described by giving from the county records the statistics as to the number of votes polled and the descriptions of the places voted for, premising that three elections were held before the matter was finally settled; one on the 6th day of June, 1839; a second, on June 18, 1839; and a third and last one, Aug. 5, 1839.

FIRST ELECTION.

“An election was held at the house of Jacob Andrick in the town of New Mexico, Green county, on the 6th day of May, A. D. 1830, for the purpose of establishing the county seat of Green county.

“There were three locations voted for—one of Andrick, Wilcoxon and Sutherland, which was described as follows: ‘On the half-mile stake, south side of section No. 25, in township No. 2, of range No. 7 east’—sixty-eight votes.

“The second site voted for was owned by Payne, Ly Brand and Russell, located on the south half of the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 35 and the north half of the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section No. 35 and the north half of the west half of the southwest quarter of section 35, all of township 2 north, of range 7 east—which received sixty-seven votes.

“The third place voted for was Roscoe, which received one vote.”

SECOND ELECTION.

“An abstract of votes given at an election held at the house of Jacob Andrick, in the town of New Mexico, in the county of Green, and Territory of Wisconsin, on the 18th day of June, A. D. 1839, for the purpose of establishing the seat of justice of Green county: For Andrick and Sutherland, south side of section No. 25, township 2 north, of range 7 east, had seventy-one (71) votes.

“For Payne, Ly Brand and Russell, south half of northeast quarter of southwest quarter of section 35; north half of southeast quarter of southwest quarter of section 35; north half of west half of southwest quarter of section 35; east half of southeast quarter of section 34, of township 2, of range 7 east—had seventy (70) votes.

“For Jacob Andrick, south part of west half of northwest quarter of section No. 2; south part of east half of northeast quarter of section No. 3, township 1 north, of range 7 east—received one (1) vote.”

THIRD ELECTION.

“An abstract of votes given at an election held at the house of Jacob Andrick, in the town of New Mexico, in Green county, and Territory of Wisconsin, on the 5th day of August, A. D. 1839, for the purpose of establishing the seat of justice of said Green county:

“Payne, Ly Brand and Russell had seventy-nine (79) votes for county seat, on sections No. 34 and 35, in township 2 north, range 7 east. “D. S. Sutherland and Andrick had seventy-four (74) votes for county seat on section No. 2, in township 2 north, of range 7 east.”

This gave the county seat, by a majority of five votes, to Ly Brand, Payne and Russell, and the county seat contest was ended.

Before the last election came off the Ly Brand, Payne and Russell combination executed to the county the following bonds:

“Know all men by these presents that I, Jacob Ly Brand, as principal, and Hiram Rust, Andrew Clarno, Wm. Blunt as sureties, are each and all of us firmly held and bound unto the county of Green, in the Territory of Wisconsin in the penal sum of ten thousand dollars to the payment of which well and truly to be made, we do hereby bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, administrators and assigns firmly by these presents. ‘The condition of the above obligation is such that if at an election to be holden on this day, August fifth, for the purpose of locating the seat of justice of the said county of Green, the site which shall be chosen shall be the north half of the west half of the southwest quarter of section number thirty-five (35) in township number two (2) of range number seven (7) east, and the north half of the east

"Attest, William Rittenhouse,

The number of votes polled at the first election was 136; at the second, 142; at the third, 153. As the eastern portion of section 34, and the western portion of section 35, in township 2 north, of range 7 east, was definitely fixed upon as the future capital of Green county, it only needed that the "Ly Brand, Payne and Russell" combination should execute to the county their proposed gifts. This was done by the following deeds:

"This indenture, made and entered into this twenty-fourth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine, between Jacob Ly Brand, of the county of Green, in the Territory of Wisconsin of the first part, and the county of Green in the Territory of Wisconsin of the second part: Witnesseth, that the said Jacob Ly Brand of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of

On the lands thus donated there was platted by the district surveyor, William Griffith, a village, to which was given the name of Monroe. The plat was certified to by the surveyor on the 23d of December, 1839. The forty acres donated by Jacob Ly Brand occupied the central one-third of the village; that given by Joseph Payne, the east one-third; and that deeded by William S. Russell the west one third. Allen Woodle, Adam Starr, John Chryst, Daniel Harcourt, and James Hawthorn were made a committee to receive the title to these lands, and to superintend the platting of the same; and on the 8th day of January, 1840, they certified to the platting as reported by the surveyor; and on the 21st day of April, 1840, made acknowledgment to the certificate before James Riley, justice of the peace. On the 18th day of May, 1840, William Bowen, James Riley and William Boyls, county commissioners, acknowledged the receipt of the plat for the uses for which it was donated, before Hiram Rust, justice of the peace. So the county seat of Green county was permanently located at what is now the city of Monroe.

What remained now to be done to complete the whole matter connected with the locating of the county seat at Monroe was the selection of the lots in that village; by Jacob Ly Brand, which, the reader will recollect, he reserved the privileges of selecting, viz: six town lots for himself, from the forty acres which he deeded to the county; and before the public sale of lots in Monroe, by the commissioners of the county, he was requested by them to make choice of the same; as fully appears by the following entry in the record of their proceedings:

“WHEREAS, Jacob Ly Brand reserved to himself the choice of six town [village] lots in the town [village] of Monroe, in his deed to Green county, dated 24th day of August, A. D. 1839, be it ordered that said Jacob Ly Brand be notified that the town plat of the town of Monroe is acknowledged and filed in the register’s office for record, and that the said Ly Brand make choice of said lots as aforesaid in said deed, and that the sheriff serve on the said Jacob Ly Brand, a copy of this order and make due return thereof.”

But the “said Jacob Ly Brand” seemed in no hurry to make his selection; so the board proceeded to pass the following order on the 1st day of June, 1840

“WHEREAS, Jacob Ly Brand was notified on the 18th day of May, 1840, to make choice of six town lots, reserved by him in a deed executed to the county of Green, dated August 24, 1839, which notice was returned by the sheriff, duly served; and whereas, no specified time is designated for the selection of said lots, and sufficient time having been given to the said Jacob Ly Brand to make such selection as by him provided in said deed; and whereas, he has hitherto neglected, and by so neglecting, refused, and by so doing, waived his right to make such choice; and whereas, provision is made in the above named deed that Green County, before offering any portion of the town of Monroe for sale, shall make a deed to said Jacob Ly Brand of six building lots, in said town, as provided in said deed; now be it

“ORDERED, that the following lots be selected, to-wit: lot No. 1, facing on the public square, and lots Nos. 80, 88, 89, 97, 74, being lots not facing on the public square; and that a deed be executed to the said Jacob Ly Brand for said lots on the part of said Green county, and tendered to the said Jacob Ly Brand by the sheriff, and return thereof made and filed in the office of the clerk of this board.”

Mr. Ly Brand would not receive the deed tendered by the commissioners, and the sheriff made his return in accordance with the facts. here the matter rested until the 8th day of October, when the public sale of the Monroe lots was to take place, when the matter was arranged, Mr. Ly Brand having before that date made a selection of the lots and the commissioners thereupon deeding the same to him, as appears from the following record of their proceedings:

“October 8, 1840.

“WHEREAS, A deed was executed to Jacob Ly Brand, by this board, for six building lots in the town of Monroe, and presented to him by the sheriff of Green county, in pursuance of an order by this board, at the July session 1840; and,

“WHEREAS, The said Jacob Ly Brand refused to accept said deed, and chose other six lots in said town, to-wit: lots numbers one (1), twenty-three (23), twenty-four (24), and twenty-five

(25), being lots on the land donated to Green county by Jacob Ly Brand; also lot number three (3) on the land donated to said county by William C. Russell; also lot number seven (7), on the land donated by the said Jacob Ly Brand, and facing on the public square in said town.

“Ordered, That a deed of conveyance be executed to the said Jacob Ly Brand by this board, on the part of Green county, for the aforesaid described lots and tendered to the said

Jacob Ly Brand, by the sheriff, who is requested to make return thereof forthwith to this board.

The sheriff returned into court the following return, to-wit: ‘I hereby certify that I, this 8th day of October 1840, presented a deed from Green county to Jacob Ly Brand for certain lots in the town of Monroe, and the said Jacob Ly Brand accepted the same.’

CHAPTER XI.

TERRITORIAL, STATE AND CONGRESSIONAL REPRESENTATION.

The settlers who located in what is now Green county before the year 1836 were, of course, citizens of Michigan Territory, and were represented in its legislative council at Detroit as residents—first of Crawford county and afterwards of Iowa county. As the first occupants of the soil of the present Green county came here in 1827, it follows that they were represented in Congress from that date to 1836 by congressional delegates from Michigan Territory.

As the greater part of Green county formed a portion of Iowa county from the erection of Wisconsin Territory in 1836 until 1838 (so far as its representation in the Territorial legislature was concerned), we must look to the members of the latter county for those who represented Green county for these years—that is to say, until the first session of the second legislative assembly, which convened in Madison, Nov. 26, 1838.

BIOGRAPHICAL.JAMES R. VINEYARD.

James R. Vineyard was born in Kentucky in 1804, from whence he moved at an early date to the Lead Region of Wisconsin, and adopted the occupation of a miner. His after public career was in many respects unhappy, even if brilliant and useful. In 1838 he was elected a member of the Territorial council, in which he served until 1842. Most unfortunately, on the 11th of February of that year, in an altercation with Charles C. P. Arndt, of Brown county, which occurred in the hall of the House, he shot and killed his opponent. The melancholy event created wide-spread sensation and horror in most portions of the west, but on trial he was acquitted by a jury. In 1846 he was elected a member of the Constitutional Convention from Platteville, Grant county. Not reaching the capital until some days after the session had commenced, he was not appointed upon any of the standing committees, and took no important part in any of the proceedings. In 1849 he was elected a member of the assembly, but the event that clouded his life was a bar to special prominence. In 1850 he moved to California, and was elected to its State Senate for several terms, and also acted as Indian agent for several years. He died about 1872.

Mr. Vineyard possessed great energy and force of character, was distinguished for his abilities, and ever enjoyed great personal popularity at his home. An act done in a moment of passion not only horrified the people of the Territory, but was ever after a source of keenest remorse to himself. Under different and more favorable circumstances, he might have become one of the most prominent men in Wisconsin. His good qualities as a friend and citizen were generally and widely appreciated; but nothing could efface the memory of his great offense. It still lingers in the minds of all pioneer settlers.

EBENEZER BRIGHAM.

Ebenezer Brigham was born at Shrewsbury, Worcester Co., Mass., April 28, 1789. In 1818 he came to Olean Point, in the State of New York. The Allegheny river was then the only channel known through western New York, and that was only navigated by canoes, rafts, or skiffs. He came through in a canoe, and at Pittsburg took a flat boat down the Ohio river. The villages on the river were all small. During the journey down he saw but one steamboat, On arriving at Shawneetown he landed and walk through to St. Louis. There was nothing at that place but a small French settlement, not more than three or four brick houses in the town. In 1822 he followed up the Mississippi, on horseback, to Galena, where he found James Johnson, a brother of Richard M. Johnson, who was just opening the mines. Galena then consisted of one log cabin completed, and another under way, which he assisted in finishing. He subsequently returned to Springfield, Ill. In 1827 he started for Wisconsin with an ox team, seeking the Lead Region again. At that time there was a large emigration to the southwestern part of the Territory, as lead ore was abundant and the price remunerative. He remained awhile with a small party on what is now the Block House branch of the Platte river, about four miles south of the present village of Platteville, in Grant county, for the purpose of prospecting for mineral. From this point the party retreated in haste to Galena, owing to the commencement of hostilities by the Winnebago Indians. In the spring of 1828 he removed to Blue Mounds, Dane county, where, at some abandoned diggings on section 7, he soon discovered a valuable body of mineral, as lead ore was then and still is called by the miners in the Lead Regions. The lode discovered by him had previously been worked by the Indians and white men. The only source of food supply was from Galena. On his arrival he erected a cabin, the first house in what is now Dane county, built by a permanent American settler. Its location was on the south-west quarter of the southwest quarter of section 5, as afterward (in 1838) surveyed by the United States surveyors. It was east of south of the East Blue Mound, and distant from it nearly half a mile. Soon after he had raised his cabin, he took a trip, with two companions, to Fort Winnebago, to ascertain whether food could not be more easily obtained at that point. The route taken was north of Lake Mendota, on the line of the military road afterward laid out. He obtained a supply of salt pork, hard bread, powder and some other things of a settler, not loading heavily, and on the return struck south, striking the old trail that formerly ran between Lake Monona and Lake Mendota, following it up the hill where the State House in Madison now stands, where he encamped over night. Intercourse with the Indians had made known to him the distance of the lake region before he started. From the enchanting view of the spot, he predicted that a village would be built there, probably be the future capital of the Territory. The isolated condition of Mr. Brigham, where he settled, will be apparent from the statement of a few facts: The nearest settler was at what is now Dodgeville. Mineral point, and other mining places where villages have since grown up, had not been discovered. On the southeast the nearest house was on the Des Plaines river, twelve miles west of Chicago. On the east Solomon Juneau was his nearest neighbor, at the mouth of the Milwaukee river, and on the northeast Green Bay was the nearest settlement.

Shortly after locating at the Mounds, Mr. Brigham, in company with William S. Hamilton, Mr. Gratiot and some others, visited Green Bay, in order to settle on certain boundaries between the whites and the Indians. The line was fixed upon and the Indians blazed the trees along this line, notifying the whites not to pass it—a prohibition not at all effectual, as any one would readily conclude.

For several years after his coming, the savages were plentiful around the Four Lakes; a large Indian village stood near the mouth of Token creek; another stood on the ridge between Lake Waubesa and Lake Monona and their wigwams were seen at different points along the streams.

Soon after his settlement he was honored with the appointment of magistrate from Lewis Cass, governor of the Territory of Michigan, of which Territory Wisconsin was then a part. He held this commission for four years, and all the duty he performed during that time was to marry one couple. He often related an anecdote of being called upon to go some thirty miles to marry a couple, but, on arriving within a short distance of the place, word had been left there that the fair lady had changed her mind, and he must not come any farther. Mr. Brigham, however, went on and introduced another friend, who succeeded in making a contract, and the next spring he was called upon to ratify it; this was the only official act of a four year's term of justice of the peace.

The principal object of his location at the Blue Mounds, as before stated, was mining for lead. His first diggings were on the section line between sections 7 and 18, but his furnace was immediately west of his house. The location of his diggings was a mile and a quarter from his house, in a southwesterly direction. The military road ran east and west, between the house and his mine.

Brigham, however, cultivated the soil in a small way, having his fields near his house. One of the "leads" on his land was "proved" before his death to the depth of over seventy feet, when the workmen were prevented by water, from going deeper.

Upward of 4,000,000 pounds were taken from this mine with no other machinery than the common windlass, rope and tub. His lead was hauled to Green Bay, Chicago and Galena. On his first trip to Chicago, there was not a house or wagon-track between that place and Blue Mounds. He was fifteen days in reaching his destination fording with his oxen and load of lead the Rock and Fox rivers, and the smaller streams on the route. On this expedition, he was accompanied by a favorite dog, for which he was offered, in Chicago, a village lot, which was situated where now is the most valuable property in that city. In those days, the whole site of the town could have been purchased for a few hundred dollars.

Brigham, at the organization of the Territorial government, was elected a member of the council, and was re-elected, serving nine terms, from 1836 to 1841. When the State government was organized, in 1848, he was elected a member of the assembly. He died at the residence of his niece, Mrs. H. G. Bliss, at Madison, Sept. 14, 1861, aged seventy-two years. He was never married.

It must not be supposed that Brigham was the first white man—the first American at the Mounds; but, although this was not the fact, yet he was the first permanent settler. Before him, as already explained, the diggings had been worked. William Deviese went there in the spring, just before Brigham's arrival, where he found two men named Moore, who were trading a little, in whisky at least, and one John Duncan, a very large and powerful man. But on the 12th day of August, Deviese moved to Sugar River Diggings, leaving James Hawthorn to continue the work there. So it seems certain that Brigham, upon his arrival, found miners at work at the Mounds, but none of them made a permanent stay.

John B. Skinner had had at one time a furnace there. However, it is certainly known that, at the date of the survey of the lands at the Mounds, which was in 1833, there was left but one resident in the vicinity, and that one was Ebenezer Brigham.

It may be mentioned in this connection, that Brigham, at an early day, kept many articles for sale to the miners and pioneer farmers. The prices current in those times were different from now. An examination of an old daybook shows that, on the 28th day of June, 1828, he sold to Samuel Carman, one barrel of flour, charging for the same $8, and four pounds of sugar at twenty cents a pound.

On the 17th day of July, of the same year, Duncan & Proctor were sold a half bushel of salt, for which they were charged $1.25. Labor was cheap in those days. Thomas Jones was credited on the 28th day of June, of the same year, with four days work at seventy-seven cents a day. On the 6th of February, 1830, Wallace Rowan is charged for one pair of moccasins, fifty cents; for one pint of whisky, twenty-five cents; for one bushel of corn, fifty cents.

Mr. Brigham, on the 23d of October, 1830, agreed with W. J. Medcalf, to winter eight head of beef cattle, from the 1st of December, until the 1st of April, 1831, for $48, and also to deliver 100 bushels of corn at the portage, (Fort Winnebago) for $70. Indeed, from the start, it is evident that "Brigham's Place" was one of business; for, during the year 1828, he had accounts with John Murphy, Thomas Jones, Downing Lot, Samuel Carman, John White, Mr. Kellogg, Kirkpatrick & Brigham, Mr. Wentworth, James Cloyd, Duncan & Proctor, Noah M. King, Mr. Dinwiddy, Terwan & Elington, Fish & Kellogg, Mr. Rader, Alexander Wilson, Soward Blackmore, Thomas H. Price, Andrew Orr, William Fulton, George Spangle, Elijah Slater, Slater & Brigham and Mr. Fish. It will be seen therefore, that, although Mr. Brigham had located at the extreme eastern diggings of the Lead Region, he did not lack for laborers, or for customers. It was not long after his location at the East Blue Mound, before the road from Prairie du Chien to Fort Winnebago, (this fort being erected in the fall of 1828, the very year of Brigham's arrival) was laid out, and already along the old Indian trail, between these points, was considerable travel. Then followed the road from Milwaukee to the Mississippi by his place, so that by the time emigration began to set in pretty briskly in this region, the Blue Mounds presented the air of a lively place. In 1836, Mr. Brigham was appointed postmaster, the first person receiving that appointment within the present limits of the county.

The following anecdote, related by Ebenezer Childs, illustrates the "cuteness" of Mr. Brigham. I left Carrollton, Ill., about the middle of May, [1827], passed through Jacksonville, where there were a few houses; the next place was Springfield, which had a population of about 200. Thence I went to Sangamon, where I met Ebenezer Brigham, from Worcester Co., Mass. He was the first live Yankee that I had seen from my native county, since I had left there, in 1816, and I was the first he had seen from that county. I had a yoke of blind oxen, that gave my men a great deal of trouble to drive. As Brigham had a tread-mill, I thought my blind oxen would do as well for that purpose as though they could see, so I proposed to the gentleman from Worcester county to exchange my oxen for a horse. He said that, as we were both from Worcester county, he would try and accommodate me. I told him my oxen were a little blind, but I thought they could do him good service. After it became a little dark, I took him to see my oxen. He liked them very well. He then took me to see his horse. It was by this time quite dark. I did not examine him much, but he appeared to be a fine-looking animal. We had exchanged honorably, as we were both from the same native region; in a word, we felt and acted like brothers. But the next morning, when I joined the drove, I found that my new horse was as blind as a bat, and I do believe he had not seen for ten years; and he appeared older than the ancient hills around us. But it was all right, as friend Brigham and I were both from Worcester county. We have many a time, since, laughed heartily over our early trade. From "a Genealogical Register of the descendants of several Ancient Puritans by the name of Grout, Goulding and Brigham," published in Boston, in 1859, is found the following concerning the first settler of Dane county.

He [Ebenezer Brigham] is the proprietor of a large tract of land, rich in agricultural and mineral resources, and one of the original proprietors of the city of Madison, the capitol of Wisconsin, now hardly twenty years old, yet containing in 1859, a population of 12,000 souls. Mr. Brigham depends not on his wealth, nor on this humble record to preserve his history. He is extensively and advantageously known, and, when the whole of his character shall come to be written, the reader must feel that a good name is emphatically better than riches, and constitutes the value of a posthumous memory." Mr. Brigham is buried in the beautiful cemetery of Forest Hill, near the city of Madison, where a fine monument is erected to his memory.

JOHN CATLIN

was born Oct. 13, 1803, at Orwell, Vt. His genealogy has been successfully traced back through six generations to Thomas Catlin, who resided at Hartford, Conn., more than two and a quarter centuries ago. His father was John B. Catlin, and his mother's maiden name Rosa Ormsbee, daughter of John Ormsbee, of Shoreham, Vt. John Catlin came of excellent American stock, as both his paternal and maternal grandfathers were Revolutionary soldiers, and conspicuous for their patriotic zeal in the war which resulted in the consummation of American independence.

In his paternal grandfather's family there were seven brothers, all of whom shouldered the Revolutionary musket and joined the ranks of the patriotic army. They were all of them fine specimens of stalwart manhood, standing full six feet high, heavy, muscular and well proportioned. His mother's father held a lieutenant's commission in the Continental army, and continued in the service until the close of the war, when he received an honorable discharge, together with the sum of $1,400, the amount of his pay. The currency of the country was somewhat inflated at that time, as on his return to his home in Massachusetts, Lieut. Ormsbee paid $60 of his money for a single bushel of corn.

John Catlin's father was engaged in the mercantile business until 1812. At the beginning of the war which broke out that year, he abandoned his mercantile vocation and took up his residence in the town of Bridport, Addison Co., Vt. Having purchased a farm bordering on Lake Champlain, he became a tiller of the soil. The subject of our sketch was then about nine years of age; and in that place and vicinity he began and ended the scholastic training which was to prepare him for the business of life. His educational advantages were quite limited, being only such as the common district school afforded, with the exception of one year which he spent in Newton Academy, located at Shoreham. At the age of eighteen he quit school and resorted to the vocation of teaching as a temporary means of livelihood. He followed this occupation for nine successive winters, devoting his summers to self-culture and to the study of law in the office of Augustus C. Hand, of Elizabethtown, N. Y. In 1833 he was admitted to the bar at the age of thirty.

In 1836 he joined the comparatively small band of early pioneers who were following the "course of empire" westward. At that time emigrating as far west as Wisconsin was no holiday excursion as now. The pioneer of 1836 had no palace car furnished with luxurious accommodations, in which he could repose at his ease, reading the latest paper or magazine, or sleep away the swift hours, rolling him over the iron track at the rate of 400 miles a day. The emigrant of forty years ago was compelled to travel by the slow stage coach, dragging its weary way over muddy roads, at the rate of thirty to fifty miles a day, or by the tedious canal-boat with its scanty accommodations, or the ill-provided lake steamer, laboring against opposing waves to make six miles an hour, and, even when the wished-for destination was reached, the traveler found himself encompassed with difficulties, dangers and privations.

Mr. Catlin first settled at Mineral Point, where he formed co-partnership with Moses M. Strong in the business of his chosen profession. He, however, remained there but two years for the capital of the Territory having been located at Madison, and he having received the appointment of postmaster at that place, in the spring of 1838, he removed there with a view of making it his permanent residence. He held the position of postmaster until the election of Gen. Harrison as President, when he was removed to make way for a political antagonist; but, upon the accession of John Tyler to the Presidency, he was re-instated and continued to hold the office until 1844, when he was elected a member of the Territorial council representing the counties of Dane, Dodge, Green, Jefferson and Sank, and the two offices being incompatible under the law, he resigned his post office appointment.

In the fall of 1836, Mr. Catlin was appointed clerk of the Supreme Court. He was also chosen clerk of the Territorial House of Representative in 1838, and was re-elected to that position for eight successive years. He was the first district attorney of Dane county, and on the removal of George C. Floyd from the office of secretary of the Territory, in 1846, he was appointed his successor, and continued to hold that position until Wisconsin was admitted into the Union, in 1848. A bill was introduced into Congress by Morgan L. Martin, the delegate of Wisconsin, to organize a Territorial government for Minnesota, including the district left out on the admission of Wisconsin as a State. The citizens of what is now Minnesota, were very anxious to obtain a Territorial government; and two public meetings were held—one at St. Paul, and the other at Stillwater—advising and soliciting Mr. Catlin, who was secretary of Wisconsin, to issue a proclamation, as the acting governor, for the election of a delegate. After some consideration Mr. Catlin repaired to Stillwater, and issued the proclamation.

H. H. Sibley was elected; and he did much toward hastening the passage of a bill for organizing a Territorial government for Minnesota. Mr. Catlin was afterward elected county judge of Dane county, an office which he resigned in order to accept a position of President of the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad Company. His appointment to this position necessitated his removal to Milwaukee.

In the discharge of the duties of the important position of President of the primitive railroad of Wisconsin, Mr. Catlin displayed great energy and skill.

He procured the passage of a law which made the first mortgage bonds of this railroad, to the amount of fifty percent., a foundation for banking. This feature appreciated the obligations of the company to such an extent that he was enabled to effect a loan of $600,000, which gave to the road the first great impulse, and the work of construction was vigorously begun and as vigorously prosecuted. He was president of this road for five years, or until 1856, when he declined a re-election. His retirement was made the occasion of a highly complimentary resolution, adopted by the board of directors, thanking him for his eminent services in behalf of the road.

In 1857 the company failed, and Mr. Catlin was once more induced to accept the position of president, and he proceeded to re-organize the association. He continued his official connection with that corporation until it was subsequently consolidated with the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company.

Mr. Catlin was married on the 19th day of September, 1843, at Rochester, N. Y., to Clarissa Bristol, daughter of Charles Bristol, once a prominent wholesale merchant of New York city. The fruit of this marriage was one child, a daughter.

Among the pioneers of Wisconsin, John Catlin held a conspicuous place. The various important official positions which, as we have seen, he was called upon to fill, furnish sufficient proof in confirmation of this statement. He was chosen secretary of the Territory; was the first postmaster of Madison; first clerk of the Supreme Court, and of the Territorial House of Representatives; first district attorney of Dane county; its first county judge; was president of the first railroad company; and a member of the Territorial legislature.

His energetic character and practical ability peculiarly fitted him for the work of aiding in the building up the fabric of a new State. All enterprises that promised to promote the growth and prosperity of Wisconsin found in him a zealous supporter and a determined advocate. In its infancy he became a life member of the State Historical Society, and to the time of his death he was one of its most active and inflexible friends. His efforts and influence contributed in no very slight degree toward the collection of literary treasures which now fill one wing of the capitol, forming a library of which the State is justly proud. Mr. Catlin's friendship for the Historical Society was not impulsive or spasmodic, but a continuing regard which lasted throughout his active life. It is perhaps but just in this connection to allude to the liberal bequest which he made of a section of land in the State of Texas, for the benefit of the society.

John Catlin was pre-eminently a self-made man. He owed but little of the success which he achieved to the gifts of fortune, or to extraordinary natural endowments. His intellectual parts were more solid than strong; more useful than ornamental. His aim was success, and he sought it in the slow, but sure and solid, pathways of industry and perseverance.

He knew the race was not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong. He saw the prize of victory in the far distance, waiting for all who would labor to achieve it; and he entered upon the pursuit, not with the impulsive flights of genius, but with the steady gait of practical common sense.

It may be said that Mr. Catlin's intellectual character was neither illustrated nor marred by any of the faculties or the faults of genius. He laid no claim to the natural gifts which are essential attributes in the character of the successful advocate; and yet, had he devoted his life exclusively to the duties of his chosen profession, he would doubtless have gained distinction at the bar. He was a kind and faithful husband, and indulgent parent and a most exemplary citizen. He died Aug. 4, 1874, in Elizabeth, N. J.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

DANIEL S. SUTHERLAND.

D. S. Sutherland is a son of Arich and Rebecca (Stanley) Sutherland, natives of Vermont. They are now dead and buried in Edgar Co., Ill., where they removed in 1829.

He (D. S. Sutherland), was born in Onondaga Co., N. Y., June 13, 1802. In 1835 he first came to Green county, on a prospecting tour, and being delighted with the country, resolved to make it his permanent abode, and the following year took up his residence on section 25, of the town of Monroe. He had all the hardships and disadvantages of pioneer life to contend with. At that time there was not a house between his place and Monroe, and on the east, Janesville was the nearest place of human abode. Their nearest market was at Galena, Ill., and the nearest mill at a place in Lafayette county called Wolf Creek. He came here from Edgar county with six yoke of oxen and two wagons, being on the road from April 30, to May 21. He erected a log cabin, 16x20 feet, with a puncheon floor, in which they lived during the summer and fall, then moved into a new cabin one and a half stories high, the shingles for which they hewed out. The first season he broke ten acres and sowed it to oats, in June. The family lived in the second cabin ten years, when their present house, the first frame house in Monroe, was erected. Mr. Sutherland owned at one time, 560 acres; 240 acres on section 25, and 160 acres on section 30, in the town of Monroe, and eighty acres on section 30, and eighty acres on section 31, in the town of Sylvester. He has sold, and given land to his sons, until he now owns 117 acres. He was, from the first, until he was disqualified for business, always a useful citizen, taking an active interest in every enterprise for the public good. He was the first chairman of both town and county boards; has also been chairman of the county board several terms since. He served two years in the State legislature, and was influential in having this county set off from Iowa county, drawing up the petition for that purpose. Mr. Sutherland was married March 27, 1820, to Louisa Nobles, a native of Connecticut, but at the time of her marriage, a resident of Edgar Co., Ill. They had seven children—Emery G., living in Monroe; Fanny E., wife of John Stearns, of Monroe; Mary A., deceased; Isabella, widow of David Hodge; Daniel W., who was drowned in Sugar river, June 6, 1874, in endeavoring to rescue one of his companions, on a fishing excursion; Richard B., living in Kansas and a soldier during the late war and Germane, deceased.

JAMES SUTHERLAND

An old settler of Green county, was born at Rutland, Vt. in 1795. He went to Salina, N. Y. with his parents, after which he removed to Genesee county when it was a wilderness, it being at the time of the War of 1812. When eighteen years of age he joined the American army and participated in a skirmish at Buffalo.

He was married in Genesee county to Lois Sutherland. She died in 1833. By this union there were seven children, five sons and two daughters—Andrew J., Martin C., John T., Solomon, Catherine, Esther J. and James.

He again married. His second wife was Esther Sutherland. She was born in Rutland, Vt. in 1806. Mr. Sutherland, in his younger days worked at farming, and received a common school education—the greater part at home before the fire place. He moved to Darien on the “Holland Purchase,” where he engaged in the harness trade for a short time. About this time he was elected magistrate, which office he held about ten years. He took an active part in politics and was one of the electors that placed Gen. Jackson in the Presidential chair. In politics he was a staunch democrat and an admirer of Thomas Benton, after whom he named one of his sons. He was also identified with the military history of the State; having held the positions of captain, major and colonel; he went by the latter name until his death.

In November, 1838, he arrived in Green county. He made this trip by way of Buffalo and to Toledo; from there by wagon to Chicago, on to Belvidere, Ill. After remaining near Monroe about four years, he moved on section 15, northeast quarter, town of Sylvester, where he lived until his death.

After coming to the county he took an active part in politics. He was elected and served as representative in the Territorial legislature in the sessions of 1840—41 and 1841—42. He took an interest in educational affairs and was anxious that his children should be educated. He had two children by his last marriage—Francis C. and Thomas B. He died in 1843. His second wife died in November, 1860. This family is of Scotch extraction and they trace their ancestors back to sometime in 1600, to the Duke of Sutherland, when three brothers by that name crossed the ocean and settled on the Atlantic coast.

ALEXANDER BOTKIN.

Alexander Botkin was born in Kentucky in 1801. At an early age he removed to Ohio and thence to Alton, Ill., in 1832. He was a justice of the peace at the time of the Lovejoy riots, and took an active part in preserving law and order. He came to Madison, Wis., in 1841, as assistant secretary of the Territory, and was, for awhile a law partner of Alexander P. Field. He was a member of the Territorial House of Representatives in 1847—8, representing, along with E. T. Gardner and John W. Stewart the counties, as we have seen, of Dane, Green and Sauk, during the special session of the fifth legislative assembly, in October, 1847, and the second session of the same assembly, in February and March, 1848. Mr. Botkin was a State senator in 1849—50 and a member of the assembly in 1852. He was a candidate for the first constitutional convention (which convened in 1846), but was defeated by John Y. Smith. He was voted for by the Whigs in 1849 for United States senator, against Isaac P. Walker, the successful candidate. He died suddenly at Sun Prairie, in Dane county, March 5, 1857, aged fifty-six years.

MEMBERS WHO REPRESENTED GREEN COUNTY IN THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS.

The first constitutional convention assembled at Madison on the 5th day of October, 1846, and adjourned on the 16th day of December, 1846, having framed a constitution, which was submitted to a vote of the people on the first Tuesday in April, 1847, and the same was rejected. The members of this convention from Green county were: Davis Bowen, Noah Phelps, William C. Green and Hiram Brown.

The second convention assembled at Madison on the 15th day of December, 1847, and adjourned on the 1st of February, 1848, having framed a constitution, which was submitted to a vote of the people on the second Monday in March following, and the same was adopted. Green county's representatives in this (the second) constitutional convention were: James Biggs and William McDowell.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

NOAH PHELPS.

Noah Phelps is a descendant of Obadiah Phelps and Lucy, his wife, who was a daughter of Nathan Pelton, of East Windsor, Hartford, Co., Conn. He was born in the town of Turin, Lewis Co., N. Y., May 21, 1808, and after receiving a common school education, became by profession a surveyor, in which occupation he was employed in surveying government lands in the present counties of Dane, Green and Rock, in the then Territory of Michigan, in the years 1833 and 1834. Jan. 5, 1835, he married Adelia Antoinette Hoyt, and in 1838 settled permanently in this county. In 1841 he was elected county surveyor; in 1842 collector of taxes, and re-elected in 1843. In 1844 he was elected a member of the Territorial house of representatives, and re-elected in 1845, the district then embracing Dane, Dodge, Jefferson, Sauk and Green counties.

In 1846 he was elected to the constitutional convention from this county, and served in that body on the committee on banks and banking, and took a somewhat active part in the general proceedings. In 1848 and 1850 he was elected and re-elected clerk of the circuit court, and has since held many local offices of usefulness and importance. He is a gentleman of great natural abilities, genial as the sunshine, affable, courteous and greatly esteemed by all who know him. he is a man of sterling worth, strict integrity, and large and varied educational attainments.

DAVIS BOWEN

was the seventh and youngest son of his parents, Samuel and Sarah (Davies) Bowen. He was born on the 25th of May, 1795, in Fayette Co., Penn. His father was one of the early settlers of that locality, then supposed to be a part of Virginia; but which on running "Mason and Dixon's line," fell to Pennsylvania. He emigrated from Delaware, his native State, in 1770. He claimed to be of Welsh descent, and was widely known as "Capt. Bowen." He took an active and conspicuous part in the long and bloody Indian wars in the valley of the Monongahela river. He never seemed to care about accumulating a large fortune, yet he left a good and comfortable house for his family who survived him. Like most of the frontier settlers he was noted for his hospitality; and it was said—"No one ever left his door hungry." He was highly respected, and lived and died on the old Bowen farm, lying in the locality known as "The Forks of Cheat." After the death of their father, John and Davis, the two younger sons, owned and occupied the old homestead until the fall of 1836, when they sold out, and in the spring of 1837, started west., Davis settled in Wisconsin where he soon became a leading man in his locality, and helped organize the State of his choice. He was an old-time democrat, and was a firm believer in Thomas Jefferson and Gen. Jackson. He was a member of the Baptist church, believed in immersion, true repentance, cleanly and good works. He was respected by all who knew him. He was elected to fill the following offices: Member of the convention in 1846; county commissioner, collector, and justice of the peace. At the age of twenty-six years he was married to Rachel Lane Brown, of Kingwood, W.Va. This union was blessed with several children, but only two survive their parents—James E. and Anna M., wife of Reuben Fleek, of Brodhead. Mr. Bowen died May 6, 1867; his wife died Sept. 7, 1877, aged eighty-seven years. They are resting side by side in the cemetery at Juda. Mr. Bowen came to Green county in April, 1837, and on the 2d of May, entered 160 acres of land on section 27, in what is now the town of Sylvester. He erected a cabin and had ten acres of land broke up that summer. In the fall he returned to West Virginia for his family, they having remained there with relatives until he found a home for them. He remained in West Virginia until in March, 1838, when he started for his western home, arriving there on the 22d of April. He settled on the farm he had opened up the year before, and lived there until his death. Davis Bowen was chairman of the first town meeting, which organized and elected officers for the town. J. I. Bowen and E. T. Fleek, of Decatur are nephews of Davis Bowen, and are old settlers and respected citizens of the county.

HIRAM BROWN.

Hiram Brown was born in Connecticut in 1803, and by profession is a farmer. He was elected from Exeter, this county, to the first constitutional convention, in 1846, and served in that body on the committee on revision and adjustment of the articles of the constitution adopted by the convention. He was noted among his associates for sterling qualities of manhood, careful attention, and an intelligent appreciation of the work in hand. In the chapter on Pioneer Reminiscences has already been given what may be termed an autobiography of Mr. Brown. He is now (1884) a resident of Orleans, Neb., and is over eighty years of age.

WILLIAM MCDOWELL.

William McDowell, a prominent citizen of this county, was born in Newton, Virginia, March 27, 1805. His father was a native of Ireland, who emigrated to America soon after the close of the Revolutionary War, landing at Charleston, S. C., where he had a brother in the mercantile business. Shortly after his arrival, under the impression to do so was a duty, he engaged in preaching the Gospel as an itinerant minister of the M. E. Church, which vocation he followed for a period of seven years, during which time he became acquainted with Rachel McClintick, a member of the Methodist Church, and the acquaintance growing into affection, they were married in the year 1793, at her father's home in Carlisle, Penn., the place of her birth. Soon after their marriage they left for Savannah, Ga., and engaged in the mercantile business; remaining there about three years. From Savannah, they removed to Petersburg, Va., where he was postmaster and did business as a merchant. The next move was to Newtown, Virginia, where merchandising and farming occupied his time and attention until his removal in 1807 to Chillicothe, Ross Co., Ohio, where he continued business as a merchant; but, personally disliking a mercantile life, he left the store in the hands of his eldest son and brother-in-law,

James McClintick, and removed to a farm (eleven miles distant) with the other members of the family. The winter of 1812 he spent at Philadelphia, Penn, in studying medicine and attending the lectures of Benjamin Rush, and Physic, both of whom were eminent in the blood-letting practice of those days. Returning home, he engaged in the physicians calling and in a short time had considerable business and was quite successful; but desirous of educating his children and the facilities of doing so wanting in the country, induced him to leave the farm and return to Chillicothe in 1815, where he remained with but little interruption, until he passed away from earth in November, 1841, at the mature age of eighty years; surviving his wife about eleven years, she being sixty years old at the time of her decease. The bodies of both were buried in one of the cemeteries of Chillicothe, leaving behind them a family of six adult children and many friends to cherish their memory, and follow their good examples. The subject of this sketch attended the schools as were then taught and acquired a rudimentary knowledge of the branches, both of the English and Latin languages; but it cannot be said that he was not a "breeching scholar, in the schools;" and now laments lost opportunities and negligence in his studies when young. In the eighteenth year of his age he was sent to Portsmouth, Ohio, where his eldest brother lived and was in the mercantile business, to prosecute the study of medicine, for which purpose, he became a student of N. W. Andrews, a popular physician of Portsmouth; but as often happens, "man may propose, but, God disposes" and again "There's a divinity that shapes our ends; rough hew them as we will;" so, in this case, the services of our subject were frequently required by his brother in the store; thus so interfering with his medical studies, that, after a lapse of a few months, they were given up and exchanged to the duties of a counter-hopper and shipper of merchandise. Becoming a partner of his brother, he expected to make that the business of his future life, but here again he had reckoned without his host; for, meeting with a maiden fair, who resided in the country near Portsmouth, and being susceptible to the charms of a lovely female, the old, old story was whispered in her ear and found a ready welcome there, which, consummated in a marriage, Jan. 5, 1830, changing her maiden name, Ann E. Clingman, to that of A. E. McDowell. This act of his, although no fault could be laid to the girl of his choice, who was of a good family and of an unblemished character, gave offense and found opposition in a quarter which would make the business relation existing between the brothers very unpleasant. The partnership was, therefore, immediately dissolved. This new turn of the wheel of fortune so sudden and unexpected, brought him to face the question, "what now?" Having muscle and brains he rolled up his sleeves and went to work on a farm and earned the bread for himself and wife, by the sweat of his brow; and although the resolve involved much hard labor, it was carried into successful practice by the subject of this article, who in the spring of 1830, engaged in the calling of a tiller of the soil, on a farm owned by his father, eleven miles distant from Chillicothe after residing on which for three years, it was sold, and its occupant with his little family of wife and one child, removed to Portsmouth, where he went into the lumber trade, which was given up a few months later for what appeared a more lucrative business, the manufacture of soap and candles, at Chillicothe, which was commenced in 1833, under the firm name of McDowell & Aston. The last named gentleman losing his wife, by death shortly after, the partnership was dissolved by mutual consent, leaving to Mr. McDowell the burden of meeting and canceling the debts against the firm; which by pluck and energy of self and wife, was fully accomplished, and the term "mud-sill and greasy-mechanic" invented and facetiously, or otherwise, applied, by southern politicians to the free laborers of the northern States, could now regarded as appropriate, when applied to him, for he had been both, a farmer, soap and candle maker. Here again new trials arose and cast dark shadows on the green and bright spots, which at length had began to appear scattered here and there on the pathway of our friend's life-journey, as if to try his virtue and let patience perform her perfect work. His father, who had reached the age of seventy-three years, had become a victim to the seductive influence of morphine, which, at first, was taken in small doses to alleviate suffering from pain of body. These doses had so increased in size and frequency as to cause a state of the mind equal to, if not worse at times, than delirium tremens; such being the case, the soap factory was disposed of, and for six or seven years, thereafter, the time was mostly devoted to the care of an invalid parent, which ended only when that father ceased to live on earth. In May, 1842, with his wife and four children, he undertook the arduous task of reaching his present location with a two-horse team and wagon. He had only traveled about fifteen miles from the starting point, when he came to a ridge which spanned a brook; near the edge of this bridge there was a hog-wallow, into which, the off-wheel of the wagon plunged, throwing the horse on that side over the embankment; there he lay on his side, feet and legs upwards, back and head down wards, unable to rise or extricate himself. Fortunately the horse on the near side of the wagon kept on his feet and was quiet until both of the animals were detached from the wagon. Had it been otherwise, probably the whole family would have been instantly killed or terribly wounded. Soon after this frightful occurrence a gentleman with whom our adventurer was acquainted, and who lived not far off, came riding up and a trade of horses was made, also a part of the load was left, which enabled our emigrants to resume their hazardous journey, which was yet to be attended with many obstacles ere they reached its end—obstacles of such a painful and trying nature that if they could have been foreseen, it is certain our travelers, instead of attempting to go forward, would have turned their faces about and adopted some other means of coming west.

But they persevered in their efforts, until they reached a point near Richmond, Ind., and then learning that the roads were still worse further west, they concluded to return to Cincinnati, take a steamer and come as far as practicable by water, which was done. Before arriving at Cincinnati, however, all or most of the children broke out with the measles. Their situation was now bad in the extreme, yet would have been much worse were it not that kind and Christian friends were at hand and ready and willing as far as they could, to sweeten the cup of sorrow. The mother of those sick children had a lady cousin, the wife of David K. Cady, living in the city, who, upon learning of the condition of things, immediately went to work and prepared an upper room of his store, where they might remain until means of getting away could be had; their dwelling house would have been thrown open if it were not that their own children would have been exposed to the contagion. As soon as possible a passage to St. Louis on a steamer was secured. At first two staterooms were allowed to be occupied, but when the boat reached Louisville it became so crowded with passengers that one of the rooms had to be given up, which made the trip very unpleasant. On arriving at St. Louis, our pioneer family with their household goods and teams were transferred to another boat which was ready to leave for Peru, one of the towns situated on the Illinois river. On reaching this point the horses were again harnessed and attached to the wagon, and soon moving northward. The parents full of sorrow and anxiety on account of the condition of their youngest child, whose appearance plainly indicated that death would very soon take from them all that was mortal of their loved one. They were not mistaken, nor were their fears groundless, for on the last day of their long and weary journey, about twenty miles from the home of the child's grandparents, it was conveyed to a brighter home than earth can ever furnish, and its little body was sorrowfully buried out of sight the next day after their arrival at the residence of George W. Clingman, near Cedarville, Stephenson Co., Ill. After spending some days among kind and sympathetic friends and relatives they were again on the road and a half day's travel brought them to their future home and farm located in the town of Clarno, Green county, where the subject of this sketch, now in the eightieth year of his age, still lives, with his youngest daughter, Mrs. A. E. Anderson, and family. At one time he owned nearly a half section of land which has been disposed of in various ways, with the exception of forty acres which is nicely situated, of excellent quality of soil, well timbered, and free from any encumbrance. He owes not a dime that he is aware of, never was sued, and never sued any one, and says that were it in his power he would abolish all law for the collection of debts. Politically, he is a green-backer and anti-monopolist, and is happy to know that the late decision of the Supreme Court of the United States sustains him in his views of the money question. He has held different offices of trust and honor in the county and township where he lives; was a member of the convention which framed the ratified constitution of the State. For a period of several years he has taken no active part in politics further than to cast his ballot, which he holds to be a duty. It can scarcely be said of him that he is a member of any religious denomination, true that more than forty years ago he joined a small society of the New Church, or better known by the name of Swedenborgians, in ("Chillicothe, Ohio; but since coming to this State he has met but few of the same faith. In his isolation and seclusion, he claims that the theological and philosophical teachings of the Swedish scribe have done much to reconcile him to his lot and strengthen him to bear the misfortunes and ills of life. He still retains to a remarkable degree, his eyesight, and reads and writes without the aid of glasses; his hearing is quite defective, otherwise he is very sound and vigorous for one of his age, and bids fair to live many more years. He and his wife have four children living—Washington O, living at Washington, Iowa; Charles, who resides in Monroe, of this county; Mary Gorham, living at Winnebago, Ill., and Annie E. Anderson, of Clarno.

JAMES BIGGS.

James Biggs was born in 1799, in what was then the Northwest Territory, now the State of Ohio. He was married in what was at that time Delaware Co., Ohio, to Mary McDonald. Of this marriage there were three children born. He was married the second time, after the death of his first wife, to Angeline Robinson. This event took place Dec. 8, 1833, in Milford, Union Co., Ohio. The next spring they moved to Iowa Co., Wis., settling first at Wiota and in June, 1834, moving to what is now the town of Adams, in Green county, where Mr. Biggs died, June 27, 1870. He had five children by the second marriage, all of whom, together with Mrs. Biggs, are now (1884) living. Mr. Biggs was postmaster twenty-three years at Walnut Springs, in the town of Adams. He finally resigned and the office was discontinued.

Mr. Biggs during all his residence in Green county was a farmer. He was a member of the second constitutional convention, but took no important part in the proceedings of that body, but nevertheless ranked among its most worthy and intelligent members. He was a gentleman of fine culture and first class abilities, well read, of large and varied frontier experience, a sound adviser, and steadfast friend. Ill health alone prevented his taking a conspicuous position.

BIOGRAPHICAL.THOMAS S. BOWEN.

(From the Monroe Sentinel, Oct. 31, 1883.)

Thomas S. Bowen, a well to do farmer, died at his residence in the town of Clarno Oct. 20, 1883, after a lingering sickness, which confined him to his bed for two years and six months. He was gradually passing away during this long length of time. He was born in Vermont, Bennington county, May 1, 1808. He came to this State in 1836, four years after the close of the Black Hawk War. He selected a farm in Clarno, on the line which divides this State from Illinois. There were but six houses in the township. They were built of logs, the chimneys of sticks and mud. There were no roads except Indian trails. God gave him sufficient length of days to see railroads take the place of those trails, and his adopted State of Wisconsin emerge from an Indian hunting ground to take high rank as an agricultural State. When the things of this world were fading before him, he had the pleasure of knowing he had done his share of this work of improvement. For integrity and probity he stood without a rival, and was as fixed in his principals as the everlasting hills. He was noted for his honesty in his business relations. Miss Bingham, in her History of Green County, relates the following incident:

“Corn was everywhere so scarce that winter [1842—43] that men came to Green county from a hundred miles away to buy, and many cattle died of starvation. After a time, only three men in the county had corn to sell. They sold for twenty-five cents a bushel; but one of them, a very sanctimonious man, said, ‘Let us charge fifty cents.’ ‘No,’ said one of the others, lengthening his sentence with strong Anglo-Saxon expletives, ‘that may do for you, but as for me, I have a soul to save, and shall charge only twenty-five cents.’ Speculators wanted to buy all this farmer’s corn, but, as the grateful customers of Thomas Bowen still remember, he refused to sell to any one more than one load at a time.”

Mr. Bowen was conscientiously an honest and honorable man, and held many offices of trust. He was elected State senator for 1852—53. The second year of his term he was called home on account of his wife’s illness. She died in April of that year. He was left with a family of eight children. Seven years later he married his second wife, who now survives, and by whom he had two children. He was an indomitable worker. In 1866, finding his health was failing, he left his farm to his sons to manage, and removed to Monroe, where he resided twelve years, then went back to his farm. He is now buried beneath its sods. He leaves a wife and nine children to mourn his loss, besides many acquaintances, who extend their sympathy to his family.

WALTER S. WESCOTT.

Walter S. Wescott came to Green county in 1843. He was born in Wetherfield, Wyoming Co., N. Y. His parents, John and Eunice (Reed) Wescott, were natives of the same State, and are both now deceased, and buried in Monroe. Walter S. Wescott first settled in the town of York, where he owned a farm. He afterwards removed to the town of Adams, and in 1864, to the farm he now occupies on section 26, of Monroe. It contains 480 acres. He also owns other land in this county, and an extensive cattle ranch in Nebraska, where he spends the greater part of the time in looking after his interests there. His family resides upon the farm in this county. Mrs. Wescott was formerly Thankful B. Cleveland, daughter of James Y. and Edith C. Cleveland, well known citizens of Green county. James Y. Cleveland is deceased, but his widow is living in Monroe with her son, H. G. Cleveland. Mr. and Mrs. Wescott have three children—Ida M., who is now living, at home; Eva M., wife of Charles D. Bragg; and John J., who resides at home. Mr. Wescott is, politically, a republican, and has held various offices of honor and trust. He was elected to the assembly in 1859 and again in 1862. In 1863 he was elected to the office of State senator. He has taken an active interest in public affairs in the county, and is a useful and highly respected citizen.

HENRY ADAMS.

Henry Adams, a pioneer of Green county, was born in Bedford Co., Penn., April 30, 1811. He was married to Sarah Mills, a native of the same county, born Dec. 13, 1813. After marriage they remained in Bedford county a few years, then removed to Ohio and settled in Coshocton county, where they lived until 1845. In that year they came to Wisconsin. He entered a farm of 160 acres in what is now the town of Mount Pleasant. He was a man of good education and ability and soon became prominent in public affairs. He was a member of the Territorial legislature. After the organization of the town, he filled offices of trust in the town. In 1866 he was elected to represent his district in the State Senate, and re-elected in 1867. He improved a good farm in Mount Pleasant and lived there until 1868, then sold and went to Hardin Co., Iowa. He afterwards returned to Green county and settled in Monroe, where he resided until the time of his death, July 13, 1871. Mrs. Adams now lives in Nebraska. Ten children were born to them, eight of whom are now living.

ORRIN BACON.

Orrin Bacon, proprietor of the Monticello Mills, is a native of the Bay State, born at Barnstable, Oct. 4, 1822. When he was twelve years old his parents removed to New York and settled in Monroe county, where his father purchased a farm. Here he spent his youth, obtaining his education in the district school.

He remained with his parents until 1843. In that year he came to the Territory of Wisconsin and settled in Rock county, where he purchased a half section of land near Janesville. He engaged largely in raising grain and stock, His health failing, he returned east and remained there until 1854. He then came back and bought the mill property at Monticello of Mathias Marty, and immediately commence building the present mill. Since that time he has continued to reside in Monticello, where he has a fine residence on the south side of the river. Mr. Bacon has been twice married. His first wife was Mary A. Flegler, who was born in Pleasant Valley, Dutchess Co., N. Y., and died Dec. 17, 1871, leaving two children—Emily and Edgar O. He was again married. May 20, 1873, to Alda M., daughter of T. Z. and Lucia W. Buck. They have one child—Sturgis C. Mr. Bacon represented the first assembly: district of Green county in the legislature in 1871. He was elected to the State Senate in 1872 and 1873.

JOSEPH B. TREAT.

J. B. Treat was born in Penobscot Co., Maine, Dec. 30, 1836. He is a son of Nathaniel and Mary (Parker) Treat. He received an academic education in his native State, and in 1860, removed to this county and engaged in the mercantile business. He was elected to the State Senate from 1875 to 1879. In January, 1859, he was married to Priscilla Gould, daughter of N. Gould, a native of Lisbon, Maine. The result of this union was two sons—Charles, a graduate of West Point, in the "Class of 1882," and Harry W.

JOHN W BLACKSTONE, of Shullsburg, Lafayette Co., Wis., was born at White Oak Springs, Dec. 22, 1835. He was county judge from 1862 to 1868, and was district attorney from 1873 to 1875. He was elected to the assembly in 1878, and State senator in 1879. He represented the 12th senatorial district, composed of Lafayette and Green counties, for the years 1880 and 1881. He is a graduate of Platteville Academy. He entered Beloit College in 1855, and at the middle of the sophomore year went to Brown University, Providence, R. I., where he remained one year taking special studies. Returning home in 1857, he began the study of law in the office of John K. Williams, of Shullsburg, Wis., and entered into partnership with him after two years of study. The partnership continued two years, at the end of which time, he was elected county judge of Lafayette county, serving for four years. He was re-elected, serving from 1862 to 1868. Mr. Blackstone was married June 20, 1861, to Ellen E. Hardy, of Platteville, Wis., by whom he has four children, two boys and two girls. After leaving the Senate in 1881, he entered the United States pension office, at Washington, and was soon detailed as a special examiner, in which service he remained two and one-half years. Resigning his clerkship in the pension office, he began the practice of law in Shullsburg, Wis., October 1883. He now resides there, engaged in farming, mining, and the practice of law.

O. J. WHITE.

O. J. White has been a resident of Green county since 1835. He was born in Connecticut, March 26, 1814, and is a son of Obadiah and Electa (Phelps) White. The former is buried in Vincennes, Ind., the latter in Richland Co., Wis. O. J. White left his native State when five years old, and went to Franklin, Delaware Co., N. Y., where he remained four years, then went to Crawford Co., Ill, and from thence to Danville, Vermilion county, in the same State, after which he came to Green Co., Wis. and settled on section 30, Clarno township, where he resided till 1844. He then moved to his present home, on section 31, of which he owns the east half of the northwest quarter, and the west half of the northeast quarter. He has altogether, 392 acres, and one of the finest farms in the county with substantial and elegant improvements. Mr. White was married in 1844 to Sarah A. Fisher of Stephenson Co., Ill., daughter of John and Mary (Wilt) Fisher, who died in 1878, and is buried at Rock Grove, Stephenson Co., Ill. They had three sons—Francis F., Eugene A. and Joseph W. Mr. White is a republican and has been prominent in political affairs of the town and county. He was elected to the legislature in 1860, and served one term; was a member of the town board several terms, in former years, and was chairman of the board in 1881. Mr. White's son, Joseph W., carries on his father's farm. He was married Nov. 28, 1879, to Villa C. Schrack, of Orangeville, Stephenson Co., Ill. They have one child—Clarence J.

DAVID DUNWIDDIE.

David Dunwiddie of Brodhead, is one of five brothers, who settled early in Green county, several of whom still survive and are prominently known as representative citizens. The brothers of Mr. Dunwiddie are Isaac (deceased), Jude Brooks Dunwiddie, Hiram (deceased) and Daniel a resident of the town of Spring Grove. The subject of this sketch was born in Green Co., Ohio, in 1823, and was reared to agricultural pursuits. He came to this county in 1845 locating near Juda. He also took up land in the town of Decatur. He resided for many years on his farm and became prominently known as a successful farmer and stock raiser. In 1873 he removed to Monroe and engaged in merchandising, which he continued two years. In 1875 he came to Brodhead, and engaged in the live stock business. He is now doing an extensive business in the firm name of Dunwiddie & Son. He has held a number of official positions. He was a member of the legislature of Wisconsin during the sessions of 1865 and 1867. His wife was formerly Cynthia Mitchell, who has also resided in the county since 1845, her parents coming two years later. Mr. and Mrs. Dunwiddie have five children—Benjamin F., of Janesville; Alice, wife of Joseph Humphrey; Isaac Foster, who is associated with his father in business; Flora, and Laura, wife of T. W. Golden, clerk of the court of Green county.

MARSHAL H PENGRA.

Marshal H. Pengra was born in Darien, Genesee Co., N. Y., Jan. 18, 1819. He is a son of Moses B. and Sarah (Johns) Pengra. The father is a native of Bennington, Vt., born March, 1797. The mother is a native of Wales, born Jan. 11, 1799. Her parents emigrated to the United States in 1801, and located in Genesee Co., N. Y., where she was reared to womanhood. She was married March 27, 1818, rearing a family of five children—Marshal H., being the eldest. The father died Oct. 1, 1835, and the mother in 1848. On the death of his father, Marshal H. took charge of the family and removed to Erie Co., Penn., where he was married April 16, 1840, to Elvira Lyon, born in Franklin Co., Mass., Oct. 23, 1819. Mr. Pengra lived in Pennsylvania, until the spring of 1844, when he removed to Rockford, Ill. In 1845 he removed to this county, and settled on the west half of the west half of section 23, where he has since resided. Coming to the county in limited circumstances he had to put up with all the trials and hardships of pioneer life; but by hard labor and industry he has accumulated a nice property. His farm contains 276 acres. He has been largely identified with the political history of the county. Until he came to Green county he had been acting with the democrats, but since the organization of the republican party he has acted with that party. He was elected a member of the General Assembly in 1871, and re-elected in 1872. He was also elected a member of the board of county commissioners, serving one term. he has always taken an active part in town affairs, serving as clerk twelve years, chairman of the board eight terms; assessor and justice of the peace. Mr. and Mrs. Pengra have raised a family of six children—Marshal P., Delia E., Winfield S., Mary R., Moses B. and Charles F.

JOHN LUCHSINGER.

John Luchsinger, county treasurer, was born in Canton Glarus, Switzerland, June 29, 1839. In March, 1845, his parents emigrated to America, settling for a short time at Syracuse N. Y. The fall of the same year they removed to Philadelphia, where John received his early education in Jefferson Grammar School. He, with his parents, came to Wisconsin and located at New Glarus, this county, in 1856. In 1872 he was elected to the State legislature, and was re-elected in 1875, 1876 and 1877, serving with honor to himself and satisfaction to his constituency. He has been a member of the county board for a number of years and was chairman of that body in 1879. Was admitted to the bar in 1884. He is at present treasurer of Green county. In 1868 he was married at New Glarus to Elsbeth Kundert, by whom he has five sons and two daughters—John, Henry E., Samuel C., Thomas W., B. Frank, Elsbeth and Barbara. Mr. Luchsinger has always taken an interest in educational matters and is at present a member of the board of education. He is a man of more than ordinary ability, and is the author of some excellent articles on the dairy business and of the history of the Swiss colony of New Glarus. He is a member of the Swiss Reformed Church.

CHARLES R DENISTON.

Charles R. Deniston, now a resident of Clarno, was born in that town July 31, 1835, being the first white male child born in Green county. His father, John W. Deniston, settled in Clarno with his family in the fall of 1833. John Deniston was a native of Ohio, born in 1800. His parents died when he was a child and he went to Missouri where, when a young man, he was married to Ann M. Van Zant, a native of that State. He came to Green county in company with his father-in-law, Abner Van Zant. They settled on the same piece of land and were in partnership until the death of Mr. Van Zant in February, 1847. They built a grist mill in Clarno in 1835, the first mill built in that town. The two families settled in Cadiz in 1846, where John W. Deniston died March 23, 1848. His widow lives in Nebraska with her youngest son, William R. John Deniston had seven children, five of whom are living. Charles R. Deniston was a resident of the town of Cadiz, from 1846 to 1884, when he returned to Clarno. He has been twice married.

His first wife was Susan Coryell, who died in March, 1873. His present wife was Hattie M. Bramhall, a native of New York. There were three children by the first union, and by the latter, two. Mr. Deniston has been town clerk, assessor, postmaster, chairman of the town board and member of the assembly, serving in the latter capacity in 1874 and 1875.

JOHN BOLANDER.

John Bolander, president of the Citizens Bank of Monroe, Wis., was born in Union, now Snyder Co., Penn., March 5, 1837. He was a son of John and Catharine (Stees) Bolander, natives of the same county. In 1840 his father with the family emigrated to Stephenson Co., Ill. His father was a life long member of the German Reformed Church, and his mother of the Lutheran. He was one of a family of twelve children, ten of whom lived to an adult age. His father was a man of more than ordinary ability, and had a large circle of friends. John, the subject of this sketch, was three years old when his parents settled in Stephenson county, where he was brought up and educated. When nineteen years old he was employed as clerk by David Witmer at Rock Grove. Two years later he came to Juda where the stock had been removed. In 1863 he engaged in the grocery business in Monroe. In 1865 the firm was changed to Bolander & Ball, and continued until 1867; from that time up to 1873, J. Bolander, then the firm was changed to J. Bolander & Co., and also changed the business to dry goods. Mr. Bolander is among the oldest business men in the city. In 1861, he was married to Sarah E. Hosier a native of Ohio. By this union there were four children—Kittie, Frederick, Charles and Edna. Mr. Bolander is a staunch republican and was a member of the county board for ten years, and four years chairman. He was in 1882 elected to the general assembly, re-elected in 1883.

FRANKLIN MITCHELL.

Franklin Mitchell lives upon section 6, land purchased by his father, Hon. Abner Mitchell, who came here in 1847, accompanied by his wife and five children, of whom Franklin was the eldest. Five other children had preceded them in coming to Green county. James Mitchell, the father of Abner and grandfather of Franklin Mitchell, was a commissioned officer in the American army during the Revolutionary War. After the Revolution he served as a volunteer, without pay, in a campaign against the "Logan" Indians, of whom, in one engagement, as a sharp shooter, he was credited with having sent six to their "happy hunting ground." The five sons and daughters of Abner Mitchell who preceded him in this county were—Joseph, Cynthia, Jesse, Benjamin and Washington. Joseph was a tailor, and came in 1846 to Monroe. He afterwards lived in Juda, where he died in 1875. Cynthia came with Joseph, and is now the wife of David Dunwiddie, of Brodhead. Jesse, one of the pioneers of Sylvester, came in 1836. Benjamin settled in Sylvester in 1837, and Washington, in Decatur, in 1845. The five children who came here with their parents were—Franklin, Louisa, Naomi, Ralph and Judson. Franklin remained with his parents; Louisa was married to J. C. Chadwick, of Juda; Naomi was married to George Lyman, and died in Sylvester in 1881. Ralph settled in Juda. Judson enlisted in the 22d Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry and joined Sherman's army. He was captured at Bentonville and confined at Libby prison a short time, then exchanged, rejoined his regiment and was in line at the grand review at Washington in June, 1865. His regiment was the first to enter Atlanta and raise the "flag of the Union." Hon. Abner Mitchell was one of the prominent men of Green county. He was for many years justice of the peace, and was always a peace maker in law, and in the neighborhood. Acting in the capacity of magistrate, he would state both sides of the case, and labor for a settlement whenever possible, throwing in his costs to facilitate it. He represented Green county in the State legislature in 1854. He died Oct. 8, 1874, that day being his eighty fourth birthday. His wife died in August, 1863. Franklin Mitchell, in 1858, removed to section 31, of the town of Decatur, where he had purchased government land in 1848. He was married Oct. 6, 1857, to Jane McVean, a native of Fulton Co, N. Y, and daughter of one of the early settlers of Newark, Rock Co., Wis. Mr. and Mrs. Mitchell have four children—Edward, born in September, 1858; Abner, born in November, 1860; Elizabeth, born in February, 1863, and Louisa, born in February, 1868, all of whom are living with their parents. Mr. Mitchell resides upon the homestead farm formerly owned by his father, where he has a fine residence. He still owns and works all but forty acres of his Decatur farm. He represented his county in the State legislature of 1877—8—9, and has served as president and vice-president of the Green County Agricultural Society.

F. R. MELVIN.

F. R. Melvin was born in the State of Ohio, July 23, 1832. He came to Green county with his parents in 1851, and has since been a resident of this county. May 20, 1861, he enlisted. in company D, 2d Wisconsin regiment, Volunteer Infantry, and remained in the service until the following August, when he was discharged on account of physical disability. Filled with a love of country, having in a measure regained his health, he enlisted a second time in company K, 24th regiment, New York Volunteers. At the Second Battle of Bull Run he had both arms pierced with bullets, and on account of consequent disability, was again discharged in November, 1862. In 1870 he was elected treasurer of Green county, which office he held six years. In 1879 he represented his district in the assembly. He is a Royal Arch Mason, a good citizen, a trusty friend, and an efficient officer whenever called upon to perform any public duty. Politically he belongs to the republican party.

EPHRAIM BOWEN

Ephraim Bowen, a prominent and representative man of Green county, is a native of Evans, Erie Co., N. Y., and was born Jan. 14, 1824. His parents were Pardon and Maria (Marvin) Bowen. His father was a native of Rhode Island, and cleared a farm on the "Holland Purchase," in western New York, where he reared a large family. Ephraim Bowen lost his mother when he was eight years old, and was bereft of his father at the age of fifteen. He managed the farm for one year after his father's death, and then engaged as a farm hand for three years; working the two first years for $10.50, and the third year for $11 per month. At the expiration of this time he spent one year traveling as a dealer in patent rights, receiving for his services $18 per month. Having a desire for mercantile life, at the age of twenty years, with a capital of $300, he came to Wisconsin and located in the town of Exeter, in this county, where he engaged as clerk in a store at $15 per month. Subsequently he became a partner in the business, and after six years of successful trade, found himself in the possession of $3,000. With this sum he removed to Albany in 1853, erected a building and established himself in the mercantile and produce business, and also engaged to a considerable extent in real estate operations. At that point he conducted his business successfully until 1867, when he purchased, at Green Bay, 2,000 acres of pine land in connection with a mill, and conducted a successful lumber trade for a number of years, and added largely to his already ample fortune. Subsequently he was largely instrumental in establishing the First National Bank of Brodhead, a full history of which appears elsewhere in this volume. Of this institution he was president and largest stock-holder. He also erected a fine residence, surrounded it with comforts and luxuries, and now lives in the enjoyment of the fruits of a successful and honorable business life. As a business man Mr. Bowen possessed remarkable financial ability, and he is widely known for his shrewdness, cautiousness, and for his decided, vigorous and confident action. In political affairs he holds decided views, and though an earnest worker, has no desire for official honors. He was formerly a whig, but is now a republican. Mr. Bowen was married June 8, 1853, to Mary Ann Pearsons, of Sheldon, Wyoming Co., N. Y. Mrs. Bowen has contributed largely to her husband's success in business, and is a lady of culture and superior intelligence. They have had three children, two daughters and one son. The eldest, Ella Amanda, died in September, 1864, at the age of ten years. The two living are Jennie M. and Myron P.

WISCONSIN TERRITORIAL DELEGATES AND MEMBERS OF CONGRESS WHO HAVE REPRESENTED GREEN COUNTY.

The act of Congress approved April 20, 1836, organizing the Territory of Wisconsin, conferred upon the people the right to be represented in the National Congress by one delegate, to be chosen by the votes of the qualified electors of the Territory. Under this authority there were elected the following

WISCONSIN TERRITORIAL DELEGATES.

George W. Jones, elected Oct. 10, 1836; James D. Doty, elected Sept. 10, 1838; James D. Doty, elected Aug. 5, 1840;* Henry Dodge, elected Sept. 27, 1841; Henry Dodge, elected Sept. 25, 1843; Morgan L. Martin, elected Sept. 22, 1845; John H. Tweedy, elected Sept. 6, 1847.

GEORGE W JONES

was born in Vincennes, Ind., and graduated at Transylvania University, Kentucky, in 1825. He was bred to the law but ill-health prevented him from practicing. He was clerk of the United States district court, in Missouri, in 1826 and served as an aid-de-camp to Henry Dodge in the Black Hawk War. He was chosen colonel of militia the same year (1832), and subsequently major-general. He was at one time judge of the county court of Grant county. In 1835, as we have seen, he was elected a delegate to Congress from the Territory of Michigan, and served two years. In 1839, he was appointed by President Van Buren surveyor-general of the northwest. He was removed for political considerations in 1841, but was reappointed by President Polk and remained in that office until 1849. In 1848, he was elected a United States senator from the State of Iowa for six years, and re-elected in 1852 for the same length of time;—officiating as chairman of the committees on Pensions and on Enrolled Bills, and as a member of the committee on Territories. At the conclusion of his last term, he was appointed by President Buchanan minister to New Grenada. In 1861, he was charged with disloyalty and imprisoned in Fort Warren.

HENRY DODGE.

Foremost among the names enrolled in the pages of the early history of Wisconsin, is that of Henry Dodge. Born Oct. 12, 1782, at Vincennes, in the present State of Indiana, he removed to that portion of Louisiana Territory afterward set apart as Missouri, where, in 1808, he became sheriff of Cape Girardeau county. Early in 1812, he entered the military service as captain of a mounted rifle company; later the same year, he was commissioned a major of Louisiana militia, and subsequently a lieutenant colonel. During the war he was employed in many active duties on the western frontier, the most important of which was in 1814, when he commanded an expedition up the Missouri river, for the purpose of holding in check the Indian tribes of that region, and ascertaining their condition and numbers. He took a prominent part in the affairs of Missouri until 1827, when he removed to the present limits of Wisconsin, and engaged in the business of lead mining near the present location of Dodgeville, where he is said to have erected the first smelting furnace north of the Illinois line.

When, in the summer of that year, the miners were obliged by the outbreak of the Winnebago Indians to collect in Galena for safety, Dodge was chosen commander of a corps of mounted men, organized for the defense of the place. On the breaking out of the Black Hawk War in 1832, he was chosen commander of the several companies of mounted volunteers enrolled in the mining settlements, holding a commission as colonel from the governor of Michigan Territory. He displayed remarkable energy and efficiency in maintaining the defense of the exposed mining district until sufficient forces were gathered from the south and east to take the offensive, making two expeditions in the face of the enemy, to Rock river, to communicate with Gen. Atkinson, commander of the approaching forces, and one to the Four Lakes to quiet the Winnebago's. On the 16th of June, with twenty-eight men, he pursued a party of seventeen of the hostile Sacs, from the vicinity of Fort Hamilton, now Wiota, Lafayette county, until they were compelled to come to stand, selecting for that purpose a strong position in a bend of the Pecatonica. Here posting a few scouts and leaving another detail with the horses, Col. Dodge, at the head of the main body, twenty-one strong, advanced to attack them, and received their fire from their hiding place at pistol-shot range, at which three men fell. Instantly a charge was ordered, and executed in so impetuous a manner that not one of the savages escaped to tell the tale.

Col. Dodge with his mounted battalion soon afterward joined the army of Gen. Atkinson at Lake Koshkonong, and greatly distinguished himself in the pursuit and destruction of Black Hawk's forces, which followed leading the charges in the engagements at Wisconsin Heights and Bad Ax. In March, 1833, when the first United States Dragoons was organized, he was made its colonel, and, in 1835, led his command on an expedition to the Rocky mountains. He resigned his commission, upon the organization of Wisconsin Territory, to accept the office of governor thereof and superintendent of Indian affairs by appointment from President Jackson, dated April 30, 1836. He occupied that position until superseded by James D. Doty, in September, 1841, on account of a political change in the administration. At the election of that year he was chosen delegate in Congress, and was re-elected in 1843, continuing in that office until re-appointed governor by President Polk, April 8, 1845, which position he held until the admission of Wisconsin as a State in 1848, being, therefore, its first and last Territorial executive, he was elected one of the two first senators in Congress from the new State, and, his term expiring in 1851, he was re-elected for six year's. At the end of his senatorial career, in 1857, he retired from public life, and passed the remainder of his days partly at Mineral Point, and partly at the home of his son, Augustus C. Dodge, in Burlington, Iowa, where his death occurred June 19, 1867.

MORGAN L. MARTIN.

Morgan L. Martin was one of the most conspicuous and distinguished among that band of pioneer settlers who early gave a national reputation to Wisconsin. He was born in Martinsburg, Lewis Co., N. Y., March 31, 1805, and graduated at Union College, New York, in 1824, following the same by a thorough legal education. In 1826, he removed to Detroit, Mich., and the next year settled at Green Bay, where he has ever since resided.

In 1831, he was elected a member of the legislative council of Michigan, serving until 1835. In 1838, he was elected to the Territorial council of Wisconsin, and served continuously through all sessions to 1844. In 1845, he was elected as Territorial delegate to Congress for two years. On the failure of the first constitution to be ratified by popular vote in 1846, he was elected a member of the constitutional convention in 1847, and was chosen president of that body. As he, in this position, appointed all committees in connection with other duties, his record is less marked in some respects than that of some others; and yet the part he took in debate and upon the floor, was in the highest degree creditable, and materially guided the deliberations and conclusions of the convention. His remarks on exemption, internal improvements, banking, public lands, judiciary, boundaries and miscellaneous provisions are especially noticeable for vigor, directness, profound legal learning, personal knowledge of the subject matter of debate, and natural bearing upon the future of the new State. He was especially distinguished in presiding, for uniform dignity and courtesy, and merited, as he received, the highest testimonials of respect from all his associates.

In 1855, he was elected a member of the assembly, and in 1858, to the Senate. In 1861, he was appointed paymaster, United States Army, serving until the suppression of the rebellion in 1865. In 1873, he was again elected to the assembly.

Throughout a public career of great and unusual length, covering much more than the whole period of Wisconsin's local annals, Mr. Martin has borne an eminent and distinguished part, and it is but faint praise to say, as the united testimony of all, both associates and citizens, that it has been one of honor, uprightness and dignity,—reflecting the highest credit not only upon himself but upon those so ably represented. To great natural abilities, he added the matured results of profound research, and a wide range of intellectual culture, enriched by a personal experience which few indeed, even among pioneers, had opportunity to enjoy. Although representing a party, he was never a partisan, and it is a pride to record, was ever more of a Patriot than politician. His military services, although less showy, were in no sense less important than his civil career, even if forgotten, as is the case with so many others who periled health and life in defense of national union. At home among personal acquaintances, no citizen ever stood higher in public estimation, or had warmer friends. His whole career has been above suspicion as above reproach. Old age finds him surrounded by universal respect and reverence for years and wisdom,—the benefactor of multitudes, the friend of all. That he may long survive to witness the maturing work in large part of his own genius and labors, is the earnest hope of all, and especially of those who have enjoyed his more intimate acquaintance.

JOHN H. TWEEDY.

John H. Tweedy was born in Danbury, Conn., Nov. 9, 1814. After a preliminary education, he entered and graduated at Yale College, and adopted law as a profession, in the practice of which he speedily obtained high distinction. As a public man and prominent citizen he has been widely known from the beginning of Territorial government. He located in Milwaukee in October, 1836, and has ever since resided there. In 1841 and 1842, he was elected a member of the Territorial council. In 1846, he was elected to the constitutional convention from Milwaukee county, serving in that body on the committee on the Constitution and Organization of the Legislature, and also took a conspicuous part in the general proceedings. In 1847, he was elected Territorial delegate to Congress, being the last incumbent in that position. After State organization he was the first whig candidate for governor, but as the democratic party was then largely in the majority, he was defeated by Nelson Dewey. In 1853, he served as a member of the assembly. Since that time, Mr. Tweedy has retired from public life, and, unless locally, has taken no special part in political affairs.

During his whole career, Mr. Tweedy has been noted for great and conspicuous abilities, profound learning, sterling integrity and unselfish interest in all enterprises for the promotion of the general welfare. Naturally a student, of retiring disposition and modest merit, he has usually preferred quiet and retirement to publicity and only exercised his great powers of oratory and persuasion, on pressing and important occasions. Wisconsin has had no worthier or more upright citizen.

CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICTS OF WHICH GREEN COUNTY HAS BEEN A PART.

By the constitution adopted when the territory became a State, in 1848, two representatives in Congress were provided for by dividing the State into two congressional districts. The first district was composed of the counties of Milwaukee, Waukesha, Jefferson, Racine, Walworth, Rock and Green. The second district was composed of Washington Sheboygan, Manitowoc, Calumet, Brown, Winnebago, Fond du Lac, Marquette, Sauk, Portage, Columbia, Dodge, Dane, Iowa, Lafayette, Grant, Richland, Crawford, Chippewa, St. Croix and La Pointe. Under this authority, an election was held May 8, 1848, and William Pitt Lynde was elected member of Congress for the first district; Mason C. Darling, of Fond du Lac, for the second district. The people, therefore, then living in Green county, were represented in the 30th Congress by William Pitt Lynde.

In 1849, the number of districts were increased to three. Rock, Green, Lafayette, Grant, Iowa, Dane, Sauk, Adams, Portage, Richland, Crawford, Chippewa, St. Croix and La Pointe counties constituted the second congressional district of Wisconsin.

In 1861, the State was divided into six districts. Green, Lafayette, Iowa, Grant, Crawford, Richland and Sauk counties, were formed into the third congressional district.

By an act of the legislature of Wisconsin, of April 4, 1872, the following counties were formed into the (new) third congressional district: Grant, Iowa, Lafayette, Green, Richland and Crawford.

The State was again re-districted by an act of the legislature. By this act Green county fell again into the third district, composed now of the counties of Dane, Green, Lafayette, Iowa and Grant.

From (and including) the first election for representatives in Congress from Wisconsin, there have been chosen in the several districts in which Green county has fallen, the following was born in Sherburne, Chenango Co., N. Y., Dec. 16, 1817; he graduated at Yale College in 1838, and emigrated to Wisconsin in 1841, settling in Milwaukee the same year. In 1844 he was appointed attorney-general of the Territory of Wisconsin. He also received the appointment in 1845 of United States district attorney of Wisconsin Territory, holding the position until the admission of the State into the Union. In 1848, Mr. Lynde was elected a representative to Congress in the first district of which Green was one of the counties as already noted in this chapter. In 1860 he was elected mayor of Milwaukee. He was a member of the State assembly in 1866 and elected a State senator in 1868. In 1874 he was elected a representative to the 44th Congress, from the fourth congressional district. He is now (1884) a practicing lawyer in Milwaukee.

MEMBERS OF CONGRESS:

WILLIAM PITT LYNDE

was born in the State of Maine in the year 1812. He settled in Wisconsin in 1840. He was clerk of the Territorial council of Wisconsin. He also prepared reports of the old Supreme Court of Wisconsin. He served in Congress as already indicated in this chapter from 1851 to 1855. He died at Platteville, Wis., Feb. 2, 1856.

CADWALLADER C. WASHBURN.*

The Washburn ancestry is traceable back, on both sides, to the early settlement of New England by the Puritans. John Washburn was secretary of the Plymouth colony in England. He came to this country in 1631, and settled in what was then known as the "Eagle's Nest," in

*This sketch of Hon. Cadwallader C. Washburn who, for three successive terms, represented the second congressional district of Wisconsin, of which Green was one of the counties, was prepared by C. W. Butterfield, of Madison, for the Northwest Review largely from a number of memorial addresses on Washburn's life and character (particularly one by David Atwood, of Madison, Wis.) delivered before the Historical Society of that State, July 25, 1882.

Duxbury, Mass. He was a very prominent man in his day; an extensive farmer, and the proprietor of a large iron furnace in Raynham, Mass. He was for many years a representative in the general court. Israel, a son of John Washburn, was a resident of Raynham, served in the Revolutionary War, was a member of the Massachusetts convention that ratified the Constitution of the United States, and was repeatedly chosen to represent his people in the general court—the New England name for legislature in early days, and sometimes used at the present time.

Israel's son and namesake was born in Raynham, Nov. 18, 1784. He moved to Maine in 1806, stopping a brief time in several places, teaching school and following his trade as shipbuilder. In 1809, he purchased a farm and store in Livermore, where he continued in trade till 1829, when he gave up his mercantile pursuits and spent the residue of his years on his farm—"The Norlands." He represented his town in the legislature in 1815, 1816, 1818 and 1819. At this time Maine was a province of Massachusetts. He died Sept. 1, 1876, at the advanced age of ninety-two years.

John Benjamin, who arrived in this country on the ship Lion, in 1632, was a proprietor of Cambridge; but at an early day settled at Watertown, where, in the fifth generation, Samuel Benjamin was born, Feb. 3, 1753. He became the fourth settler in Livermore, in 1783, where he continued to reside until his death, April 14, 1824. He married Tabitha Livermore, of Waltham, Mass., Jan. 16, 1782, and they raised a family of ten children of whom Martha, born Oct. 4, 1792, became the wife of Israel Washburn, second, on the 30th of March, 1812, and died May 6, 1861. Their issue is the celebrated "Washburn family," of seven sons, four of whom have occupied seats in Congress from four different States, while two of these have been governors, and a like number have represented the Nation at foreign courts.

The brothers who have been members of Congress are Israel, from Maine; Elihu B., from Illinois; Cadwallader C., from Wisconsin, and William D., from Minnesota. The two governors were Israel, of Maine, and Cadwallader C., of Wisconsin. The two that have been ministers to foreign countries are Elihu B. and Charles A.

The subject of this sketch—Cadwallader Colden Washburn—was born in Livermore, Maine, April 22, 1818. He was, as a boy, noted for his quiet manners, never in trouble, and liked by every one who knew him. He was observing, studious and persistent. He lived mostly at home until 1835, working on his father's farm—"The Norlands"—and attending the town school. He was apt to learn, fond of reading, and possessed of a retentive memory. He left his parents during the year last mentioned, commencing an independent career of life at the early age of seventeen. The first employment of Cadwallader after leaving home was clerking, sometimes in a store, at other times in the post office, at Hallowell, at that date one of the most considerable trading towns in Maine. While here he enjoyed opportunities for study and observation until late in December, 1838, when he engaged to teach through the winter the principal school in the town of Wiscasset. And here it may be said that the youthful Cadwallader had not only received a good common school education in his native town of Livermore, but afterward attended a private school that had been established there, in which was taught the higher branches of education. He also devoted some time to the study of the classics under the instruction of his uncle, Ruel Washburn. Well grounded in substantial business and moral qualities, with excellent health, he, in accordance with a long-cherished intention, left his native State in the year 1839, to seek a new home in the west. He was now just arrived at the age of twenty-one.

Young Washburn made his first stop at Davenport, then a small village in the then newly organized Territory of Iowa. For three months, he kept a private school, and then took a position on the geological survey of Iowa under David Dale Owen. This survey had been ordered by Congress. Subsequently, he made his residence at Stevenson, near Rock Island, where he entered upon the study of the law, in the office of Joseph B. Wells. He was elected surveyor of the county of Rock Island in 1840. He brought his law studies to a close in 1842, in Stevenson (then become Rock Island), and settled in Mineral Point, Wis., when on the 29th of March of that year, he was admitted to the bar, at a session of the United States district court, at Lancaster, Grant county. He at once opened a law office at Mineral Point, and soon secured the confidence of the people by the promptitude and scrupulous fidelity with which he attended to whatever was entrusted to his care in a business way. He had a successful practice, largely in the line of collections. In August, 1844, he entered into partnership with Cyrus Woodman, and the firm had an extensive and lucrative business. It was here that the foundation was laid that resulted in the accumulation of a large fortune by Mr. Washburn.

The firm of Washburn & Woodman gradually abandoned the law, and engaged largely in the entry of public lands for settlers. The partners also purchased large quantities of pine lands, and mineral and agricultural lands, in their own right. After the State banking law of 1852 went into operation, they established the Mineral Point Bank, which stood the test of all financial reverses, and never suspended specie payment. When its affairs were wound up, every dollar of its liabilities were paid in specie. The partnership was dissolved March 1, 1855, Mr. Woodman retiring from it, and Mr. Washburn assuming the responsibility of its entire business. Leaving, at this point, for some time, further mention of his private affairs, it is here proper to bring before the reader the commencement of Mr. Washburn's career as legislator.

The home of Mr. Washburn was in the 2d congressional district of Wisconsin, comprehending an extended territory. His name, in 1854, was suggested as a candidate of the anti-Nebraska party for Congress in his district; and, at the convention, he received the nomination without any effort on his part or even desire. The result was, he was elected to the 34th Congress. His colleagues were Daniel Wells, Jr., from the first district, and Charles Billingshurst, from the third, there being at that time but three congressional districts in Wisconsin. He was re-elected as a republican in 1857, and again in 1859. After serving six years in Congress, he declined another election, and soon after the expiration of his third term he changed his residence from Mineral Point to La Crosse, Wis., his home at the time of his death.

In entering upon his first term in the National legislature, Mr. Washburn brought into its halls a thorough knowledge of the State he represented, and was instrumental in securing much legislation of value to its people. In the Congress he served as chairman of the committee on Private Land Claims, and as a member of the special committee of thirty-three on the State of the Union. In January, 1861, he introduced a resolution declaring "that the provisions of the constitution" were "ample for the preservation of the Union, and the protection of all the material interests of the country"; that it needed to be obeyed rather than amended; and that the extrication of the country from the difficulties then impending was "to be looked for in efforts to preserve and protect the public property and enforce the laws, rather than in new guarantees for particular interests, or compromises, or concessions to unreasonable demands." In support of this resolution, he closed his remarks by declaring that if the Union was to be dissolved, "whether by peaceable secession or through fire and blood and civil war," there would be left to those who survived it the consolation of knowing that they would be, what they never had been, "inhabitants of a free country." Mr. Washburn was ever true to the cause of liberty, and the slave found in him an able advocate and staunch friend.

In the Civil War which immediately followed his retirement from Congress, Mr. Washburn took an active part. He was commissioned colonel of the 2d Wisconsin Cavalry, Oct. 10, 1861 reported for duty the same day, and was mustered into the United States service Feb. 6, 1862. He left Wisconsin with his regiment March 24, following, and served in the army under Gen. Curtis, in Arkansas, to the next July. Col. Washburn was appointed brigadier-general of United States volunteers on the 16th of that month, and major-general, November 29, thereafter.

Gen. Washburn commanded a cavalry brigade in Arkansas, and also the post of Helena, that State, from July to October, 1862; and of cavalry forces there to November of the same year. His commands for the next twelve months were of a division in the Army of the Tennessee to February, 1863; of a cavalry division in the 13th Corps, to April 9; of cavalry in West Tennessee, to June 8; of two divisions of the 16th Corps, at Hyane's Bluff, Miss., to July 28; of the first division, 13th Army Corps to August 1; of the 13th Corps, to September 15; of the first division, same corps, to October 20; of the same corps to October 23; and of the first division of same corps to December, 1863. Gen. Washburn was in command of the troops at Matagorda Peninsula, Texas, from the last mentioned date to Jan. 13, 1864, and was then on leave of absence to March 29, following. He was under orders from that time to April 23, when he took charge of the district of West Tennessee, continuing there to November. He was then transferred to the command of the district of Vicksburg, where he remained till March 4, 1865. The general then assumed direction of affairs in the district of West Tennessee, continuing there until his resignation, May 25, 1865. Such is the chronological record of his various commands as colonel, brigadier-general and major-general. But before dismissing him as a military commander, it may not be amiss to recount some particulars concerning the capacity and bravery exhibited by him in the army.

At the breaking out of the war, Mr. Washburn raised the regiment of cavalry of which he was commissioned colonel. At the time Gen. Grant made a movement south for the capture of Vicksburg, the colonel had been promoted to major-general, and with 2,000 cavalymen, he dislodged a force prepared to obstruct the progress of the army at the crossing of the Tallahatchie. In February the general conducted an expedition which opened the Yazoo Pass. At the battle of Grand Coteau, La., he, with his command saved the fourth division, under Gen. Burbridge, from annihilation by an overwhelming force of the enemy. On Nov. 29, 1863, Gen. Washburn landed on the coast of Texas with 2,800 men, and compelled the evacuation of Fort Esperanza. This movement gave the Union forces control of the entire coast of Texas, from Matagorda bay to the Rio Grande.

"During the war, in the year 1862," says a Congressional associate of Mr. Washburn,* first met the general in Washington. He had been assigned to duty in the department of the gulf, under Gen. Grant. It was at a time when the cause of the Union seemed to be enveloped in a dark cloud. The most courageous were despondent, and the minds of all were filled with grave doubts as to the future. At such an hour, I shall never forget how refreshing it was to meet such a strong, brave man, fresh from the field of conflict. He inspired all with whom he mingled with new hope and courage, and allowed no one for a moment to doubt the ultimate triumph of our cause. He impressed you, at first, as a man of indomitable will and energy, determined to show the sincerity of his convictions by his deeds, and ready to risk, if need be, everything he possessed, in order that victory might be ours. He remained in the army until he saw his predictions in regard to the ultimate triumph of the Union arms fully verified."

The next year after the return of Gen. Washburn to civil pursuits, he was elected a representative in Congress from the sixth district of Wisconsin, and was re-elected in 1868. In the 40th Congress he served on the committees of Foreign Affairs, and on Expenditures of Public Buildings; and, in the next Congress on the committees of Appropriations, on Private Land Claims, on Causes of the Reduction of American Tonnage, and was chairman of the special committee on the Postal Telegraph. "He did not labor to make himself conspicuous by the frequent sound of his voice, but rather by wise counsel and faithful service to guard the interests of his constituents, and to promote the welfare of the State. He was rarely absent from his post of duty, and seldom, if ever, found recorded upon the wrong side of any of the great questions of the day. He was affable and courteous, frank and generous in his intercourse with his fellow members, and thereby gained a wide and powerful influence, to secure the success of any important measure in which he might become interested. He always guarded with jealous care the rights of the people, and was ever on the alert to secure the passage of such measures as, in his view, would specially promote their welfare."

In the year 1871, at the close of his last term in Congress, he was nominated by the republican convention of Wisconsin for the office of governor, and was elected. He was inaugurated as chief executive of the State on the first Monday in January, 1879. In the year 1873 he was re-nominated for the same office, but was defeated. Gov. Washburn's official career in the gubernatorial chair of Wisconsin was one of marked success. His great executive ability, his energy, his strong practical sense, and his long and successful business experience, gave him much power, and he exercised it in doing good work for the State. "As governor," says one who knew him well, and was a close observer of his official acts, "he assumed no doubtful executive powers, and he was content to do his full duty within the requirements of the Constitution. He treated all offices as public trusts to be administered solely for the public good, and not for his own aggrandizement and cheap glory. He was even greater than the office which he filled, and honored it more than it honored him. His strict impartiality to his friends and enemies, both personal and political, and his almost captious particularity in official business, in matters small as well as great, his rigid scrutiny into the subordinate public service, and his selection of the best only to fill the offices within his own appointment, made him unpopular with those who look only to the profits of political friendships, and expect dishonest rewards to be paid out of the public treasury for political services. From his subordinates he exacted no personal or political loyalty to himself, but only obedience to law and a strict discharge of duty."*

With the close of Gov. Washburn's single term in the executive chair of Wisconsin, ended his official life. Previous to this, a laudable ambition had awakened in him a desire to become a member of the United States Senate. His first candidacy for that office was in 1861, when, at the start, he was the strongest candidate before the State legislature. However, in the end, the choice fell upon Timothy O. Howe, the present postmaster general. Again, in 1869, he was, at the outset, the leading candidate for the same position, but was defeated finally, the majority of the votes of the legislature being given to Matt. H. Carpenter, who became senator. In 1875 he was again brought forward as a candidate; but, as he did not receive the caucus nomination, his friends refused to vote for the regular nominee, and Angus Cameron was elected by their uniting for that purpose with the democratic members in the legislature.

After the expiration of Gov. Washburn's term of office, on the first Monday of January, 1874, he at once directed his entire attention to the management of his private business. In the manufacture of lumber and flour, he accumulated a large portion of an ample fortune. The success of his early investments in pine lands demonstrated his far-seeing sagacity; so, also, those in the water-power at St. Anthony's falls, he becoming the principal owner of the west side power. Here, being interested in the manufacture of flour, he erected, in 1876, an immense mill—the "Big Mill," of Minneapolis, Minn. At 7 o'clock in the evening of May 2, 1878, an explosion occurred in this mill, attended with great loss of property and that of a number of lives. There were fourteen men in the mill at the time, every one of whom perished. The building had first caught fire, and the flames had come in contact with the dust of the mill, which, it is said, mingled with the air, made it of an explosive character; hence the disaster. The destruction was not confined to the "Washburn A"—called, as we have seen, the "Big Mill," it being 100x138 feet on the ground, seven and a half stories high, filled with the most approved machinery, and having forty-one run of stone. Six mills, in all, were destroyed, and five more damaged; among the latter was the "Washburn B," which was badly shaken up. The number of lives lost, in and out of the mills, in Minneapolis, by reason of this fire and explosion, was eighteen; the total loss of property was estimated at nearly $1,000,000.

This terrible and unusual calamity did not have the effect to discourage the indomitable Washburn. He proceeded at once to the work of rebuilding his mills on a still larger scale, and with improved machinery. The massive "A" mill has been described as the largest mill in America, and the most complete one of its size in the world. It is twice the size of the old "A," and covers a ground space of 100x240 feet. Its height is eight stories above the canal. The full capacity of the mill is 3,000 barrels of flour a day. The "B" was built in 1866, is 60x90 feet on the ground; three stories high in front, and five in rear. Its daily capacity is 500 barrels. The "C" ranks next to the "A," covering ground of 95x145 feet; is five stories high; its capacity is 1,250 barrels a day.* Mr. Washburn was the first man in the United States who introduced what is known as the "patent process" in the manufacture of flour, and the "Hungarian roller system." He visited Europe for the purpose of investigating all the improved processes for making flour, determined to secure the very best. His efforts, though attended with much expense and hard labor, were crowned with success. It may be said that Mr. Washburn was the champion miller of the United States. No man in this country was so thoroughly versed in milling, or possessed so complete a knowledge of every detail in the manufacture of flour, as he. Besides the interest already spoken of as engaging his attention, Mr. Washburn was one of the early projectors and builders of the Minneapolis & St. Louis Railroad. He was interested also in a number of other enterprises, requiring skill and energy to manage. Indeed, it may be said that nearly all of his life was full of activity and hard work, indicating large will-power and a capacity for great physical and mental endurance.

The career (and a noble and successful one it was) of Mr. Washburn was now nearing its end. During the year 1880 he frequently complained of indisposition, and of a sense of weariness and lassitude; still, his attention to business and his activity were unabated; but a dreadful malady (Bright's disease) was seizing hold of his powerful frame. On the last day of January 1881, he left Washington for La Crosse, passing the 2d of February at the home of his brother, E. B. Washburn, in Chicago. Here he complained of feeling quite ill; however, he continued his journey, reaching La Crosse next day. In a few hours after his return, he was stricken down with paralysis, the result of the progress of the malady before mentioned, which was tightening its grasp upon its unfortunate victim. He rallied, however, from this first pronounced attack of illness, and, as soon as he was able to travel, he went to the Hot Springs of Arkansas, receiving some apparent benefit while there. In May he went to Europe, hoping the journey would be an aid to his recovery; but he returned in November worse than when he left the United States.

*History Hennepin County, Minn., pp. 391,392, 394, 395.

Mr. Washburn now put himself under the care of an eminent physician of Philadelphia, but with no favorable results. He then went to Atlantic City, in hopes the climate there might prove beneficial to him; but, instead of improving he grew worse. He next tried the waters of the Eureka Springs, in Arkansas. In about two weeks after his arrival there, he began to improve, and soon became hopeful, and even cheerful, under the apparent change for the better. As his health now seemed to be on the mend, he commenced taking up the threads of his business interests, with which, for some time, he had not occupied himself. Everything now came within the grasp of his powerful faculties. He called to him, from their distant homes, his partners, his chief engineer, as well as his business agent, for consultation. Nothing escaped him. But it was the last of gigantic efforts. On April 22, 1882, he did not feel well; and in three days thereafter he went to his meals for the last time. His days were numbered. He gradually failed, and on May 14 he breathed his last.

The remains of the departed were embalmed, and then started, accompanied by sorrowing relatives and sympathizing friends, for their last resting place, in Oakwood Cemetery, La Crosse. They were met, upon their arrival in Chicago, by a committee from Wisconsin, composed of the governor and others of its distinguished citizens. A special train was placed at the disposal of the party by Alexander Mitchell, president of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, and all taken to the last home of the deceased. Besides this, free transportation was tendered by the same liberal hearted railway official to friends from all points in Wisconsin, and from Minneapolis, in Minnesota, who desired to attend the funeral ceremonies. The procession which followed the body to its last rest on May 18, 1882, was a long one, and presented a remarkable scene of love and respect for the departed.

But from Eternity's far shore

Thy spirit will return to join the strife no more.

Rest, statesman, rest!

Thy troubled life is o'er.

Cadwallader C. Washburn was a philanthropist. The gift to the University of Wisconsin of an astronomical observatory, fully supplied with the best apparatus obtainable; to the Dominican Sisters, of his charming suburban villa at Madison, Wis., as a school for girls; of a public library to the city of La Crosse; and of an orphan asylum to the city of Minneapolis, Minn.; all attest the generosity of his nature. Private benefactions, also, were by no means wanting, either in his lifetime or by his will. In view of the many important services rendered by him to education in Wisconsin, the legislature of the State by law made him a life regent of the university, an honor never before conferred upon any of its citizens. That institution in 1873, gave him the degree of doctor of laws, a distinguished mark of respect very worthily bestowed. In his religious views there was no bigotry. He accepted earnestly the fundamental truths of Christianity. He was liberal in his opinions and charitable toward all. His public spirit prompted him to make frequent and valuable contributions to the Historical Society of Wisconsin, of which institution he has been president since Jan. 3, 1878.

In early manhood Mr. Washburn married Jeanette Garr, a most intelligent and estimable young lady; but in a few years she became insane, and for more than thirty years have the family been deprived of her presence and cheering influence. In all this period she has been tenderly cared for. Nothing that money could procure has been omitted to alleviate her terrible malady. The husband in his will made the most ample provision for her future support. Mr. Washburn leaves two daughters, both married; the eldest, to A. W. Kelsey; the youngest, to Charles Payson; late United States minister to Denmark.

was born in Portage Co., Ohio, Oct. 25, 1825. He received a good education at Fremont. He studied law and commenced the practice when twenty-one years of age. He moved to Wisconsin in 1849. For some time he was engaged in the lead and lumbering business. He was for four years district attorney for Portage county, in his adopted State. From 1856 to 1860 was a member of the Wisconsin Senate. In 1860 he was elected to the 37th Congress (1861—3). He died at Madison, Wis., Nov. 26, 1862.

WALTER D. MCINDOE

was born in Scotland March 30, 1819. He emigrated to New York city in his fifteenth year. He was clerk in a large mercantile house, He followed the same pursuit in Charleston, S. C., and in St. Louis, Mo. He subsequently settled in Wisconsin and engaged in the lumber business. He served in the Wisconsin legislature in 1850, 1854 and 1855. He was a Presidential elector in 1856 and 1860, and was elected to Congress, as before noted, in place of Luther Hanchett, deceased. He was re-elected to 38th Congress and also to the 39th—representing the sixth congressional district during these three terms.

was born in Crawford Co., Ill., Sept. 27, 1823. He received a common school education and moved to Wisconsin Territory in 1842. He spent five years in the lead-mining business and served in the Mexican war as a private soldier,—during which time he occasionally read law, and at the end of the war he began to practice the legal profession. In 1850, he was elected district attorney in Iowa county, and served four years. In 1854, he was elected to the State Senate, and served one term, of two years. In 1855, he was appointed adjutant-general of the State, and again in 1857. He was elected to the State legislature in 1860, re-elected in 1861, and chosen speaker. In 1861 and 1862, Mr. Cobb served as a volunteer—being colonel of the 5th Wisconsin regiment. He was elected, as before stated in this chapter. to the 38th Congress (1863-65), from the third congressional district, of which district, Green was one of the counties, and was re-elected for three successive terms,—closing his career in Congress in 1871. During the recess of Congress, he was commissioned a second time, colonel. He raised the 43d Wisconsin regiment and commanded it until July, 1865. He was brevetted for gallant services at Williamsburg, Golding's Farm and Antietam. He afterward moved to Nebraska, where he was elected to the Supreme bench.

JOEL ALLEN BARBER.

Joel Allen Barber, was the son of Joel and Aseneth (Melvin) Barber, and was born in Georgia, Franklin Co., Vt., Jan. 17, 1809. His father was from England, and his mother was of Welsh descent. Her father was a captain in the Revolutionary army, and served till the close of the war. J. Allen Barber worked on a farm till he was eighteen years of age, when he entered the Georgia Academy, and fitted for college, and entered the University of Vermont in 1829, where he remained two and a half years. He then began the study of the law with Hon. George P. Marsh, of Burlington. He taught school two years in Maryland, and was admitted to the bar in 1834, in Prince George's county, in that State. He returned to Vermont, and commenced the practice of his profession at Fairfield, where he remained till 1837, and in September of that year, he located at Lancaster, Wis., which village has ever since been his place of residence, and where he has constantly practiced his profession for nearly forty-two years, at times mingling land operations with his practice. He is deemed a sound and able lawyer, holding a high place as a criminal lawyer, and is an honor to the profession.

A large portion of the time, since he has been a resident of Wisconsin, Mr. Barber has held some official position. He has been many years member of the county board of supervisors, and was five years its chairman; was four years county clerk, and district attorney three terms. In 1846, he was a representative from Grant county, in the constitutional convention, and served on the committee on the Organization and Functions of the Judiciary. He was an able, industrious member, and performed valuable service in the convention. He was a member of the assembly, in the years 1852, 1853, 1863 and 1864. In the assembly of 1863, he was speaker of that body. He was a member of the State Senate, in the years 1856 and 1857. He was ever an able, watchful and faithful member of the legislature. He was two terms a member of Congress, commencing on the 4th of March, 1871. In the House, he served on the committees for War Claims and on the Revision of the Statutes. He was an industrious and influential member of Congress; not a frequent speaker, but pointed and clear when he did address the House.

Mr. Barber was a whig, until the organization of the republican party, when he united with it, and has been a member of that party ever since.

In 1842, he was married to Helen Van Vleck, of Jamestown, in Grant county. Mrs. Barber died in about one year after marriage; and in 1847, he was again married to Elizabeth Banfill, of Lancaster. They have four children living, two sons and two daughters.

HENRY S. MAGOON

was born in the town of Monticello, Lafayette Co., Wis., Jan. 31, 1832. He entered the Rock River Seminary at Mount Morris, Ill., in 1848, and there remained most of the time until June, 1851, devoted to classical and other studies. In 1851, he entered the Western Military College at Drennon, Ky., where he graduated in 1853. He afterward attended the Montrose Law School at Frankfort, Ky., and in 1855, was appointed Professor of ancient languages in Nashville University, Tennessee. Here he remained till 1857, when, resigning, he returned to Wisconsin and began the practice of the law. He was elected a district attorney in Lafayette county, in 1858, and was a member of the State Senate in 1871 and 1872. He was the first native of Wisconsin elected to the State Senate or to Congress. He was elected, as already intimated, to the 44th Congress from the 3d congressional district, in November, 1874.

GEORGE C. HAZELTON

of Boscobel, was born in Chester, Rockingham Co., N. H., Jan. 3, 1833; graduated at Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., in 1858; studied law; was admitted to the bar in the State of New York, and settled in Boscobel, Wis., in 1863, where he has since practiced his profession; was elected district attorney of Grant county in 1864, and re-elected in 1866; in 1867 was elected State senator, and chosen president pro-tem of the Senate, and was re-elected to the Senate in 1869. He was elected to the 45th Congress as a republican. Re-elected to the 46th Congress, receiving 11,695 votes against 11,603 for Owen King, greenbacker. He was re-elected to the 47th Congress, receiving 16,236 votes against 12,941 votes for M. M. Cothren, democrat.

BURR W. JONES,

resided near Evansville until about eighteen years of age; after finishing his law course, he commenced practice at Portage in the winter of 1871, but returned to Madison in the spring of 1872; was elected district attorney of Dane county in 1872, and re-elected in 1874; was elected to the 48th Congress in 1882 as a democrat, receiving 13,035 votes against 7,924 for George C. Hazelton, republican; 3,791 for E. W. Keyes, republican; 3,152 for S. D. Hastings, prohibitionist, and 444 for P. W. Matts green backer.

CHAPTER XII.

THE COURTS OF GREEN COUNTY.

It has been shown in previous chapters that the first settlers came to what is now Green county in 1827 and 1828, and that the region they located in was, at that date, a part of Crawford county, in Michigan Territory. These first settlers were under the jurisdiction, until Iowa county was organized, of the

“CIRCUIT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES FOR THE COUNTY OF CRAWFORD.”

There was a county court of Crawford county during the period just mentioned; but why this court lost jurisdiction will now be explained. However, in this connection, it will be necessary, in the first place, to give a history of the “Circuit Court of the United States for the County of Crawford.”

No sooner had the three counties of Brown, Crawford and Michilimackinac been organized and their county courts established, than it was felt to be a great draw-back to the prompt administration of justice that, in all civil cases of over $1,000, and in criminal cases that were capital, as well as in actions of ejectment, in the allowance of writs of error, and mandamus, recourse must be had to the Supreme Court at Detroit; the latter place being the seat of government of Michigan Territory. Therefore, in January, 1823, an act of Congress provided for a circuit court, and for the appointment of a judge for these counties. This court had concurrent jurisdiction, civil and criminal, with the Supreme Court of the Territory, in most cases subject, however, to have its decisions taken to the latter tribunal by a writ of error. The law provided for holding one term of court in each year in each of the counties named in the act; so, at last, there was to be a speedy administration of justice at home, and the people were to be relieved from all military arbitrations, which frequently had been imposed upon them. James Duane Doty was appointed judge of this court at its organization. Appeals were taken from the county court to the “circuit court of the United States for the county of Crawford,” as Judge Doty’s court was called. A May term was held in Prairie du Chien; a June term in Green Bay; a July term in “the borough of Michilimackinac,” in each year. In 1824 Henry S. Baird, of Brown county, was appointed district attorney. Doty held the office of judge until May, 1832, when he was succeeded by David Irvin. The new circuit included all of Michigan not in the peninsula, the now State of Wisconsin, and the country north of St. Croix river and east of the Mississippi to latitude 49—now under the government of Minnesota. In the winter or spring of 1823, Doty was appointed by President Monroe the additional judge. At the session of 1823—4, Congress changed the tenure of office of the judges of Michigan from “good behavior” to the term of four years, and Judge Doty’s re-appointment was announced in Nile’s Register of Feb. 28, 1824. The first term of Judge Doty’s court was held at Mackinaw, in July, 1823.

JAMES DUANE DOTY.

James Duane Doty was born at Salem, Washington Co., N. Y., in the year of 1799. He received a common school education, and then devoted himself to the study of law. In 1818, he removed to Detroit, in the Territory of Michigan, where, in the following year, he was admitted to the bar. He early attracted attention, and, in 1820, accompanied Gov. Cass on one of his extensive tours, and was present when the governor hauled down the British flag displayed by the Chippewa's on the American side of the straits of Mackinaw, despite their menaces. In the winter of 1821, while visiting Washington, Doty was admitted to the bar of the United States Supreme Court. A year later, upon the passage of the act forming northern Michigan into a judicial district, he was selected by President Monroe to occupy the bench. In the fall of 1823 Judge Doty, with his wife—he had recently married a daughter of Gen. Collins, of Oneida Co., N. Y.,—removed to Prairie du Chien for the purpose of entering upon his duties; but, the following spring, because the traders did not manifest a very friendly spirit, and believing that Green Bay was a healthier place, established his home there. During this year the organization of the courts was completed, and thereafter he held his terms with strict regularity until 1832, when he was succeeded by Judge David Irvin. Thus relieved of official duties, he made repeated tours over the then unsettled territory, became thoroughly acquainted with its natural resources, and contributed not a little towards obtaining the good-will of the Indian tribes toward the government. In 1831—2, he was one of the commissioners who surveyed the United States military roads from Green Bay to Chicago and Prairie du Chien. In 1834 he was elected to the Territorial council of Michigan, in which he served two years with distinction. In that body he introduced the proposition for the formation of a State government, and the separate Territorial organization of Wisconsin, which prevailed in 1836. Meanwhile, at the Green Bay land sales of 1835—6, he was intrusted with large sums of money for investment in eligible locations, and many flourishing villages now stand on sites of his selection. He was chiefly instrumental, at the Belmont session of the Wisconsin legislature, although not a member, in securing the location of the seat of government at the Four Lakes, now Madison. In 1838, he was elected delegate in Congress from Wisconsin Territory, serving until 1841. He became governor by appointment from President Tyler, in September, 1841, which office he held until June 1844, being the second territorial governor of Wisconsin. He was a member of the first convention chosen to draft a State constitution in 1846. He was elected to Congress from the third or Green Bay district, in 1848, and re-elected in 1850. At the close of his term, 1853, he retired to private life. His last residence in Wisconsin was at Menasha, on Doty's island, of Lake Winnebago. In 1861 he was appointed superintendent of Indian affairs by President Lincoln, and subsequently governor of Utah, holding this position until his death, which occurred June 13, 1865. He was emphatically one of the most eminent pioneers of Wisconsin, and his important public services entitle him to lasting honor.

HOLDING COURT UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

To reach Prairie du Chien from Green Bay, Judge Doty had to travel the distance in a bark canoe, by way of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers. Annual journeys were undertaken between the two points, from 1825 to 1828, by the judge and district attorney, Henry S. Baird, in one canoe. It was usually manned by seven Indians, and the trip each way occupied about seven days. Baird took his family along. Mrs. Baird, who is now (1884) still living, relates the journey was rendered very enjoyable by its sociability and novelty. It was through a wilderness, on wild waters, and no white inhabitant found along its entire course.

In 1829 Morgan L. Martin came to Green Bay, and was subsequently admitted to the bar by the court. In May, of the same year, he and Judge Doty, and the district attorney (Baird), with a Menomonee Indian for a guide, traveled on horseback from Green Bay to Prairie du Chien and back. It took them seven days each way. During the journey, they saw no white man. Their course led through what is now Fond du Lac, Green Lake, Madison, Blue Mounds and Dodgeville; crossing the Wisconsin river six miles above its confluence with the Mississippi.

In those early days, courts were held in rooms in log dwellings, log school houses, and barns, in an emergency, as was the case at the May term, 1826, at Prairie du Chien, when the site of the village was inundated by the Mississippi. "It would naturally be imagined that, under such circumstances [as the flood], court could not be held. But not so, a large barn, situated on dry ground, was fitted up for the occasion. The judge [Doty] and the attorneys occupied the extensive threshing floor, and the jurors the mows. When the latter retired to make up a verdict, they were conducted by an officer to another barn or stable."

In a previous chapter (III), in an account of the so-called "Winnebago War," mention is made of the murder of Gagnier and Lipcap, at Prairie du Chien. It was thought advisable to try the Indians for that murder in Judge Doty's court, that is, in the "Circuit Court of the United States, for the county of Crawford," instead of the county court of Crawford county. But, in order to give the court first mentioned jurisdiction, and at the same time not to bring it in conflict with the county court, the following acts were passed:

[I.]

An Act to restrict the jurisdiction of the county courts of the counties of Michilimackinac, Brown and Crawford.

Be it enacted by the Legislative council of the Territory of Michigan, that from and after the first day of July next ensuing, it shall not be lawful for the county courts, in the counties of Michilimackinac, Brown and Crawford, to take or to hold, or entertain jurisdiction of the trial of any civil or criminal cause; nor shall it be lawful for the clerks thereof, as such, to issue any venire whatever, for any jury or juries, returnable at the said county courts, or either of them.

SEC. 2. That all its suits, indictments, recognizance's, process, writs, appeals and all other matters and things whatsoever, relating to causes civil and criminal, pending in or returnable to the said county courts, are hereby transferred and made returnable to the circuit court of the United States, to be held in each of the said counties where the same are pending; and the circuit court is hereby authorized and required to hear, try, and determine all such suits, indictments, recognizance's, process, writs, appeals and other matters and things aforesaid, according to law, and in like manner as the said county courts would have been required to hear, try and determine the same, if this act had not been passed.

Approved June 18, 1828.

[II]

An Act to provide for holding a special session of the circuit court of the county of Crawford.

Be it enacted by the Legislative Council of the Territory of Michigan That "the additional judge of the Michigan Territory, in the counties of Michilimackinac, Brown and Crawford," be and he is hereby authorized to hold a special session of the circuit court for the county of Crawford, at such place in the borough of Prairie du Chien, he may appoint, on Monday, the twenty-fifth day of August next, and so long a time thereafter as may be necessary for the trial of all such criminal cases as shall then and there be moved and prosecuted in the said court; and the clerk of said court shall issue venires for fifteen grand, and twelve petit jurors to attend the said session.

SEC. 2. That the jurors aforesaid shall be free white males of this above the age of twenty-one years, and shall have resided therein one year previous to the said twenty-fifth of August, and, no other qualification shall be required by the court, of the said jurors; and if any juror is subpoenaed as a witness in any criminal case, to be prosecuted as aforesaid, or does not possess a full knowledge of the English language, he shall not be discharged for such cause alone.

SEC. 3. That no person, indicted for any crime at the said session, shall be allowed by the court to challenge peremptorily, and without cause, more than twelve jurors of the said panel, anything contained in any law to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That any deficiency in said panel, from any cause whatever, shall not operate to prevent the court from causing a sufficient number of jurors to complete the panel aforesaid, to be summoned from among the neighboring citizens.

Approved June 3, 1828.

According to the provisions of this last act, Judge Doty convened his court on the 25th of August, 1828. On the first day of September, Chickhonsic, or the Little Boeuf, and Waniga, or the Sun, were indicted for murder, as accomplices of Red Bird, in the killing of Gagnier and Lipcap, in June of the preceding year, as related in chapter III, of this history. The two Indians (Winnebago's) just mentioned were convicted and sentenced to be hung on the 26th of December following; but, before that day, they were as already related, pardoned by the President of the United States. Two other Indians, charged with the murder of Methode and family were at the same term discharged under a nolle prosequi.

The two acts of the Michigan Territorial council before given, remained in force until the last day of July, 1830; so that all cases, civil or criminal, in Crawford county, were triable in Judge Doty's court between the 1st of July, 1828, and that date instead of in the county court. Now, it so happened that in August, 1828, a man was killed within the limits of that county in that part now the county of Green. The slayer was, of course, properly tried in Prairie du Chien, and in Judge Doty's court. It was the case of a trader among the Winnebago's by the name of McNutt, who killed another trader named Boner. From a published account of this affair, in 1857, by J. W. Stewart, we have the following particulars:

"Boner and McNutt were both in the habit of partaking to freely of spirituous liquors, which they kept to sell to the Indians [at a place about one mile southwest of what was afterward Exeter, in the present Green county]. One night during the month of August, [it was earlier, probably in June] 1828, whilst no one was about their premises except the two partners and Van Sickle, their interpreter, one of them—McNutt—without having had any previous quarrel, dispute, or provocation known to any one, under the effects of intoxication, came into the house with a common ax in his hand and deliberately killed Boner and cut him into pieces, in the presence of Van Sickle. The latter, without interference, fled to Blue Mounds on foot, and gave the information. As Van Sickle left the cabin, in his fright, McNutt, the murderer, laid hold of his rifle and shot after him, the ball striking the door check. A few minutes after Van Sickle's arrival at Blue Mounds, McNutt arrived there on horseback and surrendered himself to the officers, who took him to Prairie du Chien. Mr. Blackmore, who is my informant, was away from home the day of the murder, but was there the next day, and assisted in burying Boner, who occupied the first grave of a white man within [what are now] the limits of the county. After eighteen months confinement in jail at Prairie du Chien, McNutt was acquitted."

An account of the killing of Boner given to Albert Salisbury, in 1871, by William Deviese, differs from the foregoing in a few particulars. It is as follows:

"After the murder of Boner, McNutt fled to Blue Mounds and was lying drunk at Moore's when the news reached the Mounds. He was tied by Deviese, Duncan and others, and delivered up to the officers from Dodgeville. Mc Nutt made no resistance, being in fact too drunk, but denied all knowledge of the murder, and said if he killed Boner he knew nothing of it, as may have been the case. He was kept in jail in Prairie du Chien for a year and a half, and then acquitted."

In a sketch of James Hawthorn, of the same date, Mr. Salisbury has some additional information concerning McNutt. He says:

"Hawthorn was called to Prairie du Chien in the spring of 1827 as a juryman to the United States district court. There were twenty indictments for murder, resulting in but one conviction—that of a soldier who had killed his lieutenant. Sixteen different persons were indicted who had participated in a charivari, which resulted as so many of those things do. The two ring leaders broke jail and left for Canada. At Green Bay, they got a job of making shingles and having been supplied by their employer with provisions, blankets, etc., it need not be said that they did not stay long in their shingle camp.

"At this term of court, McNutt was tried for the murder of Boner on Sugar river. Van Sickle, the interpreter, being the only witness for the prosecution, his veracity was impeached by the defense, and McNutt was acquitted. Hawthorn laughs over a remark which he heard Van Sickle make after the trial—that "they brought in that bloody Jake Hunter to swear against me, and he's as d—d a liar as I am myself."

It is proper here to mention that the jurisdiction of the county court of Crawford county was afterward restored, although in no wise affecting the settlers who then lived in what is now Green county; as they had, by the organization of Iowa county, passed under the jurisdiction of the "circuit court of the United States for the county of Iowa." The act restoring the jurisdiction of the Crawford county court was as follows:

An Act to restore the jurisdiction and powers of the county court of the county of Crawford.

Be it enacted by the Legislative Council of the Territory of Michigan. That it shall hereafter be lawful for the county court of the county of Crawford, to take and entertain jurisdiction of all causes, civil and criminal, that may arise in said county, and to direct the issuing of all necessary process for carrying the same into effect, in as ample a manner as was possessed by said court, previous to the passage of the act entitled "An Act to restrict the jurisdiction of the county courts of the counties of Michilimackinac, Brown and Crawford approved June 18, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-eight, or as said court would have possessed, provided the act aforesaid had not been passed.

SEC. 2. That there shall be one term annually of said court, to be held on the first Monday of November, in each and every year.

Approved July 31, 1830.

While Judge David Irvin, the successor of Judge Doty, was holding his office, it was thought best to better provide for the publication of all legal notices in the counties of Brown, Iowa and Crawford; so the following act was passed, applicable, however, to both circuit and county courts:

An act to provide for the publication of all legal notices in the counties of Brown, Iowa and Crawford.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Legislative Council of the Territory of Michigan, that when notice of any application to any court or judicial officer in any of said counties of Brown, Iowa and Crawford, of any proceeding in any court, or before any judicial officers, in either of said counties, is required to be published in any newspaper, the said notice shall be published by posting one copy of it on the door of the house where the circuit court was last held, in the county in which said application is made or proceeding had; and the court or judge may order a further publication, if, in their discretion, the nature of the case shall require it, by inserting a copy thereof in a newspaper.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

SEC. 2. The provisions of the foregoing section shall not effect any application made or proceeding had as aforesaid, previous to the 1st day of June next.

Approved Feb. 1, 1833.

The Territorial circuit court, with David Irvin as judge, continued until abrogated by the organization of the Territory of Wisconsin.

DAVID IRVIN.

David Irvin was born in Albemarle Co., Va., in 1794, and was of blended Scotch and Irish parentage. His father was a Presbyterian minister and a teacher of the ancient languages of much local reputation. Young Irvin was educated for a lawyer and started in life in the Shenandoah valley. As he did not meet with much success there, he applied to his old school-mate, William C. Rives, who was at that time in high favor with President Jackson, to get him an office. Mr. Rives suggested a judgeship. The term of office of Judge Doty, as judge of the additional district for Michigan Territory, having expired, [1832], that position was tendered Irvin and accepted. Upon the organization of the Territory of Wisconsin, he was appointed associate justice of the Supreme Court by President Jackson.

Being a bachelor, Judge Irvin's residence was not necessarily confined to any locality. He always preferred southern society; and as soon as his last office was ended, he went to St. Louis, where he remained some length of time. He subsequently became a citizen of Texas and a wealthy man.

Though only thirty-six years old when he first came to what was afterwards the territory of Wisconsin, Judge Irvin seems never to have been regarded by the people as one of their number. He was free from the vices which too often, in those days, injured or even ruined some of the most promising men in the west. He was generally regarded as a fair and upright judge, of respectable ability. The peculiarities of his character, and his entire withdrawal many years ago from all connection with the State of Wisconsin, have led to numerous attempts, on the part of early settlers, to describe him. "Judge Irvin," says one who knew him well, "was about six feet in height, very erect and well proportioned. His hair was auburn, eyes blue, features narrow. He was not a laborious judge, but was attentive to duty, honest and upright in every particular. He was candid and without intrigue or deception. For integrity and moral principle, he enjoyed general confidence. He was fond of a horse and a dog; always esteeming his horse and dog the finest and best. Being a bachelor, these animals seemed to be the especial objects of his care and attention. He was fond of hunting, particularly for prairie chickens. Upon these excursions he would frequently take members of the bar with him. He was very economical, but scrupulously just in all his dealings. He indulged in acts of kindness to his relatives, but did not show much sympathy for others. While he treated all with urbanity and respect, he did not form particular attachments for strangers."

A description of Judge Irvin, by the late Judge C. M. Baker, of Walworth Co., Wis., is interesting

"He [Judge Irvin] was a Virginia gentleman of the old school. Social, kind-hearted, aristocratic, as became a Virginian of the F. F.'s, he was a bachelor with his whims and peculiarities. He was a great lover of hunting, particularly of prairie hens, in the shooting of which he was an expert. On this he prided himself; and no one must excel him, if he would keep in his good graces. He was also learned in the knowledge of horses and dogs, as well as in the law. His own horse, Pedro, and his dog, York, to whom he was much attached, and whose superior blood often formed the theme of his conversation, were as well known to the bar as the judge himself. They were necessary appendages to the judge and the court. It was said by the wags that, if one wanted to win his case before the judge, he must praise his dog and his horse. But of truth it can be said of him that he was a lover of justice, detested meanness, was well grounded in the principles of the law, and was possessed of very respectable perceptive and reasoning powers. He seldom consulted law books, with which the bar of those days was poorly supplied; but on the whole, for the times, was a fair and respectable judge.”

TERRITORIAL DISTRICT COURT.

The act of Congress which provided for the organization of Wisconsin Territory, declared that the judicial power therein should be vested in a Supreme Court, district courts, probate courts and justices of the peace. Charles Dunn was commissioned chief justice and David Irvin and William C. Frazer, associate judges. The act of Congress before mentioned required that the Territory of the Wisconsin should be divided in three judicial districts. The three judges of the Supreme Court were district judges. The counties of Crawford and Iowa (a great part of what is now the county of Green being in the latter) were constituted by the Wisconsin Territorial legislature, the first district, to which was assigned Chief Justice Dunn. He also, upon the organization of Grant county, held court therein; so, also, upon the organization of Green county, he presided at its courts, until, in 1839, it was made a part of a new district.

The record of Judge Dunn's court in Green county is as follows

At a district court of the United States begun and held in the county of Green, in the Territory of Wisconsin, at the court house in the town of New Mexico, on the second day of April (it being the first Monday in said month), in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and thirty-eight.

Present: The Hon. Charles Dunn, judge; George McFadden, clerk pro-tem.

On motion of T. S. Wilson, Esq., James Churchman, Esq., was admitted as an attorney and counselor of this court, and thereupon took the oath prescribed by law. Ordered by the court that James Churchman, Esq., be and is hereby appointed district attorney pro-tem in and for the county of Green.

Ordered by the court that T. S. Wilson, Esq., be and is hereby appointed attorney pro-tem for the Territory of Wisconsin.

Ordered by the court that Mortimer Bainbridge be and is hereby appointed clerk of this court, pro-tem, vice George McFadden, who declines serving further. Ordered that court adjourn until to-morrow, nine o'clock.

CHARLES DUNN,

Chief Justice and Pres.(iding) in Green D.(istrict) C.(ourt) The court met pursuant to adjournment.

Present: The Hon. Charles Dunn, judge; and M. Bainbridge, clerk.

The sheriff produced in court his bond, with Abner Van Sant, William Bowen, Hanson Ivon and Alfred G. Houton, securities, which was approved of by the court, and thereupon said John W. Deniston as sheriff took the several oaths of office prescribed by law.

The sheriff returned unto court the following panel of grand jurors, to wit: Elijah Austin, Amos Harris, Mordecai Kelly, Joseph Woodle, Jarvis Rattin, Hiram Rust, Thomas Bowen, William Blunt, Peter Wells John Blunt, Mathew Wells, Joseph Kelly, Jacob Andrix, Hanson Ivon, Julius Austin and Augustus Chilton, who, being elected, tried and sworn, retired to consider the matter given them in charge. The court appointed Hiram Rust foreman of the grand jury, who took the foreman's oath. Andrew Clarno, Bennet Noland, Joel Decamp, James Hawthorn and Peter Webb, who were returned in the panel by the sheriff as having been duly summoned on being called came not, but made default, whereupon, on the motion of the district attorney it is ordered that a summons issue against the said delinquent grand jurors, returnable to the next term of this court to shew cause why they should not be fined for a contempt of court.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

Ordered that Mortimer Bainbridge be, and he is hereby, appointed clerk of the district court of Green county, Wisconsin Territory, who gave bond, with Charles Dunn, Francis Gehon, John W. Deniston, Jacob Ly Brand and T. S. Wilson, securities, in the sum of two thousand dollars, and took the several oaths of office.

The said bond was approved by the court. The sheriff returned unto court the following panel of petit jurors, to wit: J. Whitcomb, Stephen Clarno, Henry Ator, James Campbell, William Brown, James Chilton, Robert Kirkendall, Calvin Hale, Joseph Smith, Daniel Sutherland, S. F. Brown, Amos Bradley, Joseph McCracken, G. W. Reeder, Isaac Wells, William Draper and John Chadwick.

Joseph Payne was excused from serving on the petit jury, upon cause shewn.

William Bowen was excused from serving on the petit jury, upon cause shewn.

David Sutherland was excused from serving on the petit jury, upon cause shewn.

William Bryant, Daniel Harcourt and Jonathan Roberts, who were returned by the sheriff as having been duly summoned as petit jurors, on being called came not, but made default, whereupon, on the motion of the district attorney it is ordered that a summons issue against the said delinquent petit jurors, returnable to the next term of this Court to shew cause why they shall not be fined for a contempt of court.

The grand jury returned into court the following indictments as true bills:

The United States }
 vs. } Adultery.
 Elizabeth Gage. }

This day came the United States by their attorney, as also defendant by T. S. Wilson, her attorney, who moved the court to quash the indictment for the following reasons, viz:

- 1st. The indictment is uncertain.
- 2d. The section of the law under which the defendant is indicted (sec 11 page 446 Michigan laws) does not contemplate the crime of adultery.
- 3d. If adultery is contemplated in said section the charge is not sufficiently set forth.
- 4th. And for other errors and insufficiencies which motion was overruled.

On motion of this, district attorney ordered that this cause be continued until the next term of this court.

Ordered that T. S. Wilson, Esq., attorney pro tem for the United States, be allowed for services during the present term as follows, to wit:

For three days attendance at court at five dollars per day, fifteen dollars. Traveling to court one hundred miles at five cents per mile for going, the same for returning, ten dollars; making in all twenty-five dollars. Ordered that the above allowance be certified.

Ordered that Francis Gehon, Esq., marshal for the Territory be allowed for services during the present term as follows, to wit:

For three days attendance at court at five dollars per day, fifteen dollars; for traveling to court one hundred miles at five cents per mile for going and the same for returning, ten dollars, making in all twenty-five dollars. Ordered that the above allowance be certified.

Ordered that M. Bainbridge, clerk of the court be allowed for services during the present term of this court as follows, to wit: For three days attendance at court at five dollars per day, fifteen dollars; traveling to court seventy miles at five cents per mile for going and the same for returning from court, seven dollars, making in all twenty-two dollars. Ordered that the above allowance be certified.

CHARLES DUNN,
Chf. Jus. and Pres, in G. D. C.

CHARLES DUNN.

Charles Dunn was born Dec. 28, 1799, at Bullett's Old Lick, Bullett Co., Ky., which is about sixteen miles from Louisville. He was the eldest of a family of five sons and four daughters, and at the age of nine was sent to school at Louisville, where he remained a number of years, when he was called home and sent on a business tour to Virginia, Maryland and Washington. Upon his return home he read law a short time with Worden Pope, a distinguished lawyer of Louisville. He afterward proceeded to Frankfort and continued his law reading for about two years with the eminent John Pope, then secretary of State, and who was the first law professor in the Transylvania University, at Lexington.

Mr. Dunn, in May, 1819, went to Kaskaskia, at that time the capital of Illinois, where he completed his studies under the direction of Nathaniel Pope, district judge of the United States. In 1820 he was admitted to the bar, Sidney Breese being admitted at the same time. He then commenced practice at Jonesboro, Union Co., Ill. In 1821, he married Mary E. Shrader, daughter of Judge Ostro Shrader, who had been a United States judge in Missouri Territory. He remained in practice at Jonesboro for several years, and then removed to Golconda, Pope Co., Ill.

For two years Mr. Dunn was engrossing clerk, during two sessions of the House of Representatives of the Illinois legislature, and for five years its chief clerk. In 1829 he was appointed, by Gov. Ninian Edwards, acting commissioner of the Illinois and Michigan canal, and with his associates on the commission, Edward Roberts and Dr. Jane, surveyed and platted the first town lots of Chicago. The first town lots of this embryo metropolis were sold by the commissioners on behalf of the State in the latter part of 1829, and the sales continued in 1830 and in 1831, during which years the survey of the canal and railway line was made and reported.

In the early part of 1832 Indian troubles commenced and a requisition was made upon the State authorities of Illinois for troops to engage in service against the Indians led by Black Hawk. Three brigades responded to the call, and Mr. Dunn entered the service as captain of a company he had raised in Pope county, where he then resided. His company was assigned to the 2d regiment, which was commanded by Col. John Ewing, and attached to the first brigade, under Gen. Alexander Posey.

Soon after, in an engagement with the Indians (what engagement is unknown) Capt. Dunn became the victim of a blundering mistake on the part of a sentinel, by which he was severely, and at first it was thought mortally, wounded.* On approaching the sentinel he was severely wounded by him in the groin, of course through the mistake of the soldier. Dunn was taken back to Fort Dixon, where he was confined by his wound until after the war was ended by the battle of Bad Ax.

As soon as he was sufficiently recovered, Capt. Dunn returned home, and in the spring of 1833 acted as assistant paymaster in paying off the first brigade. During that year he resumed the practice of his profession. In 1835 he was elected a member of the House of Representatives of the State legislature, from Polk county, and was chairman of the committee on the Judiciary during the session, Upon the recommendation of the Illinois delegation in Congress, and the delegate of the Territory of Wisconsin, George W. Jones, he was appointed by President Jackson, in the spring of 1836, chief justice of Wisconsin Territory. He arrived at Mineral Point, July 4, 1836, and was then and there sworn into office, which he held until the organization of the State judiciary. The last term of his court was held at Mineral Point, in October, 1848.

Judge Dunn was a member of the second constitutional convention of the State from Lafayette county, and was chairman of the committee on the judiciary of that body. He took a leading part in framing what afterward became and still is, the constitution of Wisconsin. Subsequently, he was elected State senator for the district composed of the county of Lafayette. He served in that capacity during the sessions of that body in 1852 and 1853, and was chair man of the committee on the judiciary during both of those years.

On the expiration of his term of office as chief justice, Judge Dunn engaged in the practice of the law in Lafayette and adjoining counties. He was regarded one of the most eminent among those who were or had been in the profession, in Wisconsin. While chief justice, his judicial studies were especially onerous, as, during the greater portion of the time he was on the bench, his district, as circuit judge, was the most populous and important in the Territory, and produced, it is believed, the greatest amount of litigation. His judicial and official duties were performed with rare ability, fidelity and integrity; and, although he had a few enemies (who has not?), he always commanded during his residence of thirty-five years in Wisconsin, both in public and private life, the confidence and esteem of a very large proportion of the people. To near the time of his death, in 1872, at the advanced age of seventy-two, he continued in the vigorous practice of his profession at Belmont, and was, at that time, the oldest lawyer in the State.

William Hull says of him: "As a lawyer, Judge Dunn ranked as one of the best. As a judge, he was as honest and impartial as a man of his temperament could possibly be. A good pleader himself, he held us all to the strict technicalities of the common law practice, which then prevailed, and, although at times prone to give way to the violence of his personal feelings, he was generally liked and respected by the members of the bar in his district and territory. He could never forget his dignity on the bench; on the road traveling from court to court; at the stopping-places for the night; and during the sessions of the courts; he was, with his friends, at all times courteous and a gentleman; to those whom he did not like, he could and did occasionally preserve a different course. This trait in the judge's character can only be accounted for by premising that, like all other descendants from the first families of Virginia, the Dunn's claimed to have the royal blood of Powhattan flowing in their veins, through his daughter, the historical, abused Pocahontas.

"In all places and at all times Judge Dunn never put off his dignity. One instance of this ruling trait will bear to relate. Game of all kinds was very plentiful in those early days and deer hunting was a common pastime. After the fall terms of the courts had terminated, on one occasion the judge, his brother Frank, a henchman of Frank's, Abe Fields, a gentleman now prominent in an adjoining State, and Mr. Hull, of La Crosse, were in camp on the Kickapoo river, near Wayne's mill. The judge, for some cause, did not, as had been observed, take much interest in the unnamed gentleman. The second day of the hunt, the judge, a true sportsman, had killed a magnificent buck, and it had been brought into camp. The deer was hung up for dressing. Judge Dunn, with coat off, sleeves rolled up and knife in hand, had commenced work. After a few cuts with the knife had been made, the gentleman wishing to make some remark to the judge, spoke loudly—"Dunn!" As quick as a flash Judge Dunn stopped his work, turned facing the gentleman, and with piercing black eyes flashing lightning, responded,—“Judge Dunn, if you please, sir!” After this explosion there was silence in the camp for awhile.

Although Judge Dunn continued chief justice of Wisconsin Territory and judge of the first district therein until the Territorial district court was abolished by the admission of Wisconsin as a State, still there was a very strong effort made during his incumbency to have him ousted from office by certain citizens of the first district, who circulated the following petition

To his Excellency, James K Polk, President of the United States.

The undersigned, citizens of the first judicial district., composed of the counties of Crawford, Grant and Iowa, in the Territory of Wisconsin, would most respectfully represent to your excellency, that many persons in this judicial district, whose practice or business brings them in contact with our court, complain that Charles Dunn, chief justice of the Territory, and presiding judge of our district, is in the constant habit of favoring the practice and clients of his brother, Francis J. Dunn, a practicing lawyer in said district, in all rules of court, pleas, motions and points of law, made by him, to the injury of those persons who may be so unfortunate as to have Mr. Dunn retained against them. Your petitioners are aware that charges of this nature cannot be sustained otherwise than by circumstantial evidence. The circumstance, therefore, on which they would rely to convince your excellency of the truth of this charge, is, that the docket of the district court of the county of Iowa alone contains over 250 causes, set for trial at the last term of court, and the brother of Judge Dunn, a very young lawyer, is retained in fully one-half of these causes. Notwithstanding the lucrative and successful practice of young Mr. Dunn in the circuit of his brother, the murmurs and complaints of the members of the bar and their clients, at this state of things, might pass unheeded if Francis J. Dunn possessed talents to warrant such success. But with abilities not above mediocrity, there is nothing to justify so great and lucrative a practice, over older and better lawyers, but the fact of his being the brother of the judge.

Your petitioners would also represent to your excellency, that the said Charles Dunn, has, in violation of the laws of the Territory, presided in suits at law wherein his brothers have either been plaintiffs or defendants, which the records of our courts will show, in numerous instances. We would particularly call the attention of your excellency to the case of Dunn vs. Marsh, in the Crawford district court. The notorious Jeffries, in the corrupt reign of Charles II, could not have been guilty of a more shameful prostitution of justice to subserve his master, than this act of Judge Dunn to put money in the pocket of his brother.

Your petitioners would further represent to your excellency, that the said Charles Dunn, acting as judge of the first judicial district, did, in the year 1841, on the complaint of one John Dowling, of Galena, in the State of Illinois, now deceased, grant an injunction against the Bank of Mineral Point, appointing his brother, John Dunn, and two others, his personal friends, receivers to close the affairs of said bank. It is a matter of some notoriety that one of the receivers, thus appointed, boasted that they would each make at least $10,000 out of the pickings of the bank.

About the time this injunction was granted, the cashier of the bank absconded. He was pursued and overtaken by John Dunn, one of the receivers, and Dr.. William Davidson, who took from him acceptances and bills of exchange to the amount of $70,000 or $80,000. In a newspaper publication made about the time of the arrest of the cashier, to satisfy the public mind, the receivers state that the assets taken from the cashier and other officers of the bank, independent of the bonds, notes, banking house and other property of the bank, amounted to nearly $100,000! In the meantime Dowling, the complainant against the bank, dies, and Francis J. Dunn obtains the administratorship of his estate in this Territory, being at the same time agent and attorney for the receivers. Acting thus for the plaintiffs and defendants, he holds the keys of the front and back doors of the bank; and having at the same time associated with him, in the practice of the law, D. Walter Jones, the president of the bank at the time of its failure, and having further cemented that partnership by the marriage of that person into the family, the door has been effectually closed to all inquiry, and the affairs of the bank have been wrapped in mystery now for over four years.

During that time no expose of the condition of the bank has been made, although frequently required by public meetings and otherwise, and no dividend has been made, except a private one of about $3,000, which was divided among a very small number of bill-holders, at the rate of fifty cents on the dollar, to the exclusion of a large body of creditors of the bank, who were not advised of the terms and condition on which that dividend would be made.

However, before this partial and private dividend was made there was a payment made out of the assets of the bank to Dr. William Davidson, of Grant county, one of the persons who assisted in arresting the cashier, and who held the bills of the bank to a considerable amount. It is alleged that Dr. Davidson obtained this payment by threats that he would make an expose of certain illegal acts of the receivers or their agent. Be that as it may, it is the opinion of legal men that the payment to Davidson, and the partial division shared by a few of the bill-holders, is a violation of the condition of the bond given by the receivers, and that the creditors of the bank could recover from the receivers and their securities, if not the full amount of their claims, at least the same rate of dividend which their agent had paid to others.

But to seek justice before the presiding judge of the district, when it is known that he did not emigrate to the Territory with a character like Caesar's wife, who is openly accused of presiding in cases wherein his brothers were parties, which is in direct violation of the laws, would be adding another act to the farce of justice which has so frequently been enacted in this district.

If the conduct of Judge Dunn, in any public capacity in which he has acted through life, was such as to place him above the suspicion of doing a dishonorable act, the murmurs and complaints against him would not have the weight with us they otherwise possess.

But it is asserted that he did, while a member of the legislature of the State of Illinois, in the year 1839, receive from a certain Samuel Wiggins a fee or bribe of $200, to procure the passage of an act through the legislature, known as the "Wiggin's Loan;" a more corrupt and swindling act never having been passed by any legislative body in the Union.

This rumor considered, your Excellency will not be surprised that the man against whom the broad charge is brought, true or false, that he sold himself as a legislator, may on slight grounds render himself obnoxious to the suspicion that he is corruptible as a judge! But there are other and graver charges against Judge Dunn, which are not based on suspicion. The proofs to sustain them are tangible and can be produced before any competent tribunal.

These proofs must serve to convince your Excellency that, under any circumstances, Charles Dunn, chief justice of this Territory, is unworthy and unfit to fill his present high and responsible office. They are first—"That while holding court in the county of Iowa, at the spring term of said court, in the year 1838, Judge Dunn was intoxicated during the whole term of court. That during the said term a certain McCumber was indicted and tried for the murder of George C. Willard, a nephew of Gen. Dodge. The defendant, owing to the charge of the judge to the jury, was convicted of manslaughter, and received the sentence of the law, although from the testimony it was clearly a case of self-defense. These facts can be established by the testimony of W. W. Chapman, late United State's district attorney, Iowa Territory; John Catlin, Esq., Madison; Moses M. Strong, Esq., Iowa county; Thomas P. Burnett, Esq., Grant county; J. D. Selhorst, late sheriff, Iowa county; I. T. Lathrop, late postmaster, Mineral Point; F. Gheon, late marshal Wisconsin Territory, and Thompson Campbell, Esq., secretary of State, Springfield, Ill.

"Second.—That at the October term of the Grant circuit court, held at Lancaster in 1838, Edward C. Oliver was indicted for the murder of John Russell, at Cassville. In the trial of this case, after hearing the testimony, the jury retired and remained out all night. Having disagreed as to the testimony of John Allen, the principal witness for the prosecution, they came into court, and at their request this witness was recalled. At his previous examination Allen was intoxicated; on being recalled into court, he was still more so. During his re-examination by the jury, the prisoner was not in court, nor had he been ordered in for that purpose! The testimony of Allen on his re-examination, was stronger against the prisoner than it had previously been. The jury again retired, and immediately returned into court with a verdict of guilty, against the prisoner. The counsel for Oliver then moved the court for a new trial. One of the grounds on which this motion was based, was that a witness for the prosecution had been recalled at the request of the jury, and was re-examined in court without the prisoner being present. This motion was overruled by the court, and sentence of death was pronounced on him! A bill of exceptions was then drawn up and tendered to the judge, who suffered the prisoner to be executed with this bill of exceptions in his pocket! During the whole term of this court the judge was intoxicated; after its adjournment he was attacked with delirium tremens, jumped out of his chamber window, and was thereby disqualified from attending to his official duties in Crawford county, which court immediately succeeded that at Lancaster. The witnesses to this outrage on law and decency, are John S. Horner, Esq., register of the land office at Green Bay; Hon. Thomas S. Wilson, judge of United States district court, Iowa Territory; Mortimer Bainbridge, Esq., Dubuque; John S. Fletcher, G. M. Price, J. Allen Barber, Nelson Dewey, Thomas P. Burnett and John H. Rountree, Esqs.. Grant county.

"Third.—That at a previous term of the Grant circuit court, Judge Dunn was intoxicated during the term of the court, and was attacked with mania a potu. The witnesses are Dr. Woods John S. Fletcher, Clovis Le Grand, Thomas P. Burnett, J. A. Barber, G. M. Price and Nelson, Dewey, Grant county; W. W. Chapman, Parley Eaton and Moses M. Strong, Esqs., Hon. Judge Wilson and Joseph P. Hoge, member of Congress from Galena, Ill.

"Fourth.—That at a special chancery term appointed by Judge Dunn to be held at Mineral Point, in January, 1840, he was so much intoxicated as to disqualify him from holding the said term of court. The witnesses are Moses M. Strong, Parley Eaton and I. T. Lathrop, Esqs., and James H. Gentry, late sheriff, and John Bracken, late under sheriff of Iowa county.

"Fifth.—That while holding a court at Prairie du Chien, in Crawford county, for the trial of Che-ge-wais-cum, a Chippewa Indian, indicted for the murder of Mr. Akins, an Indian trader, Judge Dunn was intoxicated during the whole term of the court. The witnesses are, the Hon. Judge Wilson, James Churchman, Esq., Galena, Ill.; Thomas P. Burnett, D. G. Fenton, clerk of the court, William Wilson, J. H. Lockwood and H. Dousman, Prairie du Chien.

"Sixth.—That on the 23d of February, 1843, Judge Dunn having become intoxicated at a ball, spent the day in Platteville, playing cards in a grocery, with James B. Vineyard, indicted for the murder of C. C. P. Arndt, a member of the legislative council, whom he had recently had before him on a writ of habeas corpus, and released from the jail of Dane county, on bail. Witnesses: Alonzo Platt., William Davidson, Dr. Bevans, John Morrison, J. M. Gordhue and B. C. Eastman, of Grant county; and J. H. Gentry, of Iowa county.

"Seventh.—That at a late term of the circuit court, for the county of Crawford, at Prairie du Chien, Judge Dunn was again intoxicated during the term of the court. The witnesses are Moses M. Strong, B. C. Eastman, Thomas P. Burnett and D. G. Fenton, Esqs., and Ira Brunson, Esq.; postmaster, Prairie du Chien."

In presenting to your Excellency charges of so serious and degrading a nature against the chief justice of our Territory your petitioners are aware that they ought to be sustained by the accompanying depositions of the witnesses named, but as a majority of the witnesses are members of the court over which Judge Dunn presides, many causes operate on them to prevent their giving their voluntary testimony against him. We would, therefore, most respectfully request that you cause the records of our courts to be examined and the testimony of the witnesses named to be procured, and if they should sustain the charges herewith made against Judge Dunn, that you will, in conformity to the opinion of the late attorney-general, the Hon. Felix Grundy, remove him from office. If, however, you should not concur in that opinion, and question your power to remove a Territorial judge for an open violation of the laws, and for drunkenness on the bench; then we would further request you to lay this petition before the Congress of the United States.

How extensively this petition was circulated and signed is unknown; neither has it transpired as to whether it ever reached the eye of the President; one thing is certain, however, if the attention of the chief executive of the Nation was called to it, he gave it no heed.

JUDGE IRVIN'S COURT IN GREEN COUNTY.

In so far as Green county was concerned, the administration of justice by Judge Dunn ceased, as we have seen, Aug. 29, 1838. From July of the next year, until Wisconsin became a State, the county of Green, along with those of Walworth, Rock and Dane, formed the second district of the Territory, over the courts of which Judge David Irvin (of whom a biographical sketch has already been given) presided.

The "district court of the United States" for the county of Green, Judge David Irvin presiding, held its first session in which that judge was present, on the 14th of October, 1839, at the house of Joseph Payne, ("by order of the judge, there being no court house at the county seat,") in the town of New Mexico. Judge Irvin held his last term of court in June, 1848, the last day of the last term was June 23, of that year.

THE UNITED STATES VS. JAMES R. VINEYARD.

By far the most important and exciting criminal trial before Judge Irvin while he sat as judge of the "district court of the United States" for the county of Green, was that of James R. Vineyard for the killing of Charles C. P. Arndt, brought to this court on change of venue, from Dane county, mention of which homicide has already been made in a brief biography of Vineyard, given in the previous chapter (XI). The circumstances, in a few words, were these:

On the 11th of February, 1842, Arndt, a member of the legislative council from Brown county, had, in the council chamber, in the capitol, in Madison, some angry words with Vineyard, who represented Grant county. A discussion had arisen in the council on a motion to reconsider a vote by which the nomination of E. S. Baker, as sheriff of Grant county, was rejected a few days before. Arndt, conceiving himself to have been insulted, approached Vineyard after the adjournment, for the purpose of seeking an explanation, when the latter drew a pistol from his pocket and fired. Arndt reeled for a few paces, then sank on the floor and almost instantly expired, having been shot through the heart. It was an awful termination of a long and intimate friendship. Funeral services were held at the council chamber and the remains taken to Green Bay for burial. Vineyard surrendered himself to the sheriff of Dane county, waived an examination, and was committed to jail. After a brief confinement, he was brought before the chief justice of the Territory on a writ of habeas corpus and admitted to bail. Immediately after the killing of Arndt, Vineyard sent his resignation to the council, which refused to receive it or even have it read. He was at once expelled. He was indicted for manslaughter and a change of venue taken to Green county. The affair caused great excitement throughout the Territory as Arndt was a great favorite with the people.

The United States	}	Indictment for Manslaughter
vs.
James R. Vineyard

Now comes the district attorney, J. W. Stewart, Esq., who for the United States prosecuteth, and moves the court for assistant counsel, which motion being considered by the court it is ordered that said motion shall not be sustained.

Also appeared the said James R. Vineyard by his counsel, Strong, Field & Botkin, and moves the court for compulsory process for absent witnesses; the said motion having been argued by the counsel of the parties and the court not being sufficiently advised of and concerning said motion took time to consider.

Ordered that court adjourn until 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

James R. Vineyard	}	indictment for manslaughter
advs.
The United States.

Now at this day, comes, as well the district attorney, J. W. Stewart, who for the United States prosecuteth, as the defendant, James R. Vineyard, by his attorneys, Field, Strong & Botkin, Esq's. And the court being sufficiently advised of and concerning the motion made herein for compulsory process, heretofore filed, doth overrule the same. And the said defendant by his attorneys aforesaid, moved the court for leave to withdraw the plea of "Not Guilty," and file a demurrer to the bill of indictment, which motion having been considered, is overruled by the court. On motion of the counsel for the defendant for a continuance of this cause, for reason set forth in affidavit of defendant on file, it is ordered by the court that said motion be overruled, to which decision of the court the counsel for the defendant took exceptions, and filed in court their bill of exception. Ordered that court adjourn until eight o'clock to-morrow morning.

The United States	}	Indictment for manslaughter.
vs.
James R. Vineyard.

This day comes as well J. W. Stewart and A. L. Collins Esq's., who for the United States prosecuteth, as the said James R. Vineyard, the defendant, by Field, Strong & Botkin. And the defendant for trial puts himself upon the county, and the prosecution doth the like. Thereupon came a jury, to-wit: Thomas B. Sturges, Lewis Morton, Thomas J. Bragg, Stephen Mackey, Christopher Minert, Thomas L. Summers, Asa Richardson, Alexes Vanormin, James Rattan, Thomas Hinton, Peter S. Rutledge and William Blunt, twelve good and lawful men elected, tried, sworn and charged well and truly to try the issue between the United States and the said defendant.

Ordered that court adjourn until eight o'clock to-morrow morning. DAVID IRVIN, Judge.

The United States	}	Indictment for manslaughter.
vs.
James R. Vineyard.

Now comes the parties to this prosecution by their respective counsel, and the jury herein impaneled having taken the box, and the evidence of the parties having been examined. The court directed the sheriff to take charge of the said jury and return them into court at eight o'clock tomorrow morning.

Ordered that court adjourn until eight o'clock tomorrow morning.

DAVID IRVIN, Judge.

The United States	}	Indictment for manslaughter.
vs.
James R. Vineyard.

Now comes the parties by their respective attorneys, and the jury herein having been by the sheriff conducted to the box, and the jurors of the jury aforesaid, after having heard the testimony as well on the part of the United States as of the said defendant and the argument of the counsel therein, and having been instructed in the law by the court, retired to their chamber to deliberate on their verdict. Thereupon the jurors of the jury aforesaid came in court, and on their oaths do say: "We, the jury, find the defendant not guilty as charged in the indictment."

It is therefore considered and adjudged by the court here, that the said James R. Vineyard of the charges in the indictment be discharged, and that he go hence.

Miss Bingham, in her excellent history, has this to say with regard to the Vineyard trial:

"1843 is memorable, in the annals of Monroe, as the year in which James R. Vineyard, a State senator, was tried here for the murder of C. P. Arndt, also a senator, or councilor, as the name was then. An account of the murder reads like a telegram from Texas. An altercation arose during a session of the council, and, immediately after the adjournment, Vineyard shot his antagonist in the council chamber. The jury acquitted him, and the acquittal was the signal for great rejoicing. Mr. Vineyard received his friends at the new Monroe House, and entertained them so well that they rose almost to a level with those men of Shakespeare's,

*So full of valor that they smote the air
For breathing in their faces,
Beat the ground,
For kissing at their feet.*

and when the question, were you ever intoxicated, is propounded to the most temperate of the old settlers, it is likely to elicit the reply,

"Yes, when Vineyard was acquitted."

The first divorce granted in Green county was one obtained by Leroy Wait from his wife, Ellen Wait. The court record as to this divorce is as follows:

Thursday, April 14, 1842.

Leroy Wait	}	In chancery. For Divorce.
Ellen Wait.

Upon petition of divorce in the above entitled cause, it having been made to appear to the satisfaction of the court that notice of said petition and of the time of hearing the same has been given to the said Ellen Wait, the above named defendant, at least thirty days, and it being made further to appear to the satisfaction of the court that the matters alleged against the said Ellen Wait in said petition are true. Upon hearing had before the judge of said court at chancery, there having been no issue made up to be tried by a jury, it is hereby ordered and decreed by the court that the prayer of said petition be granted, and by virtue of the power vested in the said court, said court does hereby decree that the bonds of matrimony heretofore existing between them, the said Leroy Wait and the said Ellen Wait, be, and the same hereby are, dissolved to every intent and purpose.

CIRCUIT COURT OF GREEN COUNTY.

The constitution of the State of Wisconsin vested the judicial power of the State in a Supreme Court, circuit courts, courts of probate and in justices of the peace. Circuit courts were to have general original jurisdiction in all matters civil and criminal, not exclusively cognizable by a justice of the peace or some other inferior court. They were to have all the powers according to the usages of courts of law and equity necessary to the full and complete jurisdiction of the causes and parties, and the full and complete administration of justice. Their acts and proceedings were made subject to a re-examination by the Supreme Court, as provided by law.

The constitution divided the State into five judicial circuits, and provided for the election of a judge in each. The first circuit comprised the counties of Racine, Walworth, Rock and Green; the second circuit, the counties of Milwaukee, Waukesha, Jefferson and Dane; the third circuit, the counties of Washington, Dodge, Columbia, Marquette, Sauk and Portage; the fourth circuit the counties of Brown, Manitowoc, Sheboygan, Fond du Lac, Winnebago and Calumet; and the fifth circuit, the counties of Iowa,

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

Lafayette, Grant, Crawford and St. Croix; the county of Richland being attached to Iowa county, Chippewa to Crawford, and La Pointe to St. Croix, for judicial purposes.

The first election for circuit judges was held in Wisconsin on the first Monday of August, 1848. At this election the judge elected for the first judicial circuit (which, as we have just seen, included Green county) was Edward V. Whiton. Green county continued in the first judicial circuit until Jan. 1, 1871, when, by an act of the legislature of 1870, Green, Rock and Jefferson counties were erected into the twelfth judicial circuit; and in that circuit it still (1884) remains. The act spoken of was as follows:

“An Act to constitute and re-organize the twelfth judicial circuit; to change the limits of the first and ninth judicial circuits; and to change the time for holding the terms of the circuit court for the county of Jefferson.

The people of the State of Wisconsin, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

“Section 1. The counties of Rock and Green are hereby detached from the first judicial circuit, and the county of Jefferson from the ninth judicial circuit, and said counties of Rock, Green and Jefferson shall constitute a judicial circuit, which shall be known and designated as the twelfth judicial circuit.

“Section 2. The terms of the circuit court in said counties of Rock and Jefferson shall be held at the time now provided by law for holding the same, and the terms of said court for said county of Green shall commence in each year on the fourth Monday of February, the fourth Monday of September and the second Monday of July.

“Section 3. No jury shall be summoned for either of the terms of the circuit court to be held in the months of June, July and August, but said court shall have power at such terms to transact any business or do any act which may be lawfully transacted or done at a general term of the circuit court, without the intervention of jury.

“Section 4. An election for judge of said twelfth judicial circuit, for the term of six years, shall be held in the several towns and wards therein, on the first Tuesday in April next, which election shall be conducted, and the votes given thereat shall be canvassed and returned in all respects in accordance with existing laws providing for the election of circuit judges, and the term of office of the person who shall be chosen judge of said circuit at such election, shall commence on the first day of January, A. D. 1871. No notice of such election is required, and the same shall not be held invalid for want of any notice thereof.

“Section 5. This act shall take effect on the first day of April next, but the several counties composing the said twelfth judicial circuit shall for the judicial purposes, remain a part of the several judicial circuits to which they have been heretofore attached until the end of the thirty-first day of December next.

“Section 6. All acts or parts of acts contravening the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

“Approved March 16, 1870.”

Judge Whiton continued to discharge the duties of circuit judge of the first circuit, until the April term, 1853, when, having been elected chief justice of the Supreme Court of the State, he resigned to accept that position. Wyman Spooner, of Walworth county, was appointed to fill the vacancy until a successor could be elected. In September, 1853, James R. Doolittle, of Racine, was elected, and entered upon the discharge of the duties of judge of the first judicial circuit. He resigned the office in March, 1856, and Charles M. Baker, of Geneva, Walworth county, was appointed to fill the vacancy until a new election which occurred in April following, when John M. Keep, of Beloit, was elected.

Judge Keep was obliged to resign on account of failing health. He died in the spring of 1861. He held the office about three years and was succeeded by David Noggle, who served first by appointment and then was elected in April, 1859, continuing as judge until January, 1866, when he was succeeded by William Penn Lyon, of Racine, now of the Supreme Court.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

Judge Lyon held the office of judge of the first judicial circuit, as it was then constituted, until April 1, 1871, when, by a law of the legislature which took effect at that date, the counties of Rock and Green were detached from the first circuit and, with Jefferson, which was detached from the ninth circuit, constituted the twelfth judicial circuit. Harmon S. Conger, of Janesville, was elected on the first Tuesday in April, 1870, judge of the new circuit, his term of office beginning Jan. 1, 1871. This position he continued to fill until the time of his death, 1882.

John R. Bennett, of Janesville, having been elected the successor of Judge Conger, he was appointed by the governor to fill out the few remaining months of the official term of the latter, upon the expiration of which he entered upon the full term for which he had been elected and is now (1884) in office.

The first term of the circuit court was held in Green county, Sept. 4, 1848, Judge E. V. Whiton, presiding, "at the court house in the town of Monroe."

The second term was held in March, 1849, by Judge Mortimer M. Jackson. A special term was held by Judge Whiton, July 12th of that year. The last term held by Judge Whiton, was the March term, 1853, the last day March 11, of that year.

Judge Wyman Spooner held his first and only court in September, 1853, in Green county. The first day of the session was the 6th of that month; the last day, Sept. 10, 1853.

Judge James R. Doolittle's first term in this county, was in March, 1854, the first day of his holding court was the 6th of that month; his last term was in March, 1856.

At the September term, 1856, Judge M. M. Cothren presided in the Green county circuit court.

Judge John M. Keep held a special (and his first) term in Green county Sept. 26, 1856. His last term was March, 1858.

Judge David Noggle sat on the bench for the first time in the county of Green, at the September term, 1858; his last, September, 1865.

Judge W. P. Lyon held his first term in this county, in March, 1866. He held his last court in the county, Oct. 5, 1870.

Judge H. S. Conger held his first term in Green county, in March, 1871; his last term was in June, 1882.

Judge John B. Bennett held his first term in this county, in March, 1883 and is now (1884) in office.

The Asiatic cholera, that dreadful scourge of Nations, which had

*"Left its home in the sultry east
With foreign blood to enrich its feast,"* made its appearance in Green county. This fact led to this entry in the record of the circuit court, Sept. 3, 1850: "It having been made to appear that a mortal sickness is now prevalent at Monroe, where this court is now sitting, it is therefore ordered that this court do now adjourn."

But three persons, in Green county, have been convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to the State prison for life.

On the 19th day of June, 1878, Frederick Ohrnz Sr., was shot and killed by his son, Frederick Ohrnz Jr., in the town of Sylvester, in this county. He was prosecuted by P. J. Clawson, district attorney of Green county; and defended by Brooks Dunwiddie and A. S. Douglas, attorneys at law. His trial commenced October 14, 1878, before the following named jury-men: George Bray, Frank Wagner, J. Wilcox, David C. Day, L. F. Moore, S. R. Eldred, Philip Wackman, Nelson Bussy, John Gillett, Alonzo Edwards, Silas McCreedy and E. N. Thayer. They found the defendant guilty.

He was, after his attorneys had argued a motion for a new trial, which was overruled by the court, sentenced to the State prison for life, on the 31st of October, 1878. The judgment of the court in this case was reversed by the Supreme Court on the 11th day of May, 1880. The defendant, who had been in prison, was returned to the keeping of the sheriff of Green county.

The defendant was tried the second time at the March term, 1881, in the circuit court of Green county, and found guilty, and was again sentenced for life to the State prison. He is now serving out his life sentence.

On the 5th day of November, 1882, Burckhard Bram shot and killed, in the town of New Glarus, Henry Steussy. He was arraigned for murder in the first degree, March 7, 1883, and plead "not guilty." He was prosecuted by District Attorney, P. J. Clawson; defended by A. S. Douglas, attorney at law, assigned to that duty by the court. He was tried at the March term, 1883, of the circuit court of Green county, found guilty and sentenced to the State prison for life, March 20, 1883. He is now serving out his sentence.

On the 7th day of March, 1883, Margaret Steussy was arraigned as accessory before the fact in the killing of her husband, Henry Steussy by Burckhard Bram, and plead not guilty. She was prosecuted by P. J. Clawson, district attorney, assisted by A. S. Douglas and was defended by Brooks Dunwiddie, Colden W. Wright and Alexander Wilson, attorneys at law. She interposed a plea of insanity at the October term, 1883, but was not tried on that plea until the March term of 1884. She was adjudged sane, and was then put upon trial as being accessory to the crime committed by Bram. She was found guilty and sentenced to the State prison for life, and is now serving her life sentence.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES OF CIRCUIT COURT JUDGES.

EDWARD VERNON WHITON

was the son of Gen. Joseph Whiton, of Massachusetts, a soldier of the Revolution and of the War of 1812, and was born at South Lee, Berkshire Co., Mass., on the 2d of June, 1805. During the first thirty years of his life he continued to reside in his native town, whence he at length removed to the then Territory of Wisconsin, to take part in the great and glorious battle of life in that new field of development—the great West. He settled there when the present site Janesville and its neighborhood was almost a wilderness, and lived for some time the life of a pioneer in a cabin on the broad prairie. He was elected a member of the House of Representatives for the first session of the legislative assembly at Madison. At the next session he was elected speaker of the House. During those sessions, he was a frequent participant in debate, and took an active part in enacting the first Territorial code. Up to that time, the laws of Wisconsin consisted of the Territorial statutes of Michigan, and the laws of the Wisconsin legislature, passed at the sessions at Belmont and Burlington. The Revised Statutes which became of force on the 4th of July, 1839, were published under his supervision. In 1847 he was a member of the constitutional convention which framed the constitution of the State. On the organization of the State government in 1848 he was elected circuit judge, and under the then system, became a judge of the Supreme Court. He occupied this position until 1853, when the "separate Supreme Court" was established, when he was elected chief justice, and re-elected in 1857, and continued to hold the office until he was compelled to leave it by the disease of which he died. Chief Justice Whiton was thoroughly identified with almost every prominent event in the history of Wisconsin both as a Territory and as a State. throughout the whole period of his residence in Wisconsin, his life was a public life, and he filled the political and judicial stations successively with such ability and integrity that the people exalted him from place to place until he had received the highest honors in their gift; and the positions with which he was honored were ennobled by the lustre of his conduct and character. Amid all the conflicts of party, both in the means by which he attained and the manner in which he discharged the duties of office, the purity of his character was ever unsullied by the slightest breath of reproach, or even suspicion. In the early part of the year 1859, his health began to fail, and it became manifest to his associates upon the bench that his system was suffering from some malady which, it was hoped, would be but temporary in its effects, and would yield to the invigorating influences of relaxation and home exercises, where the cares and anxieties of official responsibility would not intrude; accordingly, his associates upon the bench, after much persuasion, induced him to retire, as all hoped, for a short season only, in order to recruit his energies for the approaching term, as well as to complete the unfinished business still remaining. He left the bench, as was supposed, in the confident expectation of returning to it again after a short respite at home. Insidious disease, however, had obtained too strong a hold in his system, and about noon on the 12th day of April, 1859, he died at his residence in Janesville, in the house of his own construction, loved and mourned as to few men it has been vouchsafed to be loved and mourned.

Among those officially and professionally connected with him, as well as among his private circle, his death called forth the deepest expressions of sincere regret and sorrow, at meetings of the bar of the Supreme Court and of the Milwaukee bar, as well as those held at the county seats of the several counties of the State, resolutions were adopted indicative of the great general loss felt by the people, as well as the exalted estimation in which the deceased judge was most deservedly held by bench and bar. The president of the Milwaukee bar, in the course of a touching tribute to his virtues and ability said of him; "Were I to name any one sphere of action in his life in which he was most eminently distinguished, and for which he had a peculiar adaptation, I should say it was as a legislator. His varied information, strict integrity, eminent conservatism and finely balanced mind all combined to make him a ready debater and a high-minded and patriotic legislator. But it is useless to name any one sphere when all the positions he ever occupied were filled so ably and perfectly," and another of his intimate associates said: "On this melancholy occasion, I can hardly trust myself to speak. For years, Judge Whiton has been to me, as it were, an elder brother. Our relations have been so harmonious, so uniformly genial, so entirely fraternal, that we have scarcely thought of official relation. During our long association in deliberation upon matters of the gravest concernment, while discussion has been most free and unrestrained, never an unkind word, nay, not even a petulant expression has been uttered. All through his official career, he preserved a strictness of propriety which can scarcely be equaled, a conscientiousness which never wavered, a depth of thought, and comprehensiveness of the subject-matter ever present, commanding without force, controlling without intrusion, clear and unassuming in his high office, great when he least thought of greatness, but great only wherein man can be truly great, because he was wise and good."

was born in Hardwick, Mass., July 2, 1795. He spent many years in conducting a newspaper and was admitted to the bar in 1833. He settled in Wisconsin in 1842, and was elected judge of probate in 1846. He was appointed judge of the first judicial circuit of Wisconsin by the governor in 1853, upon the resignation of Judge Whiton, serving until the election and qualifying of Judge Doolittle. He was member of the assembly of the State for the years 1850, 1851, 1857 and 1861, having been speaker in 1857. He was State senator for the years 1862 and 1863, and was three times elected lieutenant-governor of Wisconsin. He was a member of the first board of trustees of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, He died in Lyons in Walworth Co., Wis., on the 18th of November, 1877.

JAMES R. DOOLITTLE was born in Hampton, Washington Co., N. Y. on the 3d day of January, 1815. He graduated at Geneva College in 1834. He adopted the profession of law, and was admitted to the Supreme Court of New York in 1837. Mr. Doolittle was district attorney for several years, of Wyoming Co., N. Y. He removed to Wisconsin in 1851, and was elected judge of the first judicial circuit in 1853, but resigned the office in 1856. The next year he was elected a United States senator by the legislature of Wisconsin, for the term of six years. He served as chairman of the committee on Indian Affairs, and as a member of the committees on Foreign Affairs, Commerce and Military Affairs. He was also a member of the Peace Congress of 1861. In 1863 he was re-elected to the Senate for the term ending in 1869, as will appear by reference to the chapter in this History on "Congressional Representation." During the summer recess of 1865, as a member of a special committee of the Senate, he visited the Indian tribes west of the Mississippi river. He was also a delegate to the Philadelphia "National Union Convention" of 1866, taking an active part in its proceedings and officiating as president. Mr. Doolittle is now doing business in Chicago.

CHARLES M. BAKER.

At Morristown, .N. J., during the exciting times of the Revolution, were born James Baker and Elizabeth Prince, the parents of Charles M. Baker. The father became a master builder in New York city, where the subject of this sketch was born, Oct. 18, 1804. In 1805 he removed to Addison Co., Vt., where, until twelve years of age, the son, Charles, enjoyed the privileges of a neighborhood school. He then devoted all his spare time to preparation for a higher sphere, and in August, 1822, entered Middlebury College; but the severe study to which his thirst for knowledge incited him produced a dyspepsia, which compelled him to abandon the course near the close of his first year. Several months were then devoted to the recovery of his health, and in the fall of 1823 he obtained the position of assistant in a school for young ladies, at Philadelphia, where he remained for two years. In 1826 he entered the law office of S. G. Huntington, at Troy, N. Y., where he studied for three years, and was then admitted to the bar. In September, 1829, he was married to Martha W. Larrabee, of Shoreham, Vt. Having formed a partnership with Henry W., a brother of the late Marshall M. Strong, of Racine, he removed, in the spring of 1830, to Seneca Falls, N. Y., and engaged in the practice of his profession, with excellent success, until 1834, when close application brought on a relapse of dyspepsia with such force that he relinquished his practice and returned to Vermont, with little hope of surviving. Here his health so far improved that he was enabled to engage in trade, which he followed until 1838, when, selling his mercantile stock, he set out in September of that year for Wisconsin, located land about Geneva lake, Walworth county, and became a resident of Geneva village, then in its infancy. Here he was first employed in public position by appointment as district attorney of the newly organized county, in 1839. He was a member of the Territorial council for the counties of Walworth and Rock for four years, commencing in 1842, and also of the first constitutional convention, in 1846. In 1848 he was appointed by the governor one of the three commissioners to revise and codify the statutes of Wisconsin, and in March, 1849, was elected by the legislature to superintend the printing of the volume, which was done at Albany, N. Y., in the fall of that year. In 1856 he was appointed by the governor to the bench of the circuit court, upon the resignation of Judge Doolittle, but, upon the expiration of the term, could not be induced to become a candidate for election. He did not hold a term of court in Green county. During the war, he was a commissioner under Provost Marshal Bean, in the first district.

His wife having died, he was married, in 1844, to Eliza Holt. His children by his first wife were two sons and a daughter. One of the sons is Hon. Robert H. Baker, a well known and prominent citizen of Racine. He died of apoplexy, at his home in Geneva, Feb. 5, 1872.

Judge Baker lent earnest and faithful assistance to every work for the advancement of the public welfare. He was prominent among the able men who laid well and wisely the foundations of society in the formations of the institutions of the young commonwealth; one whose high character, personal and professional integrity, superior ability and enlarged public spirit thus employed, have left a deep and lasting impression, although he shunned the arena of public life, and preferred rather its peaceful though less conspicuous councils.

JOHN M. KEEP.

The subject of this sketch, who was the second son of Gen. Martin Keep, was born at Homer, Cortland county, in the State of New York, on the 26th of January, 1813. His parents were both from New England, and among the first settlers of Cortland county. After obtaining the rudiments of education at the district school, he, at an early age, entered the Cortland Academy at Homer, where he pursued the usual routine of academic studies, and prepared himself for college. He entered the Hamilton College in 1832, and graduated in 1836, and was one of the first members of the Alpha Delta Phi society in that institution. The same year he commenced his legal studies, with Augustus Donnelly, a distinguished counselor at law, at Homer, N. Y., and completed them with Horatio Seymour, Esq., at Buffalo. He was duly admitted to the bar, and commenced practice at Westfield, N. Y., and, in the year 1845, he removed to Beloit, in the State of Wisconsin, then a mere settlement, where he continued to reside until his death. Here he engaged not only in a large law practice, but also took a very active part in all the enterprises that promised to promote the growth of the place and enhance the welfare of society, the purchase and sale of lands, in the erection of buildings, in the promotion of institutions of learning and the construction of railroads. He took an important part, and in many of these enterprises, was the animating spirit.

His mind seemed to grasp every subject, and his enterprise embraced every occupation. Though a lawyer by profession, and otherwise engaged in a variety of pursuits, agriculture did not escape his attention, or want his fostering care, for he knew that upon it depended the wealth, independence and morality of his adopted State. Whatever was good or useful, whatever tended to elevate human nature or ameliorate the condition of mankind, was sure to find in him cordial support and efficient aid. The value of his labors is to be estimated chiefly by the results flowing from his great and active mind—a mind rich in the possession of every moral and intellectual quality. In the young and growing State and city, of which he was a resident, no man impressed his name on more enterprises of private munificence or public utility.

In the spring of 1856, he was elected without opposition, judge of the first judicial circuit of the State of Wisconsin, but at the end of two and a half years, he was compelled to resign this laborious office on account of the loss of health, and the pressure of his private business. It soon became evident that consumption had fastened itself upon him, and from this time, the wasting of his bodily powers went on gradually, although he retained to the last moment of his life, the full vigor of his mind.

Upon the death of Judge Keep, meetings of the bar were held at Beloit, Janesville, and also of the first judicial circuit, and appropriate resolutions passed, and eulogies pronounced upon the life and services of the deceased. At the meeting of the bar of the circuit, the Hon. H. S. Conger, the present presiding judge, on taking the chair, said: "Judge Keep, however regarded, was no ordinary man. As a citizen, he was generous, benevolent and public spirited; of great firmness of character, untiring resolution and indomitable energy. He was bold, fearless and independent in thought and action; more resolute in the accomplishment of whatever he regarded his duty than solicitous to win praise or favor at any sacrifice of principle however small."

As a lawyer appreciating the responsibilities and duties of the profession, no man had a higher regard for its honor or reprobated more earnestly its prostitution to base purposes.

Elected circuit judge in 1856, and holding the office for two years, until impelled to resign on account of the pressure of his own private business, he carried to the discharge of the important duties of that office great ability, unwearied industry and honesty and integrity never assailed. In the language of another who knew him well: "He dignified the bench, rather than received dignity from it." The death of Judge Keep was a great loss, not only to the profession, but to the community at large. Calm, courageous, hopeful and trustful, he died as he lived, confiding in a faith that had never forsaken him, resigned to that Providence in whom was his trust, in the full possession of his mental faculties, vigorous even in death, and meeting the great change with the courage of a philosopher and the hope of the Christian. As much as there was in his life to emulate, there is in his death found instruction equally valuable. In religion, Mr. Keep was a Congregationalist, having united with that denomination at the age of sixteen years, and, like it, he was liberal and tolerant respecting the tenets of other denominations. He would tolerate every class of sincere professors, and protect them in their ideas of divine worship. In all the relations of life and the connections which he formed with various classes of the people, he preserved unblemished his Christian character. His charities more than kept pace with his ability, and his pecuniary aid and legal advice were ever at the service of the poor and unfortunate. Perhaps no better perspective of his life and character can be given than is contained in the following extract from a letter of recent date, from the pen of Hon. S. J. Todd, of Beloit, a long and intimate friend of Judge Keep: "As long as his health would permit, his life was a very busy one, and, unlike most men of active habits and whose mental processes are rapid, he had the faculty of steady, untiring perseverance. When he began to do anything, he never relinquished it until he had completed it, or, until it became impossible. This faculty I have usually found to exist only in slow men, which John M. Keep was not. When I first knew him he had been a resident of Beloit for six years. During this time he was engaged in the practice of law and in the purchase and sale of real estate; consequently, a very large number of men in Rock county and the adjoining counties of Boone and Winnebago, Ill., were living upon lands which they held under contract of purchase from him, and very many of these men, I think a majority of them, were always in arrears in the payment of principal and interest. He never declared a contract forfeited, and never brought suit against one of these purchasers so long as they stayed upon the land and exhibited a willingness to pay; but, on the other hand, whenever they had been unfortunate from the loss of crops or sickness, they were sure of substantial sympathy, which did not consist wholly of kind words, and he had the rare faculty of being charitable without assuming the air of patronage. These charities were large and manifold, yet they were given with so little ostentation that no one, however proud or sensitive he might be, was ever embarrassed or humiliated by receiving aid at his hands; and, more than this, he never spoke of these things. And this reminds me of another peculiarity in his character. He was the most reticent, self-reliant, self-controlled and the bravest man I ever met, without a single element of fear or diffidence, and, at the same time, he was the most truly modest man I have ever known, never exhibiting vanity or egotism, and consequently no man ever heard him exalt or speak boastingly of himself, or what he had done or intended to do. In this regard, he came fully up to Curran's description of Grattan, in his reply to Lord Erskine's question: 'What does Henry Grattan say of himself?' 'My lord,' says Curran, 'Henry Grattan never speaks of himself.' You could not draw an opinion out of him on that subject with a six-horse team. Further, as a rule, he never spoke of his enemies nor of his controversies with them. No matter what the gravity or magnitude of their charges or accusations might be, he was too indifferent to them, or too proud, to condescend to make any reply or explanation. The consequence was that he sometimes suffered in the public's estimation, and his best friends were often embarrassed by the contemptuous silence with which he treated the ground of the accusations. It is hardly necessary to speak of him as a judge, a position he filled with such eminent ability. As I remember him, he nearly realized my idea of a circuit judge. There, as elsewhere, he was composed, patient and impartial, always easy of approach by every one, quick in his perception of every case presented for his decision, and never too proud to re-consider his own decisions when he found that he was in the wrong. He died with the same steady composure that characterized him through life, thoughtful and considerate of those about him, until his last moment of life, when he closed his eyes in death

"Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch about him And lies down to pleasant dreams."

That Mr. Keep had enemies, no one is asked to doubt. All public men must have them, and the greater the man, the more bitter and powerful his enemies, as a rule. The collision of claims and the collision of interests, an ardent zeal on one side or the other of the question, political antagonisms—all conspire to create opposition, denunciation and ill-will. He was not one of those who feared to do anything lest he might do something wrong. He acted from principle, and when fully persuaded of the correctness of his position, never wavered or faltered in his course. If difficulties increased, his energy and resolution increased with them. If the circle of his confidential friends was contracted, it was not because he discarded friendships when they ceased to be profitable, but because he was reticent and self-engaged. He was never very compromising or conciliatory in his deportment. There was austerity as well as frankness in his manner that sometimes made him bitter opponents, but he had the happy faculty of retaining through life a host of warm friends, whose ardent love was proof of his private worth—more honorable to his character than even the prominence of his great abilities.

As a writer, he was clear, terse and didactic. His great endowments of disciplined thought imparted to his hastiest compositions elaborate force and the grace of perfection. Bold in his propositions, clear in his statements, rapid in execution, complete in demonstration, he was inexorable in his conclusions. Grant him his premises, and the result was as inevitable as fate. He did not fatigue himself with delicate metaphysical abstractions, nor bewilder his mind with speculative theories, but like an arrow impelled by a vigorous power, he shot directly to the mark. In all his qualifications as a judge, it may be said without questioning, that he had few equals, and no superior in the State. The dignity of the circuit court, while he presided over it, is still spoken of as a model of excellence, and his judicial opinions have established for him the reputation of an able lawyer.

As a public speaker, he was direct and logical, addressing himself to the reason and understanding, rather than to the passions and prejudices of men, and his conversational powers, when interested, were of the highest order. Before a deliberative body he was a man of great influence, but he was too much of a matter-of-fact man to indulge in popular harangues. His early political preference and party associations were with the Whigs, and later, with the republican party; but he displayed at all times great independence and high-mindedness, never yielding his own deliberate judgment to popular applause, or sacrificing his own convictions to the prevailing sentiments of the day, nor was he ever a candidate for any political office.

During his last days the excitement growing out of the disloyal and belligerent position of the Southern States became more and more intense, yet, notwithstanding his enfeebled condition, he watched with unusual interest all the proceedings in Congress until his feelings were roused with all the ardor of intense patriotism, and he frequently expressed a great desire to be restored to health, that he might participate in the impending struggle on the part of the Union.

In person, Mr. Keep was tall, erect and rather slender; his manner dignified and graceful; his eyes large, black and penetrating, and his whole countenance expressive of great energy and determination. His speech was pleasant, and all his motions seemed to partake of the increasing activity of his mind, and the most casual glance upon him in action or repose never failed to impress the beholder with an instinctive sense of his superiority.

He was married in 1839 to Cornelia A. Reynolds, daughter of John A. Reynolds, of Westfield, N. Y., a lady of rare culture and Christian virtues, who still survives him.

In the family circle, the place of all others to test genuine worth, Mr. Keep was tender and affectionate, very anxious for the welfare of his children, and particularly solicitous about their education.

He left four children, two sons and two daughters. He died on the 2d of March, 1861, aged forty-eight years, and, although but in middle life, few men have left such a record of private worth and public usefulness.

His death was a very remarkable one. In fact, death in its usual form never came near him. As said by Judge Conger, his end was indeed that of a philosopher, and his death the death of a Christian.

For two years, his strength wasted gradually until he had not sufficient left to draw a breath, and so he ceased to breathe. The morning on which he died he was dressed and occupied his easy chair, on which he had reposed during his sickness, looked over some papers from his safe, gave directions in regard to their disposition, conversed with his friends and neighbors, and the several members of his family separately, taking affectionate leave of each, but still, though his pulse had long ceased to beat, he was not ready to go, for he was waiting the expected arrival of his sister from Janesville, Mrs. Graham, who had been summoned to his side, and looking at his watch and noting the time of the arriving of the cars, he remarked, "I fear she has not come;" but watching the window, in a moment he said, "Indeed she has come." After a few minutes conversation with his sister, he said, "I am now ready to depart," and

*"Death broke at once the vital chain
And freed his soul the nearest way."*

This brief sketch of John M. Keep will be barely sufficient to give the reader a bird's-eye view of the excellency of his life, but the more secret and minute peculiarities which most endear him to his friends, can never be known, save to those whose personal relations to him were such as to enable them to form adequate estimates of his private virtues.

His chief qualities of natural greatness were moral courage, great energy, ready decision and an indomitable will. Few men possess these qualities in so remarkable a degree as John M. Keep, because few men are so profusely endowed with the omnipotence of genius. Systematic in the employment of his time, he was capable of doing rapidly and well what most persons could not perform without much time and labor. Bred to the bar, his mind was too original and of too broad a cast to be bound by those narrow and confined views which bind the mere lawyer to former precedents and adjudged cases; he combined the more noble properties of justice with legal adjudications commingling the principles of equity with legal rule, thus mitigating the too oft severity of legal despotism.

DAVID NOGGLE.

The subject of this sketch was born in Franklin, Penn., on the 9th of October, 1809. His father belonged to that class known as Pennsylvania Dutch; and his mother was of Irish descent. At the age of sixteen, he came to Greenfield, Ohio, and with his father, engaged in agricultural pursuits. The hardships which he experienced at this period, disciplined him for the struggles of after life. His educational advantages were limited. A few weeks only in the winter of each year were spent at the district school, where he manifested a taste for intellectual pursuits, and, at the age of twelve, he expressed a desire to reach the legal profession, but, because of the limited means of his parents, he received but little encouragement. At the age of nineteen, the young man started in search of more remunerative employment, in which he succeeded. In 1833, he returned to Ohio, to his father, who was embarrassed because of debt; whereupon he and his brother took the land and relieved their father of further anxiety. In 1834, they improved a water power on the farm, by building a mill, which proved a grand success. On the 13th of October, 1835, David was married to Ann M. Lewis, of Milan, Ohio. About a year afterward, they started with ox teams for Winnebago Co., Ill., where they settled.

The new farm of the young married couple began to show marks of improvement, while at the same time the husband was looking forward with hopes of entering the legal profession. It is said that, during these days "He studied Blackstone in the cornfield," which is literally true; and, in 1838, he was admitted to the bar by the Supreme Court of Illinois—he never having spent a day in a law office.

In 1839, Mr. Noggle sold his land claim and moved into Beloit, where he opened an office and fully entered upon the practice of the law, doing business in Winnebago and Boone counties, Illinois, and in Rock, Walworth, Jefferson and Green, in the Territory of Wisconsin. His efforts in court proved him to be a man of power. In 1846, he was a member of the constitutional convention of Wisconsin; and, though young and inexperienced in legislation, was soon recognized among the leaders of that body. He stood with the progressive elements of the convention in favor of homestead exemption, elective judiciary, the rights of married women, and opposed to banks and banking. In 1834, he was a member of the legislature of Wisconsin from the Janesville district, having some years before removed from Beloit to that place; he at once took a prominent and leading position in the legislature.

In 1856, Mr. Noggle was again elected to the legislature, and was tendered the speakership of the assembly by more than a majority of that body, but being compelled, from temporary lameness to go on crutches, which would greatly inconvenience him in discharging the duties of a presiding officer, he declined the offer. He was emphatically the leader of the House in this legislature, and in the contest for the election of United States senator, in which J. R. Doolittle was first chosen.

Subsequently the subject of this sketch was judge of the first judicial district of Wisconsin, composed of the counties of Kenosha, Racine, Walworth, Rock and Green. He discharged his duties as judge with great acceptability. After he retired from the bench, he moved to Prairie du Chien and practiced law in Crawford county two years, at the end of which time, he moved back to Janesville, and was soon after appointed United States district judge of the Territory of Idaho. His health failed under the exposure of frontier life and the duties of his office, and he resigned, and returned to Janesville, but he never rallied, and died with softening of the brain a year or two after coming back to Wisconsin. Judge Noggle possessed a large and powerful physique and a massive brain; and, although he had but a limited literary education, he was a brilliant orator and a very able advocate. He was a man of strong impulses and decided convictions, and hence was a steadfast friend and a bitter enemy.

WILLIAM PENN LYON.

William Penn Lyon, of Madison, was born Oct. 28, 1822, at Chatham, Columbia Co., N. Y. His parents were members of the religious Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, and he was brought up in that faith and still clings to its cardinal doctrines. He attended an ordinary country district school until eleven years of age, when he was taken from school and placed as clerk in a small store kept by his father in his native town. After this he attended select schools at intervals, a few terms, amounting in all to about one year. These were the only school advantages he ever enjoyed. But with these, and a reasonable use of his leisure time, he acquired, for those days a fair English education, including a limited knowledge of algebra, geometry, Latin and natural philosophy. At the age of fifteen years he taught a district school with indifferent success in his own estimation. He freely admits that school teaching was not his forte. From fifteen to eighteen years of age he was mainly employed as a clerk in a grocery store in the city of Albany. During that time he spent most of his leisure hours in attendance upon the courts and the legislature—his tastes leading him strongly, in those directions—and eagerly listened to arguments and speeches made by such men as Erastus Root, Samuel Young, Judge Peckham, Judge Harris, Ambrose L. Jordan, and numerous others whose names have since become famous. He was always greatly impressed with the candor, dignity and impartiality of Luther Bradish, then the lieutenant-governor of the State and president of the Senate.

In 1841, when in his nineteenth year, he emigrated with his father and family to Wisconsin and settled in what is now the town of Lyons, Walworth county, where he resided until 1850. With the exception of two terms of school teaching he worked on a farm until the spring of 1844, when he entered the office of the late Judge George Gale, then a practicing lawyer at Elkhorn, as a law student. But before this he had read Blackstone's and Kent's commentaries quite thoroughly. He remained a few months with Judge Gale, but returned home to work through harvest. He was soon after attacked with acute inflammation of the eyes, and was thereby incapacitated to read or teach for nearly a year. That year he worked on the mill at Lyons, then in process of erection, and in the races leading to and from the same, at $12 per month, earning $100. In the fall of 1845 he entered the law office of the late Judge Charles M. Baker, at Geneva, as a student, and remained there until the spring of 1846, when he was admitted by the district court of Walworth county as an attorney. Having been chosen one of the justices of the peace of the town of Hudson, now Lyons, he at once opened an office at the village of Lyons, and commenced the practice of the law, but in a very small way. His receipts for professional and official business the first year were $60, the second $180, the third $400, and fourth $500. His income had increased so largely that during the second year, which was 1847, he married and thus became the head of a family. But rent, fuel and provisions were cheaper in those days than they now are, and his income proved quite ample for their support.

In 1850 he formed a partnership with the late C. P. Barnes, of Burlington, in Racine county, and removed to that place where he remained until the spring of 1855, when he removed to the city of Racine, where he continued in the active practice of his profession until the breaking out of the war in 1861. He was district attorney of Racine county from 1855 to 1858 inclusive. He was chosen a member of the Lower House of the Wisconsin legislature of 1859, and was made speaker. It is a very unusual proceeding for one who has never been a member of a legislative body to be thus called to the delicate duties of presiding officer, but, in this case the choice was abundantly justified by the conspicuously capable manner in which the duties were discharged. He was re-elected a member of the assembly the following year and was again chosen speaker without a contest in the caucus of republican members. He retired from his second term in that position at the age of thirty-eight, with the warm friendship of the members without distinction of party, with an enviable reputation throughout the State, and with the promise, which has been fully realized of a useful and honorable public career.

Judge Lyon is peculiarly one for whom the "pomp, pride and circumstances of glorious war" could have had no seductions; but when the call of patriotic duty reached him, it fell upon no dull ear. One hundred splendid citizen soldiers enlisted under him, and he was commissioned captain of company K, of the 8th Wisconsin Infantry. Entering the military service in September, 1861, he remained therein four years, having been, at the close of the war, mustered out in Texas in September, 1865. He had served one year as captain of company K, 8th Wisconsin, and the remainder of the time as colonel of the 13th Wisconsin, and at the close of the war was brevetted a brigadier general. His military career, he thinks, was not particularly brilliant, but he claims to have discharged his duty with reasonable fidelity.

In the summer following the close of the war there was a splendid pageant at Madison, on the occasion of the formal presentation to the State of the battle flags of the several regiments that Wisconsin had sent into the field. Gen. Lyon was chosen to deliver the address, and pronounced an oration of impressive eloquence.

Before Gen. Lyon had been mustered out of the military service he was chosen judge of the first judicial circuit, comprising the counties of Racine, Kenosha, Walworth, Rock and Green. He entered upon the duties of that position on Dec. 5, 1865, and served for five years with a degree of ability that won unqualified commendation from all. In 1870 he was made the republican candidate for Congress in the fourth district of Wisconsin, but was defeated at the polls by Alexander Mitchell.

The death of Byron Paine having created a vacancy on the bench of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in January, 1871, Judge Lyon was appointed by Gov. Fairchild associate justice, he having continued to exercise jurisdiction over the first circuit after its Territorial limits had been changed until this time. In the April following he was elected for the unexpired term, and for the full term succeeding. In 1877 he was re-elected, without opposition, for a term which expired in 1884, and is now serving on his third full term. The people of Wisconsin have been almost uniformly happy in the constitution of their highest judicial tribunal. And there have been none more deserving of confidence than he who now sits as senior associate justice. His knowledge of law is thorough and his instinct of equity perfect, his mind has an equipoise that the scales of the blindfolded goddess cannot surpass, and his integrity is such as to class him with those into whose presence corruptionists dare not venture.

His wife is Adelia C., daughter of the late Dr. E. E. Duncomb, of St. Thomas, Ontario, Canada. They have two surviving children—Clara, born in 1857, and William Penn, Jr., born in 1861.

formerly judge of the twelfth judicial circuit, was born in Cortland Co., N. Y., where he read and practiced law until he came to Janesville, in 1855. While a resident of Cortland county he took a lively interest in political affairs, and while pursuing his legal studies he purchased the Cortland County Whig, which he edited with ability and earnestness for six years; at the expiration of this period the young editor sold it out and gave his entire time and energies to his profession. Shortly after his admission to the bar, much to his surprise, he was nominated to Congress by the whig convention in 1846. Owing to the political complexion of the district, many believed that the nomination was only an empty honor; but, contrary to general expectation, Mr. Conger was elected to the 30th Congress, and was re-elected in 1848, although his opponent was his old preceptor, and one of the ablest and most popular men in the district. After serving two terms in Congress he gave his undivided attention to his profession, allowing nothing to divert him from the pursuit of his life. After twenty-five years experience as an attorney, a ripe scholar, a well trained lawyer, an honest man, he was elected judge of this circuit in 1870; re-elected in 1876.

Free from obnoxious partisanship as it is possible for a man to be, he proved to be a most satisfactory and capable judicial officer. He died on the 22d day of October, 1882, in Janesville, Wis.

JOHN R. BENNETT, present judge of the twelfth judicial circuit, was born at Rodman, Jefferson Co., N. Y., on the 1st day of November, 1820; he was the second son and third child of Daniel Bennett and Deborah Leeds Bennett, whose maiden name was Spicer; his father and mother were descendants from English Puritan ancestors, who settled in the State of Connecticut about the year 1640. His father was born in the town of Stonington, in that State, on the 16th day of February, 1793. The fourth son of David Bennett and Rebecca Bennett, whose maiden name was Miner and David, was the son of Stephen and Mehitable Bennett. His mother was the daughter of William Spicer and Hannah Spicer, whose maiden name was Hannah Leeds, being the daughter of Gideon Leeds of the city of Leeds, England. His father being a farmer in comfortable circumstances the son worked at home on the farm, attending the common district school until the fall of 1839, when he commenced attending the Black River Literary and Religious Institute, located at Watertown, N. Y., and prepared for teaching school, which he engaged in that fall, and from that time until the month of April, 1844; continued attending this school at Watertown, and teaching district and select schools. He then entered upon the study of law in the office of Western W. Wager, at Brownsville, Jefferson Co., N. Y., reading with him about six months. On the 28th day of November, 1844, at Hounsfield, Jefferson Co., N. Y., he was married to Elsie L. Holloway, the daughter of Charles and Chloe Holloway, whose sweet gentle influence has ever tended to lead him in the proper and pleasant paths of life, and to be under the guidance of the better angel of his nature; the purity of her life, the wisdom of her counsel and the comfort of her society, are still continued to him by a beneficent Providence, and are the sources of his greatest happiness. In the month of April, 1845, he commenced reading law in the office of Dyre N. Burnham, of Sacketts Harbor, N. Y., and continued reading with him until the 8th day of May, 1848, when he was admitted to practice in all the courts of that State. On the 2d day of October, 1848, he started for the west, reaching Janesville, Wis., October 13, where he located, and has since practiced his profession;

he has no children, but has adopted two sisters, Minnie and Kitty Parry, who have assumed his name and have been with him now over twenty-years, and are the light and joy of his home. They have been with him since they were respectively, four and two years of age. Mr. Bennett's practice, which has gradually increased from its commencement at Janesville, is confined mostly to Rock, Walworth, Jefferson and Green counties, and the Supreme Court of the State. From 1863 to 1867, he held the office of district attorney of Rock county, and, in 1860, was a delegate to the National republican convention, held at Chicago, which nominated Abraham Lincoln for President; without being a candidate, he was nominated, in 1875, by the republican State convention for attorney general, but was defeated with the rest of the ticket, with the exception of Harrison Ludington, the candidate for governor. In religious belief he is a New Churchman, or Swedenborgian, as the members of the denomination are more frequently called; they hold that the Sacred Scriptures, unlike all human composition, contain within the letter a spiritual sense as far above the literary sense in beauty, brightness and power, as the immortal soul exceeds the perishable body, in which it "groans in this life, being burdened;" he counts it a fortunate circumstance that his ancestors, so far as he has any knowledge of them, were deeply religious, and for the pious instructions received from his parents, who now, he trusts, occupy the everlasting abodes of the blessed, he is under a debt of gratitude which can never be repaid.

The counties in the twelfth circuit, the times of holding court in each, and the places where they are held, are set forth in the following tabular statement:

TWELFTH CIRCUIT.

No jury shall be summoned for either of the terms in this circuit appointed to be held in the months of January and June. Every term in this circuit shall also be a special term for the whole judicial circuit.—Section 2424, Revised Statutes.

COUNTY COURT OF GREEN COUNTY.

The act of Congress which provided for the organization of Wisconsin Territory, declared that the judicial power therein should be vested not only in a Supreme Court, district courts and justices of the peace, but also in probate courts, the last named being the same courts now denominated county courts. During the continuance of Wisconsin Territory the judges of these last mentioned courts were called "probate judges;" and prior to 1843, they were appointed by the governor, although none was appointed for this county.

County courts were established in Wisconsin by chapter 86 of the Revised Statutes of 1849; and the jurisdiction and powers previously exercised by probate courts were transferred to them. Civil jurisdiction was to a limited extent vested in them, but was soon after taken away.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

JOHN A. BINGHAM.

John Augustine Bingham was born at Morristown, Vt., Feb., 27, 1819, the son of John and Lydia (Thompson) Bingham. His parents were descended from early Puritan stock, and farmers by occupation, industrious, energetic, practical, and sternly religious, as only New England Puritans have been or can be. His father was a man of unusual size, strength and endurance, and enjoyed the reputation of being able to do more work than any other man in his part of the country. His grandfather, also named John, was likewise a large, powerful man, even larger than his son, and was not less noted for the virtues. The mother of our subject, a most exemplary woman, is remembered for her remarkably happy and hopeful disposition. To her the worst disaster appeared "better than it might have been." Under the most adverse circumstances health, peace and prosperity, the three blessings she was wont formally to invoke on her friends, were always near at hand. Though descended from a shorter-lived, less vigorous and less practical family, than her husband, she held with him the New England idea of work. The subject of this sketch taught school the winter he was fifteen years of age, having among his pupils young men five years his senior, but, so far as he could judge, not one of them ever suspected their teacher of being their junior. Before he taught his first school he urged his father to send him to the Montpelier Academy, but the father, confidently believing that the boy had learning enough, that more would only make him lazy, refused. But finally, weary of his importunities, he replied to the oft repeated request: "If you get the potatoes dug and housed before school begins you may go." To the father's surprise, the potatoes were safely stored in the cellar before the day appointed, having been dug and carried to the house at the rate of fifty bushels per day. The father, who had supposed the fulfillment of the conditions impossible, reluctantly granted his son's request. But the first appeal of the boy for money to defray his expenses overcame the conscientious scruples in deference to which he had permitted him to go, and his reply was: "Come home." In this instance John disobeyed, not returning to the parental roof till the end of the first quarter, but paying his own expenses by sawing firewood for the institution. Subsequently, when he earned money by teaching, he attended for a short time an academy at Johnson, Vt. He assisted his father during the farming season, until he attained his majority. During the intervals of farm labor he studied surveying and read law in the office of an attorney at Stowe, Vt. From the age of fifteen he earned by teaching, surveying, selling books on subscription, or by some manual labor, the means to purchase his own clothing and books. To procure the books he needed he was often obliged to sell those he already possessed. This necessity he regarded as a great misfortune, and so impressed him that in after years he insisted that his own children should retain every book studied by them, from the primer to the science of government, nor would he consent, under any circumstances, to a deviation from this rule. In the summer of 1841 Mr. Bingham removed to Milwaukee, Wis. He afterwards traveled on foot over southeastern Wisconsin and northeastern Illinois; taught school one term at Rochester, Racine Co., Wis., and in February, 1842, settled in Monroe, Green county, where he opened a law office and resided during the remainder of his days.

On the 25th day of November, 1843, he married Caroline E. Churchill, a woman of fine intellect and strong character, in whom he found a faithful and loving wife. She was born at Ridge Prairie, Ill., June 26, 1824, and still lives at Monroe.

During the years 1846 and 1847, Mr. Bingham was district attorney of Green county, and afterward held for eight years the office of probate judge of the county, the duties of which he discharged with rigid and characteristic exactness, and won for himself the respect and unlimited confidence of all who knew him. In 1854 he opened a broker's office, which subsequently grew into the Bank of Monroe, the first bank organized in the county. A few years later he was conspicuously active in connection with the building of the Monroe branch of the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad.

Judge Bingham was one of the most gifted men of the State. His intellect was of that broad and comprehensive character which grasped the true relation of circumstances in every aspect in which they might be presented to him. As a lawyer he was full of resources, and his opponents at the bar never felt sure that he was beaten until a judgment in their favor had been actually executed. As a business man and administrator of affairs his accuracy of judgment was remarkable, and this united with a profound knowledge of human nature, was a great secret of his success. His mind was clear and vigorous, as well as broad and capacious. On questions of State and national policy he never failed to perceive and defend with signal ability the foundation principles which should govern the public mind. He looked upon shams of every kind with contempt, and was rarely if ever, deceived by them. In politics he was formerly a whig, and always anti-slavery in principles. He was an earnest supporter of Fremont in 1856, and of Lincoln in 1860, and was a member of the national convention that re-nominated the latter in 1864. To his influence is largely due the revolution in the politics of his county, which, formerly largely democratic, is now overwhelmingly republican. He was an ardent supporter of the government during the Civil War, and it was a source of great sorrow to him that failing health prevented his entering more actively into the service of his country.

Judge Bingham took active interest in all matters of public improvement, contributing freely both time and money to the success of enterprises which met his approval. Above everything else he was the friend of education, and no other man ever did so much for the schools of Monroe. For months at a time he visited them daily, watching the progress of favorite classes, counseling teachers, and studying methods of instruction. He possessed a natural love of teaching, and was peculiarly happy in his mode of imparting information. This disposition, sharpened and intensified by the difficulties he had encountered in procuring an education, led him to take great pleasure in assisting all young men, and especially poor and ambitious youths who were struggling to gain an education. Having helped himself he understood the value of self-help, and never squandered money in any enterprise because it was labeled "benevolence." Every effort calculated to better qualify men to help themselves, or to render them temporary relief from pressing difficulties, commanded his cordial support; and during the last years of his life a large constituency, whom he counseled gratuitously, regularly sought his advice in regard to the conduct of all their more important affairs.

The community also leaned upon and trusted his judgment as it had never trusted that of any other man, and when he was prematurely stricken down his acquaintances felt that their strongest and ablest man was gone.

He had six children, three sons and three daughters, five of whom survive. The eldest son, Horace, died in infancy; Homer, the second son, was educated at Cornell University, New York, and is at present (1876) attending the law department of the Wisconsin University, with a view to the profession of his father, and is a youth of fine presence and large promise; Herbert still in his teens, is attending the Monroe High School; the daughters, Helen M., Alice and Ada, all graduates of the Lombard University, Galesburg, Ill. Alice is the widow of the late Prof. Herbert E. Copeland, for some years professor of natural science in the Whitewater, Wis., Normal School, and latterly in a similar institution in Indianapolis, Ind. He died on the 12th of December, 1876. Helen is a well known contributor to the current literature of the day, and has been for some time past engaged in writing a history of Green county, a task for the successful accomplishment of which her tastes and talents eminently fit her. Ada is a medical student at the Boston University, and gives promise of a bright and successful career.

Judge Bingham died at Johnson, Vt., July 24, 1865, having been stricken down by paralysis while on a visit to his native State.

BROOKS DUNWIDDIE

was born in Green Co., Ohio, Jan. 22, 1818. His parents were John and Ruth (Betts) Dunwiddie. About the time of the Revolution, two brothers came from southern Ireland to America, and enlisted in a Maryland regiment. One of them was killed at the battle of Brandywine. The surviving brother, John Dunwiddie, settled upon the eastern shore of Maryland. He married and raised a family of children, of which John, one of his sons, was the father of the subject of this sketch, he marrying Ruth Betts, in the State of Delaware, a step-daughter of a Mr.

Merideth. John Dunwiddie last mentioned, removed to Ohio, where he died in 1829.

Brooks Dunwiddie remained with his mother until her death, which occurred from cholera in 1834. He was afterwards sent to school by an older brother, and graduated with honors at Harveysburg Seminary, Clinton Co., Ohio. At the age of nineteen he entered the law office of Thomas Corwin, in Lebanon, Ohio. He studied law in Corwin's office eighteen months. Before applying for admission to the bar, two cousins who had recently emigrated from Uniontown, Penn., to Green Co., Wis., passed through the place where Mr. Dunwiddie was at that time boarding, on his way from Clinton Co., Ohio, with a drove of sheep to Wisconsin. The cousins gave such glowing accounts of their new home in Wisconsin and of sheep herding, and of wild prairies, that Mr. Dunwiddie decided for the time being to abandon his law studies, and go with his cousins to Wisconsin. He arrived in Green county in August, 1842. He remained in Wisconsin during the following winter, and in the spring returned to Warren Co., Ohio, and, in company with his brother Hiram, purchased a lot of sheep, and the two brothers returned to Wisconsin in August, 1843. In three years after that Brooks Dunwiddie herded his sheep and sold his clip in Milwaukee.

In 1846, about the 1st of July, the weather set in unusually hot and continued so until in September. A large proportion of the population was attacked with chills and fever—and among the victims was the subject of this sketch. The result was that he could not watch his sheep, and frequently for long periods no one could be hired to attend his flock. Wolves were plenty, and ever on the watch to kill sheep. The result was that his herd, during summer and fall of 1846, was nearly destroyed. The malady of chills and fever afflicted him for about eighteen months. The result was his herd was reduced so low that in 1847 he sold his sheep to a Hungarian at Sank Prairie, and took in pay Territorial scrip; and, before that was converted into money, it was shaved, which was as much damage as the loss of sheep by the wolves.

This was the end of Mr. Dunwiddie's sheep-herding. His capital was now exhausted, first by wolves, second by loss on Territorial scrip; and eighteen months' sickness left him broken down in health.

The only thing he could do was to turn his attention again to the law. Having a complete set of elementary law books, he commenced a review of the law, and applied at the June term of the circuit court in 1848, and was admitted to the bar. He thereupon opened an office at Monroe, Wis. Mr. Dunwiddie was a whig in politics. In the fall of 1848, there were three political parties in the field. He was elected by a plurality to the office of district attorney, serving two years. After that, the democrats regained power and elected a full county ticket in 1850.

The people of Wisconsin had by this time made considerable progress in building the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad, terminating at Prairie du Chien, and, in 1854, the road was completed to Madison, with a branch to Janesville. The people of southern Wisconsin embarked in the enterprise of building a road from Janesville to Dubuque. The agents of the company held out flattering inducements to the farmers along the line of road to subscribe liberally for the stock of the company, and pay in bonds maturing in ten years with interest coupons attached, secured by mortgages on real estate. The farmers on the line of the road between Janesville and Dubuque subscribed to the stock about $500,000, and gave farm mortgages as security. Subsequently these mortgages gave the farmers much trouble.

In the fall of 1855, the farmers brought Mr. Dunwiddie's name before the stockholders' meeting, and he was made a member of the board of directors, to look after their interests. The half million of securities finally became pledged as securities for the loan of $500,000, a part of the floating debt of the company. In July, 1857, the company became insolvent, and the road was turned over to a trustee. This made the stock of the company worthless, and left the farmers wholly unpaid which in most cases was nearly equal to the value of the land. Absolute ruin now stared the farmers in the face, but Mr. Dunwiddie set his wits to work to extricate the farmers from this enormous debt. He found that the first mortgage was not originally given on the rolling stock and personal property of the company, though, after the sale of the road and of the farm mortgage bonds, the legislature passed a law giving the first mortgage bond holders a lien on the rolling stock and personal property. Mr. Dunwiddie contended that this was in fraud of all the creditors of the company. The farm mortgage bonds only being turned out as collateral to the debts of the company, the holders of the securities were, of course, creditors of the company.

Mr. Dunwiddie opened negotiations with the holders of the farm mortgage securities, requesting them to sue the company and attach their rolling stock and personal property, which was amply sufficient to pay the floating debts of half a million secured by farmers' bonds as collateral. This proposition was assented to by the holders of the floating debt and attachment suits were about to be commenced when the trustee managing the road "called a halt," and an arrangement was made with him to issue a new class of stock and sell the same in the New York market, the proceeds to be applied in redemption of the farm mortgages. This was done by the trustee, and the farm mortgages were redeemed. Had not Mr. Dunwiddie discovered that the rolling stock could not be held by the first mortgage on the road, the farmers would have been left to pay their mortgages. The farmers, from Milton Junction to Dubuque, were thus relieved by this proceeding.

In July, 1854, Mr. Dunwiddie, with many citizens from Green county, attended the mass meeting at Madison to organize the republican party. He was a member of the committee on resolutions, and in conjunction with C. F. Thompson was instrumental in procuring John Walworth to be elected permanent chairman of the convention. He has identified himself with the republican party to the present time.

Mr. Dunwiddie was elected county judge in the spring of 1857, as an independent candidate and has been re-elected at each succeeding election, in the same manner.

Judge Dunwiddie has continued to practice in the circuit court, though the practice has not been lucrative to him. In his official capacity, he has acquitted himself with honor, and to the satisfaction of the people of Green county, as evidenced by their continuing him in office for so many years. He was married to Sarah Yarger, July 10, 1855. Mr. and Mrs. Dunwiddie have four children—William, Mary, John and Edna.

CHAPTER XIII.

COMMON SCHOOLS OF THE COUNTY.

The common schools of Green county, like many other of its material interests, have developed step by step, growth upon growth, ever widening and deepening to meet the wants of an increasing population, until today they stand abreast with the times. They have reached their present excellence from small beginnings. An account of their rise and progress is an interesting page in the history of the county. It may not be amiss, in this connection, before entering upon a particular consideration of them, to give to our readers from the pen of one of the leading educator's of the northwest, a narrative of the development of education in Wisconsin, from its commencement to the date when the system of county superintendency was established, the first day of the year, 1862, to be followed by an account of Green county common schools, by the present county superintendent.

EDUCATIONAL HISTORY.*

"From the time of the earliest event of the families of French traders into the region now known as Wisconsin, to the year 1818, when that region became part of Michigan Territory, education was mostly confined to private instruction, or was sought by the children of the wealthier in the distant cities of Quebec, Montreal and Detroit. The early Jesuit missionaries, and—subsequently to 1816, when it came under the military control of the United States—representatives of various other religious denominations sought to teach the Indian tribes of this section. In 1823 Rev. Eleazar Williams, well known for his subsequent claim to be the Dauphin of France, and who was in the employ of the Episcopal Missionary society, started a school of white and half-breed children on the west side of Fox river, opposite "Shanty Town." A Catholic mission school for Indians was organized by an Italian priest near Green Bay, in 1830. A clause of the treaty with the Winnebago Indians, in 1832, bound the United States to maintain a school for their children near Prairie du Chien for a period of twenty-seven years.

THE ORIGINAL SCHOOL CODE.

From 1818 to 1836, Wisconsin formed a part of Michigan Territory. In the year 1837, Michigan was admitted into the Union as a State, and Wisconsin, embracing what is now Minnesota, Iowa, and a considerable region still further westward, was, by act of Congress, approved April 20 of the year previous, established as a separate Territory. The act provided that the existing laws of the Territory of Michigan should be extended over the new Territory so far as compatible with the provisions of the act, subject to alteration or repeal by the new government created. Thus with the other statutes, the school code of Michigan became the original code of Wisconsin, and it was soon formally adopted, with almost no change, by the first Territorial legislature, which met at Belmont. Although modified in some of its provisions almost every year, this imperfect code continued in force until the adoption of the State constitution in 1848. The first material changes in the code were made by the Territorial legislature at its second session, in 1837, by the passage of a bill to regulate the sale of school lands, and to provide for organizing, regulating and perfecting common schools.

“It was provided in this act that as soon as twenty electors should reside in a surveyed township, they should elect a board of three commissioners, holding office three years, to lay off districts, to apply the proceeds of the leases of school lands to the payment of teachers’ wages, and to call school meetings. It was also provided that each district should elect a board of three directors, holding office one year, to locate school houses, hire teachers for at least three months in the year, and levy taxes for the support of schools. It was further provided that a third board of five inspectors should be elected annually in each town to examine and license teachers and inspect the schools. Two years subsequently (1839) the law was revised and the family, instead of the electors, was made the basis of the town organization. Every town with not less than ten families, was made a school district and required to provide a competent teacher. More populous towns were divided into two or more districts. The office of town commissioner was abolished, its duties with certain others, being transferred to the inspectors. The rate-bill system of taxation, previously in existence, was repealed, and a tax on the whole county for building school houses and supporting schools, was provided for. One or two years later the office of town Commissioners was restored, and the duties of the inspectors were assigned to the same. Other somewhat important amendments were made at the same time.

“In 1840 a memorial to Congress from the legislature, represented that the people were anxious to establish a common school system, with suitable resources for its support. From lack of sufficient funds many of the schools were poorly organized. The rate-bill tax or private subscription was often necessary to supplement the scanty results of county taxation. Until a State government should be organized, the fund accruing from the sale of school lands could not be available. Congress had made to Wisconsin, as to other new States, for educational purposes, a donation of lands. These lands embraced the sixteenth section in every township in the State, and 500,000 acres to which the State was entitled by the provisions of an act of Congress passed in 1841, and any grant of lands from the United States, the purposes of which were not specified. To obtain the benefits of this large fund was a leading object in forming the State constitution.

AGITATION FOR FREE SCHOOLS.

“Shortly before the admission of the State the subject of free schools began to be quite widely discussed. In February, 1845, Col. M. Frank, of Kenosha, a member of the Territorial legislature, introduced a bill which became a law, authorizing the legal voters of his own town to vote taxes on all the assessed property for the full support of its schools. A provision of the act required its submission to the people of the town before it could take effect. It met with strenuous opposition, but after many public meetings and lectures held in the interests of public enlightenment, the act was ratified by a small majority in the fall of 1845, and thus the first free school in the State was legally organized. Subsequently, in the legislature, in the two constitutional conventions, and in educational assemblies, the question of a free school system for the new State soon to be organized provoked much interest and discussion. In the constitution framed by the convention of 1846, was provided the basis of a free school system similar to that in our present constitution.

“The question of establishing the office of State superintendent, more than any other feature of the proposed school system, elicited discussion in that body. The necessity of this office, and the advantages of free schools supported by taxation, were ably presented to the convention by Hon. Henry Barnard, of Connecticut, in an evening address. He afterward prepared, by request, a draft of a free school system, with a State superintendent at its head, which was accepted and subsequently embodied in the constitution and the school law. In the second constitutional convention, in 1848, the same questions again received careful attention, and the article on education previously prepared was, after a few changes, brought into the shape in which we now find it. Immediately after the ratification by the people of the constitution prepared by the second convention, three commissioners were appointed to revise the statutes. To one of these, Col. Frank, the needed revision of the school laws was assigned. The work was acceptably performed, and the new school code of 1849, largely the same as the present one, went into operation May 1st of that year.

THE SCHOOL SYSTEM UNDER THE STATE GOVERNMENT.

"In the State constitution was laid the broad foundation of our present school system. The four corner stones were: (1) The guaranteed freedom of the schools; (2) the school fund created; (3) the system of supervision; (4) a State University for higher instruction. The school fund has five distinct sources for its creation indicated in the constitution: (1) Proceeds from the sale of lands granted to the States by the United States for educational purposes; (2) all moneys accruing from forfeiture or escheat; (3) all fines collected in the several counties for breach of the penal laws; (4) all moneys paid for exemption from military duty; (5) five percent of the sale of government lands, within the State. In addition to these constitutional sources of the school fund, another and sixth source was open from 1856 to 1870.

"By an act of the State legislature in the former year, three-fourths of the net proceeds of the sales of the swamp and overflowed lands, granted to the State by Congress, Sept. 28, 1850, were added to the common school fund, the other fourth going into a fund for drainage, under certain circumstances; but, if not paid over to any town for that purpose within two years, to become a part of the school fund. The following year one of these fourths was converted into the normal school fund, leaving one-half for the common school fund. In 1858 another fourth was given to the drainage fund, thus providing for the latter one-half the income from the sales, and leaving for the school fund, until the year 1865, only the remaining one-fourth. In the latter year this was transferred to the normal school fund, with the provision, however, that one-fourth of the income of this fund should be transferred to the common school fund until the annual income of the latter fund should reach $200,000. In 1870 this provision was repealed, and the whole income of the normal fund left applicable to the support of normal schools and teachers' institutes.

"At the first session of the State legislature in 1848, several acts were passed which carried out in some degree the educational provisions of the constitution. A law was enacted to provide for the election, and to define the duties of a State superintendent of public instruction. A district board was created, consisting of a moderator, director and treasurer; the office of town superintendent was established, and provision was made for the creation of town libraries, and for the distribution of the school fund. The present school code of Wisconsin is substantially that passed by the legislature of 1848, and which went into operation May 1, 1849. The most important change since made was the abolition of the office of town superintendent, and the substitution therefore of the county superintendency. This change took effect Jan. 1, 1862."

OF THE COMMON SCHOOLS OF GREEN COUNTY.

[BY D. H. MORGAN, COUNTY SUPERINTENDENT.]

It is somewhat difficult to give a readable and entertaining history of the educational interests of Green, or any other county of Wisconsin, as few records are in existence, which were made prior to the establishing of county supervision. Up to that time, from the time of the admission of Wisconsin as a State, the town supervision prevailed, with varying success. Successful in those towns fortunate enough to secure the services of competent superintendents. In no case, so far as can be learned, was there any unity of action among teachers or superintendents; each working in his own way regardless of the doings of others. No teachers' meetings or meetings of superintendents for devising and maturing plans for the general improvement of management or methods, or for advancing the standard of qualification of teachers.

Thirty years ago the school buildings were necessarily cheap and poorly adapted to school purposes. Building material was scarce and of poor quality; people were poor, but anxious to do something toward educating their children, and taxed themselves willingly for the purpose of furnishing buildings and teachers.

Many of the first settlers being Eastern people, an early interest in all school work was manifest, and, it may be safe to say that that interest has kept even pace with the material prosperity of the people. Thirty years ago there was not a school building in the county that was worth $1,000. Now there are many of our country districts with buildings costing from $1,200 to $1,500, to say nothing of the buildings in some of our villages that have cost from $5,000 to $25,000.

When, on the establishment of the county supervision system, the people of this county elected William C. Green to the office of county superintendent, they were very fortunate in their selection. He was a man somewhat advanced in years, but thoroughly awake to the needs of school interests, and competent in every way to perform the duties of his position. He was well versed in the whole business of schools. When he called the teachers together for the first time requiring them to submit to a written examination, there was consternation in their ranks. A large majority of them had never been examined in that manner, and it seemed terrible. But Mr. Green held firmly to the adage, "as is the teacher so is the school," and determined to advance the standard of qualification, and it is conceded by all that his success was marked and decided. Teachers went to work with a will, now being fully aware that nothing short of the superintendent's requirements would answer. Aside from the semi-annual examinations, institutes and teachers' meetings were held, though not so well attended then as now, for they—the teachers—did not so fully comprehend the advantages derived from them.

Mr. Green served six years, and with a zeal and honesty of purpose never excelled. He paved the way, removed obstacles, and left the work for his successor in most excellent shape. He took the work in the rough and hewed to the line, never looking where the chips might fly.

He traveled among the schools, entering the school rooms unannounced, often the first indication of his presence being a salutation from him, almost startling. It is well remembered by one teacher, who had an unruly boy in hand, and handling him pretty roughly too, that he was interrupted by an exclamation of "Well! well! these things will happen in the best of families."

There was an attempt on the part of some to put him down by the cry of "Old Orthography," because he insisted that his teachers should understand that as well as any other branch that they were required to teach. It was fully understood that excuses were not in order, the subject had to be mastered. Those who had had considerable experience finding themselves deficient in certain branches, procured the necessary books and went to work.

For the last twenty years the school census has shown little change as to number of children of school age. Never coming up to 9,000 and never falling below 8,100. The country schools are not so large as they were twenty-five years ago, but the village schools are larger, so that our school population remains nearly uniform. The village schools show a more regular attendance of all ages, between four and twenty years, though the country schools show a high percentage of attendance of those between the ages of seven and fifteen.

The successor to Mr. Green, D. H. Morgan, commenced his work with the help and advise of his predecessor, by making as many visits to the different schools as time would permit prior to holding his first round of examinations, and thereby learning, as far as possible, the condition of the schools and their greatest needs.

Immediately after the examinations closed the work of preparing for the first institute, under the new superintendent, commenced. Teachers were notified by circulars and by the superintendent, in person. Then commenced a regular series of institutes and teachers' meetings, though not so well attended at first as was desired, but the members in attendance steadily increased from year to year, and the interest in the work grew, not only among the teachers, but the school patrons were often seen and heard, too, at the institutes. Teachers' meetings were called in various parts of the county, and were generally well attended, and without exception, great interest on the part of the teachers was manifest. About this time the State put into the hands of the board of regents for normal school, a fund, with the understanding that a portion should be used toward furnishing institute conductors to the various counties asking their services.

The very best methods of conducting institutes were not fully understood by the average county superintendent. So the board of regents saw the propriety of sending into various counties the ablest men obtainable for the purpose of giving instructions to both teacher and superintendent.

Early in Mr. Morgan's work, the present State superintendent, Mr. Graham, came to take charge of and conduct our institutes. In fact, he, Mr.

Graham, is almost, if not quite, the father of our systematic method of conducting institutes.

We early had too, most earnest laborers in the home field. Immediately upon Prof. Salisbury's taking charge of the Brodhead schools, we found in him one of our most capable teachers, one of those men who never shirk from a task because it is hard to bear. In our meetings of all kinds, when work was assigned him it was always done well and in season. He seemed to go to the bottom of every subject that he was called upon to handle.

At a very little later date came Prof. Twining. The superintendent hardly knew where he would find him, and naturally felt somewhat anxious, as in all of the Principals of the Monroe High School, he had not found hearty sympathy in his efforts to better the condition of all the schools. But he soon learned that in Mr. Twining, he had a man that would stand shoulder to shoulder with him in any undertaking that looked toward bettering the condition of any or all of them.

For years he has made it one of his special duties to prepare young teachers to enter intelligently into the business of teaching, varying his programme for the sole purpose of giving normal instructions and drill in theory and practice. He was never known to go around a task, but always through it, and perhaps to him, more than any one man, are the superintendent and county indebted for his efficient and always ready aid.

Again, in all the towns and villages, boards of education have willingly and gladly co-operated in the work of making meetings and institutes a success. We have never asked anything that has not been cheerfully granted. We find too, that in a majority of our districts, the poor old school houses are giving place to better and more commodious buildings. There are a few old and badly dilapidated concerns, one or two having been condemned because of their unfitness for school purposes.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

One great hindrance to the onward and upward movement, is in not being able to hold our teachers long in the business. The average life of the teacher in the school room being less than three years. The energetic young men are going west and settling on farms, and most of them are disposed to take a "lady teacher" along to keep the house while the farm is being improved. Not a few of our young women have left the school room of this county for the purpose of obtaining homes of their own in the far west, five leaving at the same time from the same neighborhood.

Now, when we have a good teacher, and can hold him, we are all right on "the school question," but there is no law compelling any one to follow a business any longer than he may choose, and few people will follow a vocation that gives employment for from six to eight months in the year, when labor for the year can be found. Though teachers wages are better than the pay of a common day laborer, yet their expenses are always greater than almost any workers with the same income. The true teacher must be "up to date" in his qualifications, which compels the purchase of books and periodicals. Recognizing the needs of the teacher in the way of reference books, some years ago, our teachers raised a fund for that purpose, and bought the American Cyclopaedia, Dr. Thomas' Biographical Dictionary, Lippincott's Gazetteer, besides a variety of miscellaneous works that bear upon their calling. These books are in use during the time of our institutes, and are found of very great value.

'When some years since it was found that most, if not all of our teachers, were deficient in a knowledge of orthoepy the question naturally came up, "what shall we do, where are we to go for information?'

Being told that Webster's Academic Dictionary contained all that they needed, over 100 were ordered at once, and over 300 went into the hands of teachers and pupils in a short time. Now it is difficult to find a teacher without a copy of Webster's dictionary, Spencer's work on penmanship, Salisbury's Orthoepy, besides being pretty well supplied with miscellaneous reference books. Complaint being made to the superintendent that writing was not being taught in all of the schools, a teachers' meeting was called and the matter was presented to them, and its absolute necessity was laid before them; and, as a result, there is not a school in Green county wherein writing does not form a prominent part of school work. And here let me say that the effort on the part of the state superintendent to establish a regular system of grading the country schools, is meeting with a hearty response. The teachers are studying the superintendents circular and trying to understand its requirements, and grading their schools with a view of carrying out its demands. Already some fifteen pupils have completed the "Common School Course," with a much larger number following the course with the intention of finishing it sooner or later.

Our teachers, particularly those of some experience, are taking hold of this work with more than ordinary earnestness, and we have every reason to expect good results.

Of the town of New Glarus a special mention should be made, as, being entirely a foreign people, they early established schools, and have maintained them as the law requires, together with two months of exclusively German school, the tax for the latter being as cheerfully borne as any that they pay. It is one that cannot be legally collected, but all have willingly paid their proportion. It is undoubtedly true that every child in the town of the age of fifteen years can read and write both English and German. Another feature of the New Glarus schools is, that great stress is placed upon the practical studies, "the three R's" first; and every pupil, when he leaves school, can readily and accurately make an estimate of a bill of lumber for a barn or ordinary outbuilding, adding thereto cost of nails and incidentals. They are also taught to read writing of all kinds and descriptions, both good and bad. Of this statement the writer of this has had ample proof by personal observation.

At the close of eight years of supervision by Mr. Morgan, Thomas C. Richmond took the work in hand. He was young in years, but ripe in scholarship and experience, and as full of energy and push as it is possible for any man to be. Before the close of the first year he held an institute of eight weeks' duration, with an average attendance of nearly 100. This was followed by others of from six to eight weeks to the close of his four years of supervision.

Those who attended were required to pay tuition sufficient to defray expenses. The best teaching talent procurable was obtained to assist the superintendent in his work. All branches that are required in a first grade certificate were taught, and many teachers worked toward obtaining a certificate of the highest grade. Books of various kinds, relating to the subjects that were taught in the institute, were furnished the teachers at wholesale price, and hundreds of them were sold.

After Mr. Richmond left the work of superintending the schools, he taught one year as principal of the Brodhead schools; since which he has completed a double course in the study of law—one course in the Madison Law School and one in the law school of Boston—and is about entering the practice of his profession in the city of Madison. At the close of Mr. Richmond's second term, Mr. Morgan again took the supervision of the schools, and, it is believed, the work of holding the standard of the schools and qualification of teachers have kept even pace with those of other parts of the State.

Although the city of Monroe is nominally under county supervision, yet it is really under the supervision of the principal of the city schools. For the sake of making the schools of the county as near a unit as possible, the city charter did not ask a separate superintendent, nor a division of interest. This manifest interest on the part of the city fathers in making the educational work general and not sectional, for all the county and not a small part of it, is telling for good in various ways. The Monroe high school furnishes at least one-sixth of the teaching force now employed, and when teachers' meetings are called, all meet on common ground and work together as one great family. The Monroe High School furnishes, probably, more students for the State University than any school of its size in the State, and as to their preparation for entering college a word may be said. The county superintendent has it from one of the university professors that Monroe sends some of their very best and best prepared students. In fact, the Monroe examinations are considered so thorough that papers with standing marked by Prof. Twining is considered evidence enough of the applicant's attainments. For years Monroe has been represented at the State University.

Monroe, Brodhead and Juda are organized on the free high school plan, and thereby receive State aid. The coming year (1885) Albany will be added to the list. The Juda school, under C. F. Cronk, graduated the first class under the grading system for country schools. This was prior to its being a free high school.

Number of school buildings in the county, 131.

Number of teachers required to teach the schools, including Brodhead, 158.

All other villages being under county supervision, (Brodhead when incorporated, preferring to control her own schools).

The highest number of children of school age ever returned was in 1870, which was 8,988.

The lowest number in 1882, 8,133.

It is now known that of the number of children between the ages of seven and fifteen, more than ninety-five percent, are in regular attendance. Above and below these numbers the attendance is very irregular. Among the foreign population very few children attend school after "confirmation." Having passed an examination in the "catechism" the education is supposed to be completed.

Of the 131 school buildings, ninety-seven are reported as in good repair, and eighty-five are reported as having out-houses in good condition.

The superintendent finds, in his visits, that a majority of the schools are lacking in school apparatus. Particularly is this the case as to reading charts, numeral frames, State maps, etc. No one thing would so forward the work of primary teaching of reading, as a good set of reading charts in every school room in the county. They save the time of the teacher, in furnishing lessons already prepared with the best suggestions for the proper way of using them. From them children are so taught that they read at once on taking hold of their books, having learned nearly everything from the chart that they find in the first reader. And they make better readers too. Of this the superintendent speaks from actual observation.

What is needed to make the supervision more effective?

After many years of experience in school visitation, and looking at superintendents' visits with as little prejudice as possible, the writer, most firmly believes that the principal advantage derived from the 200, or thereabouts, visits made yearly, is a knowledge of the capacity of each individual teacher with little power to make a change for the better. The faults and shortcomings can only form texts for discussion at teachers' meetings, and institutes. No teacher can be changed from a poor, inefficient one, to a good one, with ability to manage in one or half dozen. visits. Could every town be made into one school district with some man of intelligence at the head of a town school board to co-operate with the superintendent in making visits, and reporting condition of schools, and planning, with the superintendent, meetings for discussions, suggestions and illustrations of methods, a more beneficial supervision could be obtained. That this may be accomplished in the near future, together with the establishing of a central high school in every township of our county, is a state of things greatly to be desired.

We cannot close without saying that at all meetings of teachers, the sanitary condition of our school buildings and grounds has received attention commensurate with its importance.

BIOGRAPHICAL.DANIEL H. MORGAN.

Daniel H. Morgan, superintendent of schools of Green county, was born in Brecksville, Cuyahoga Co., Ohio, June 27, 1822. His father, Isaac M. Morgan, was born in Dutchess Co., N.Y., May 29, 1777. His father (grand-father of Daniel H.) was a physician and graduated at Yale College in 1762. He (Isaac M.) studied with his father and attended an academy in Connecticut, where he studied the languages. He began the practice of medicine at Pawlingstown, Dutchess county, and from there went to Bloomfield, Ontario county, where he practiced until 1818. He then removed to Brecksville, Cuyahoga Co., Ohio, where he practiced his profession for thirty years. He died there in August, 1849. He was married in Dutchess county in 1800, to Sarah Harris, a native of Berkshire Co., Mass. They were the parents of nine children. The subject of this sketch, Daniel H. Morgan, was the youngest of the family and is the only one now living. He grew to manhood in his native town and there received his early education in the district school. He afterwards attended five terms in the Brooklyn Academy in Cuyahoga county and at Richfield Academy in Summit county. At the age of nineteen years he engaged in teaching school in his native town. He continued teaching there until 1852, when he came to Green Co., Wis., and taught two terms at Monroe. He then went to Jordan and purchased an interest in a saw-mill, also an interest in ninety acres of land. He followed agricultural pursuits and worked in the sawmill there, then sold out and engaged in farming one year, in the town of Sylvester. In the spring of 1858, he bought land on section 36, of Mount Pleasant. There were thirteen acres broken, and a log cabin upon the place at the time of his purchase. He now has the land improved and fenced and other improvements consisting of good, substantial buildings, fruit, shade and ornamental trees. He was married, March 23, 1845, to Cordelia L. Walling, a native of the town of Charlotte, Chittenden Co., Vt., born Sept. 14, 1824. They have six children—Jennie M., Charles, Charlene, Hettie, Richard and Saxton. He was first elected to his present office in 1867, and served eight consecutive years. He was again elected in 1879, since which he has served continuously. He has also served eight years as county surveyor, and one term as register of deeds, in this county.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE BAR—PAST AND PRESENT.

The history of the bar of any county deals with men who, as a rule, rank high in intelligence, and who have been, and are among the most potent forces in shaping its intellectual and social standard. Green county is not an exception to this rule. During the last forty-five years there have been a number of attorneys who have lived within its limits and practiced law in its courts, who have earned enviable places in the annals of the county.

THE BAR OF THE PAST.

The following are the names of those who have previously practiced law in Green county, but who are now dead, have moved away, or have retired from the profession:

John A. Bingham, E. T. Gardner, E. E. Bryant, Hiram Brown, Hiram Stevens, P. B. Priest, L. Rote, John W. Stewart, Edward Bartlett, Andrew J. Brundage, William C. Fillebrown, G. E. Dexter, A. W. BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES *

E. T. GARDNER.

Elijah Temple Gardner was born April 22, 1811, at Kittery, Maine. His parents, Silas E. Gardner and Huldah Temple Gardner, removed soon after to Portsmouth, N. H. In 1816 they started for what: was then known as the "Far West." They spent the winter of 1816—17 in the "Holland Purchase," State of New York, and in the early spring of 1817 removed to Olean Point on the Alleghany river, built a flat boat, and set it afloat, with the whole family, and all their earthly possessions on board, proceeded down the river into the Ohio, and thence to Lawrenceburg, where the father died, leaving the family in very destitute circumstances. The scenery along the Alleghany and Ohio rivers, then a vast wilderness made a deep impression on the mind of the boy who so many years after was to work out in another wilderness a destiny for himself.

After the father's death, Huldah managed to get her worldly treasures back to Cincinnati where she was assisted by the Masonic fraternity, of which her husband was a member. After remaining in Cincinnati till the summer of 1818 the family removed to Madison Co., Ill. here young Elijah attended a frontier school seven or eight months.

The rest of his schooling, till his arm grew strong enough to hew down obstacles to prosperity, was in the great school of adversity, where not one course was left out and where the reviews and examinations were more frequent than the many of today are likely to experience. Always fond of books, what time was spared from the drudgery of life was given to reading and meditation by the ambitious and energetic spirit which made a man of the boy. At the age of sixteen friends desired to send him to college and educate him for the ministry in the M. E. Church, but being the sole dependence of his mother, his older brother having left home—he preferred to do battle with his muscle and unbridled will. His motto was: “A smooth sea never makes a skillful mariner, and a courageous soldier never shuns the battle.” It was several years after he came to Illinois that the Ohio and Mississippi rivers were navigated by steamboats, the transportation of freight being by means of “keel boats” and it took them five months in those old times, to make a trip from New Orleans to St. Louis.

In the spring of 1827, having managed to get a team of ponies, young Gardner rented eighteen acres of land, planted it in corn and cultivated it, and during the interim between planting and harvesting he would work out, doing such jobs as he was able, bringing home his earnings which were twenty-five to fifty cents a day. St. Louis was then a small town, but had its attractions. Thither went the young man to get work. He was unsuccessful, and, by chance, while strolling along the levee, saw a boat billed for Galena. He hired out to the captain to work his passage way and gave general satisfaction. He always aimed to do his duty. On the route, and when two days below Galena, he was taken sick with fever, and was left at Galena, a stranger and with but seventy-five cents of money, the captain refusing to pay him the small wages agreed upon. He had some relatives, a half brother and a cousin, somewhere in the mining regions about Galena, whom he had the luck to find the same night that he landed.

By following an Indian trail that led to the mines, he arrived at his relative’s cabin at midnight, so weak that he was obliged to lay down several times on his route to gain a little rest. This was at the close of the Winnebago War. The soldiers had come into Galena under Gen. Atkinson, and as the steamer landed, the soldiers were being discharged. The fever had its run and was followed by the shaking ague, which lasted nearly a year. The next year young

Gardner and his cousin came to the “Platteville Diggings,” built a cabin about a mile north of where the beautiful village of Platteville now stands. In this cabin they spent the winter of 1827—28. Being often alone at nights, Gardner spent his time reading by an improvised lamp of lard, a rag and a button. His library was limited to a few books, among them the Bible and a history of the United States, a Webster’s spelling book, which the young adventurer came to know most thoroughly.

In those days, the society about the mining regions was “rough and ready,” and but little calculated to inspire the culture or intellectual improvement. There were a few among the miners, however, who inclined to the higher level, and a “debating society” was formed, young Gardner being one of the leaders, and he gained quite a reputation as a disputant. He often said that he graduated by the side of a mineral hole. In the fall of 1828, he returned home, across the country; traveled 250 miles and more, “without seeing a human habitation.” He says he enjoyed this journey “through God’s great wilderness, with the songs of birds in the groves, the prairies decorated with the wild flowers. It seemed to me, when I had been wandering alone through those primitive groves, as though I was attended by pure and beautiful ‘invisibles,’ and I felt an exhilaration that neither my tongue or pen can describe.” On his return home he found his little property gone, and so began again. He built his second cabin, moved in, and then began the problem of life from a new hypothesis. In a country where everybody did his own work, had little to employ labor with, and with very modest wants, it was more difficult to solve the problem thrust upon him, than any that Euclid ever propounded. In 1829, the Gardner’s removed to St. Clair Co., Ill. In the fall of 1831, having been married in the meanwhile to the estimable woman who bore him faithful company in all his journey through life, he found himself in debt $500, and that too, after working early and late at the hardest kind of work—at ox teaming. After disposing of his ox team, he traded a two-year-old colt he owned for some carpenter's tools, and went to Alton, Ill., to "help build up the town." So well did he succeed that his employer at the end of six weeks settled up with him and allowed him $1 a day; the matter of wages being left entirely with the boss. This was good wages in those days. Settling up his little bills, Mr. Gardner returned home on a visit to his wife and mother. He followed the carpenter and joiner trade till 1834, when he had the satisfaction of wiping out the last of the $500, and the interest, 12 percent. In 1835, he had succeeded so well that he removed his family to Alton, erected a shop and engaged in house building on his own responsibility.

Here he soon established a reputation for promptness, honesty and thoroughness, and his business increased so rapidly that he had to turn away some jobs. His profits often ran up to $200 a month. In 1839, he had the misfortune to be sick and unable to work for nearly a year, and came near dying. Twice he visited Wisconsin to improve his health, and was greatly benefited by his second journey, but on returning home the malady came back. He determined to move to Wisconsin in the spring of 1840, and setting out, arrived in Green county on the 10th day of June. Monroe then existed only in name. He built a cabin and saw-mill on the Skinner, eight miles west of the spot where this city now stands, which was then a virgin wilderness. Not a dwelling in sight, and the path of the Indian only served as an indication of the presence of humanity.

This venture required so much hard labor and vigilance that it had to be given up; and shortly after, Mr. Gardner, upon the advice of John A. Bingham, of New Mexico, who proved a friend indeed, engaged in the study and practice of law. He succeeded well; and fairly earned the reputation which he enjoyed for so many years, as a conscientious, careful and honest attorney, who regarded his client's interest as his own, always provided, he could measure his case by the square rule of justice and truth. He has been known to abandon suit and client, when he became convinced that he had been deceived as to the facts in the case. But he never abandoned a case wherein he thought he was right.

He was admitted to the bar in 1843, and practiced law until his death, a period of over thirty-five years, in Green county,—having tried many important suits in the State and United States courts. He was appointed justice of the peace, in 1843, by Gov. Dodge, when Wisconsin was a Territory. He held public office in various capacities, to his own credit and to the entire satisfaction of his constituents. He carried the principles of integrity and industry, aided by experience and good judgment, into public life, and was regarded by all who knew him, as an honest, upright man. He was county clerk for four years, before the township system of collecting taxes was adopted. He was district attorney for six years. He was a member of the last Territorial legislature, and represented the eighth senatorial district in the first State Senate, for two years. He refused a re-nomination and has always preferred to keep out of office when he could do so, without shirking his duty as a citizen. In politics, he was always a democrat, until James Buchanan was nominated for President; after which, until his death, he had been an enthusiastic republican. During the war he was appointed draft commissioner for this district and discharged his duty faithfully.

He was always an anti-slavery man, He hated tyranny in any form and this made him generous to a fault, even to those who opposed him honestly and fairly, He had charity; he gave freely and made his gifts all the more generous by giving quickly to those who came to him in distress. Many a young man, just starting out in life, engaging in business, will remember his kind words of advice, and expressions of good wishes and hopes for their success. His hand and heart were in every good enterprise that needed or called for his assistance, and his deeds bore testimony to his sincerity. His life was filled with interesting incidents and pleasant reminiscences and so thoroughly identified was he with the growth and progress of Green county, and the State, that its history is in part his own epitaph. Many have come and gone from among this community, and children have grown up to manhood's estate, knowing him and respecting him for his many noble qualities, so many today mourn with his bereaved family, and loss of one of the noblest of mankind.

Mr. Gardner died near Monroe, on the 3d day of February, 1879. His funeral took place from the residence in Monroe, on the 5th day of February, 1879, at 2 o'clock P. M., and was attended by a large concourse of relatives and friends. Rev. D. R. Howe, in an appropriate and impressive manner, led the services. The Masonic fraternity took charge of the funeral.

JOHN W. STEWART.

It is sometimes a valuable service to the community and the public at large to call attention to strong, able and practical men of the more retiring kind whose example, services, and possibly leadership, it would be much better to have in demand than that of the more forward kind. A man of this retiring kind, strong, able and practical, is Hon. John W. Stewart, formerly of Monroe, now of Chicago. Few men in Chicago are better known among its active citizenship and leading spirits. A man of sterling character, thoroughly acquainted with the ways of men, the public wants, governmental methods and machinery, active, resolute and progressive, men say of him: here is a man who would make a capital head official for almost any important department of public affairs—national, state or municipal. All the while such men quietly attending to their own business well out of official range. It is, however, as has just been intimated, well worth while for the public to turn its attention to them; even if in so doing, attention is entirely withdrawn from other directions. Something about a man like John W. Stewart is in order and interesting.

The son of Rev. John Stewart, a Methodist minister, who was for fifty years a member of the Ohio conference. Mr. Stewart was born at Vincennes, Ind., in 1822. He is of Scotch blood, pure enough to be a Scotchman, although three generations of his family preceding him were born in this country. On account of the itineracy of his father his early childhood was spent in various places; but what was thus lost was compensated for by quickened powers of perception and observation. At the age of twelve he earnestly solicited the privilege of learning the art of printing. Entering the office of the Times at Troy, Ohio, he remained there for two years, gaining a large amount of practical knowledge, and laying the foundation for his subsequent useful life. After leaving the printing and newspaper office he entered the preparatory department of the Ohio University at Athens, Ohio, and subsequently entered Augusta College, Kentucky, where he was a student for three years. In the winter of 1840—1 he obtained permission of his parents to come into the great undeveloped northwest. Arriving at Prairie du Chien by steamer, by way of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers in the spring of 1841, he immediately found new friends at Lancaster, in Grant Co., Wis., and entered the office of Messrs. Barber & Dewey for the purpose of studying law. Shortly afterwards he was appointed deputy clerk of the United States district court. Soon after this he was appointed postmaster of Lancaster, which office he held for one year, when he located at Monroe, Green Co., Wis. Here he was admitted to the bar and entered on the practice of law. He also commenced in this place in May, 1851, the publication of a weekly newspaper, the Monroe Sentinel, which he disposed of before the close of the first volume. The paper is still one of the leading papers of the State. But Mr. Stewart had formed a distaste for close office work; he had become interested in land speculations going on in the new region. in 1846, at the age of twenty-four, he was elected in the large and, for that time, old district composed of Dane, Green and Sauk counties, to the Territorial legislature, and elected again to the succeeding and last Territorial legislature as a whig, when the district was largely democratic. In 1860 he was elected to the Senate of the State and was an influential and active participator in the initial war legislation. About this time he was also elected on joint ballot, of the legislature a regent of the State university for a term of six years. In 1862 he was commissioned by President Lincoln, commissioner of allotment for the State of Wisconsin, and in the performance of his official duties visited the greater part of the Wisconsin regiments scattered through out the east, west and south. He lived in Wisconsin in all twenty-nine years.

In 1869 he moved to Chicago, and has here become one of its most substantial and influential citizens. Against his inclinations and wishes he was taken up by some enthusiastic friends and elected alderman of the fourth ward, and served with distinction as an active member of the "reform city council" during the term of Mayor Health. He was the originator among other important measures of the abolition and re-organization of the board of public works and the health department of the city, and of the initial steps for building the City Hall. In 1878 he was elected county commissioner of Cook county, from the city district, by a majority of 7,796. He was chairman of the county board in 1879—80. Concerning the long public career of Mr. Stewart one fact can be recorded which can scarcely be claimed for the record of any other man of equal prominence and whose public services have been so long and varied: Of the thousands of votes which he has recorded as a member of various legislative and other deliberative bodies never has there the slightest ground for fault or criticism been found when time has been given to weigh the results of his votes and the reasons which determined the way in which they were cast. So careful, deliberate, conscientious and discreet has he always been in discharging the public duties, and serving the public interests committed to his hands.

Mr. Stewart was a whig of the Henry Clay school before the organization of the republican party, of which he has been a member ever since. Of both these parties he has several times been a member of the State central committee in Wisconsin.

Mr. Stewart has also been a sagacious and successful business man. He is a man of broad, hearty and most generous nature. Conscientious and resolute of the strongest integrity, with enlarged practical ideas of life, he is a genial, affable gentleman of unostentatious habits and life who delights greatly in his family and home, besides being a man of broad, enlightened views and large public spirit.

EDWIN, E. BRYANT, of Madison, was born in the town of Milton, Vt., Jan. 10, 1835; received an academic education and was two years at the New Hampton Institute, supporting himself by teaching or working on a farm; left Vermont in 1856 and went to Buffalo, N. Y., as reporter on the Buffalo Courier; came to Wisconsin in 1857; finished a course of reading law in Janesville, and went to Monroe, where he commenced practice in 1858. During the campaign of 1860 he was partner and one of the editors of the Monroe Sentinel. In May, 1861, he entered the military service as a private; was 1st lieutenant and adjutant of the 3d regiment, Wisconsin Infantry; served in Virginia, participating in the battles of Bolivar Heights, Va., Oct. 16, 1861; Winchester, May 1862; Cedar Mountain, Aug. 9, 1862; and the several engagements of Pope's campaign in Virginia; Antietam, Sept. 17, 1862; Hooker's battle of Chancellorsville, May 2 and 3, 1863; Beverly Ford, Va., June 5, 1863; Gettysburg, July 1, 2, and 3, 1863; Falling Water, July 14, 1863; was in brigade sent from the field to suppress the draft riots; went west with Hooker's corps in October, 1863, and joined the Army of the Cumberland; served there till July 1, 1864; was then appointed commissioner of enrollment of the third district of Wisconsin July 1, 1864; served as such till February, 1865; then returned to the field as lieutenant-colonel of the 50th regiment, Wisconsin Volunteers; was in western Missouri in pursuit of guerillas when hostilities closed; was then detailed as judge advocate of a military commission at headquarters, department of Missouri, to try the boat burners employed by the confederate government to fire the shipping on the Mississippi river; completing this duty he resigned his commission and returned to Monroe and resumed the practice of law in April, 1866; was president of the board of directors of public schools in Monroe from 1866 to 1868; removed to Madison in 1868; was private secretary to Gov. Lucius Fairchild from 1868 till the close of his term in 1872; was chairman of the board of supervisors of the town of Madison in 1871; was adjutant-general of Wisconsin in 1868, 1869, 1870, 1871, 1876, 1877, 1878 to 1882; was member of the legislature in 1878 and chairman of the assembly committee on the Revision of the Statutes, in which capacity he assisted in the work of incorporating the laws of 1878 into the revision, and bringing out the statutes. He was in partnership with Col. William F. Vilas in the practice of law from 1872 till 1882; assisted in the revision and annotation of eighteen volumes of the Supreme Court reports, prepared the thirty-seventh volume for publication, and, with J. C. Spooner, published a compilation of town laws in 1869. In 1884 he brought out a Treatise on the Civil and Criminal Jurisdiction of Justices of the Peace in the State of Wisconsin, being a work in the nature of Cowen's treatise on the same subject. In 1883 he purchased an interest in the Madison Democrat, prompted thereto by desire to devote himself to literature, journalism and the writing of books on legal topics.

EDMUND BARTLETT.

Few men have had a more varied and adventurous experience than the subject of this sketch, and the necessarily condensed and incomplete record of the leading events of his life read more like fiction than a chapter from real life. Aside from the thrilling character of its personal narrative, the sketch possesses peculiar interest and value, as furnishing, incidentally, an authentic history of the rapid rise, the reckless and depraved character of the class of men and women who throng to the frontier settlements of the west. The moralist and historian may herein find much material on which to employ their respective vocations.

Edmund Bartlett was born in Northampton, Mass., Oct. 4, 1822, and is the son of Edmund Morris and Laura (Randall) Bartlett, the former a native of the same town, the latter of Worthington, Berkshire Co., Mass. His father was born July 25, 1795, was a soldier of the War of 1812, entering as a private and passing through the intermediate grades to the rank of first sergeant. He subsequently took much interest in military matters, became an enthusiastic student of military tactics, and was afterward colonel of a regiment of Massachusetts Light Infantry, at the head of which he escorted Gen. Lafayette into Northampton in the last visit of the distinguished nobleman to the United States, (1824). He was a very active, consistent and useful member of the Congregational Church from boyhood till his death, and was recognized by all classes as a leader in every good work. He was a diligent reader of history, and, with a tenacious memory, acquired an extensive knowledge of its general details. He was also a man of remarkable industry and enterprise, and generous and noble in all his impulses. In 1832 he removed with his family to Ohio, and settled in the township of Brecksville, Cuyahoga county, some twelve miles south of Cleveland—at that time a wilderness—and known as the "Western Reserve;" but Col. Bartlett was a strong and resolute man, and with his ax he soon subdued the forest, and made his farm of 180 acres one of the best and most highly cultivated in that section of the country, with an orchard of over 1,000 of the choicest varieties of apple trees, besides smaller fruits in abundance. He was for several years president of the county agricultural society, and was well known throughout the region for his valuable efforts to advance the agricultural and horticultural interests of his neighborhood. His intimate friends and associates included such men as Hon. Louis P. Harvey, late governor of Wisconsin; Prof. E. H. Nevin; Hon. E. S. Hamlin; Hon. John C. Vaughan, editor of the "Cleveland Leader;" Prof. Jared P. Kirtland, Cleveland Medical College, celebrated as a lecturer on agricultural chemistry and as a scientist; and others. In politics he was raised a whig, but on the dissolution of that organization affiliated with the free-soilers; and later became identified with the republican party.

On the 6th day of December, 1821, he married Laura Randall, a lady of superior education and many accomplishments, who was born July 2, 1795. Before her marriage she moved in the society of which William Cullen Bryant was a member, and was well acquainted with that distinguished poet, many of whose youthful sayings and doings she well remembers, and can at this period (December 1876) relate in the most intelligent and interesting manner. The fruit of this marriage was two children—Edmund, the subject of this sketch, and Lucy B., wife of W. W. Wright, Esq., of Monroe, Wis. Col. E. M. Bartlett and wife followed their children to Wisconsin, where the former died at Monroe, April 24, 1868; the latter, at the age of over eighty-one years, is in good health and in full possession of all her mental faculties.

Mr. Bartlett claims lineal descent from Adam Bartlett, a Norman gentleman and an officer in the army of William the Conqueror, who accompanied that monarch to England, fought under him at Hastings, and was subsequently granted a large tract of land (entailed estate) in Stopham, Sussex county, England, which remains in the possession of his descendants to this day, having passed to them in the regular order of primogeniture; the present head of the family being Col. Walter Bartlett, a member of the British parliament. Robert Bartlett, younger scion of that family, sailed from England in the ship Ann, in the year 1623, and landed at Plymouth, Mass., in July of that year.

He subsequently married Mary Warren, daughter of Richard Warren, and from that union our subject is descended. John Bartlett a member of the Sussex family, received distinguishing honors from the "Black Prince," for his capture of the castle of Fontenoy in France at the head of the Sussex troops. Josiah Bartlett, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, was from the same ancestry, as was also Richard Bartlett of Newburyport, Mass., a representative in the colonial legislature, 1679—80—81—84. The grandfather of our subject was Preserve Bartlett, also a native of Northampton, Mass, who married Mary Parsons, L. L. D., the author of "Parsons on Contracts," and other valuable standard law books.

Until ten years of age Edmund Bartlett enjoyed all the educational advantages of his native England village, was a good reader and declaimer, and had made considerable proficiency in Murray's grammar and other studies; but for several years after his removal to the wilds of the then "Far West," he had very few educational advantages. The schools of that day in the "backwoods" were generally presided over by incompetent teachers, while their terms were limited to three months in the winter. During one of those terms the "master" each day detailed a squad of the boys to practice the manly art of "self-defense," wrestling and other physical exercises, which, rude and barbarous though they may seem to the present generation, were not without beneficial results to the muscular system. The other exercises consisted of reading, spelling and declamation. The schools, however, improved with the country, and subsequently teachers were generally more competent; but the only academic advantages our subject enjoyed were about six months attendance at an institution presided over by the Rev. Samuel Bissell, at Twinsburg, in Summit Co., Ohio. But he was a diligent student and delighted in literary pursuits, and studied at home, aided by his parents, especially his mother. At the age of sixteen he procured elementary works in the Greek and Latin languages, which he studied with great avidity under the direction of the Rev Newton Barrett, a learned Congregational minister of his town. He studied in the field and in the forest; wherever he went, or in whatever labor engaged, a book was his constant companion. At the age of eighteen he commenced teaching school, and for twelve consecutive years taught not less than three months each year and became one of the most thorough and accomplished scholars of his day, whose talents would have shed luster upon any profession or avocation upon which they might have been concentrated. On May 23, 1844, he married Catharine A. Righter, and turned his attention to farming, an occupation at which he continued for ten years. In the spring of 1854 he removed his family to Monroe, Wis., expecting to continue farming, but being governed by circumstances, he clerked for a time in the office of the register of deeds, and in the year following became deputy clerk of the circuit court, and in the fall of 1856 was elected to the position of clerk of the circuit court, which office he filled till the end of 1858. He next served two years as cashier of the Monroe Banking Company, and in 1861 was appointed postmaster of Monroe by Abraham Lincoln, his commission, which was signed by Montgomery Blair, bearing date April 15 of that year.

Having devoted his spare time to professional reading while clerk of the circuit court, he was, on March 6, 1860, admitted to the bar of the State, and subsequently licensed to practice in the United States courts. In January, 1861, Gov. A. W. Randall, in anticipation of the threatened rebellion, commenced organizing the militia of the State, and presented to Mr. Bartlett a colonel's commission; and in the latter part of that year, and during nearly all of 1862, he canvassed the counties of southern Wisconsin, making patriotic speeches, and under a recruiting commission enlisting men in the service, until the work of obtaining recruits became difficult, and men expressed a strong repugnance to being asked to enter the service by those who were themselves staying at home. Col. Bartlett then pledged himself to enlist as a private soldier, and at once wrote the following patriotic and self-sacrificing letter to the postmaster-general:

SIR:—I have long chafed under the restraints of home and official responsibilities, and desired to be among the number of those who are plucking honors from the points of rebel bayonets. I can endure it no longer. I therefore respectfully tender to you my resignation of the office of postmaster at Monroe, and recommend the appointment of D. W. Ball as my successor.

His resignation was accepted and the appointment made as recommended, and on Feb. 17, 1863, he enlisted as a private soldier in company B, 31st Wisconsin Volunteers, and on March 1, 1863, marched with his regiment into Dixie's land. He served faithfully and well to the close of the war, and was honorably mustered out of the service in May, 1865, never having been home during the entire period. He was appointed and served for several months as captain of company L, 3d United States Heavy Artillery. After his return from the war he was employed as book-keeper for a large commission house in Chicago, which position he held but a short time, when he was induced "to take the stump" in behalf of Gen. Ed. W. Salomon, republican candidate for the office of clerk of Cook county, and addressed the people on the political issues of the day in every ward and precinct of the city of Chicago. Gen. Salomon was elected, and our subject became his chief clerk. About the same time, however, he received overtures from the quartermaster and commanding officer of the troops stationed at Julesburg, in Colorado, to accept the position of chief clerk of the quartermaster's department of that post, and being fond of adventure, and desirous of seeing the country, he accepted the flattering offer, and in November, 1865, removed to Fort Sedgwick, a military post just established on the south bank of the Platte, and adjacent to the "ranch" of Jules Bernard, in Colorado, and named Julesburg. The original town consisted of only three or four sod houses, used as telegraph offices and stables of the Overland Stage Company. He entered at once upon his duties in the quartermaster's department, where he continued for about a year and a half; and during that time he traveled more than 2,000 miles on horseback, his only companion being a scout in the employ of the government—through a country swarming with hostile Indians, visiting nearly every military post between Idaho and the Missouri river, and collecting material for reports required by the government. These journeys were full of wild adventures and hair-breadth escapes from the Indians. He traveled nearly all the summer of 1866 with his single companion, stopping occasionally at ranches or military posts over night, but generally camping out. It had been customary to accompany such expeditions by a military escort of twenty-five men, but his experienced scout considered that they would be safer alone, dispensed with the escort. In July, 1867, when the Union Pacific Railroad had arrived within four miles of Fort Sedgwick, Mr. Bartlett left the quartermaster's department for the purpose of embarking in trade in the new and notorious city of Julesburg—where in the preceding April he had killed the timid antelope, and where no signs of human habitation appeared—now a city of over 1,200 houses, with a population of 6,000 inhabitants. It was the terminus of the Union Pacific Railroad, and there all goods in transit for the Pacific States and Territories, military posts and mining towns west of that place, must be unloaded from the train and transported to destination by mule and ox teams. The business transacted was immense. Hundreds of portable buildings were brought from Omaha; many were of adobe, many of sod, and scores of people carried on an extensive and profitable business under canvas tents. There were no family residences, as few men would dare to take a family to such a place. There were many high-minded, honorable men engaged in legitimate business, but the city was crowded with saloons, gambling houses and bagnios, and pickpockets, thieves, murderers and desperadoes of the worst kind flocked there from every part of America. The original ranch of Jules Bernard was known to be in Colorado, but near the line separating that Territory from the State of Nebraska, but it was not at this time known to any one in which Territory the present Julesburg was located. It was at first a city without a government, laws or officers to protect those engaged in business, and it was found absolutely necessary to adopt some measures of safety and protection. The business men of the town therefore held a meeting and adopted ordinances for the government of the city, and resolutions pledging themselves to such taxation as should be necessary to sustain an efficient city government. They elected a mayor and a council of five members, a clerk and treasurer. A vigilance committee of 150 members was also organized. The mayor was empowered to appoint such number of policemen as he might deem necessary, and draw ad libitum upon the treasurer for their payment, amenable only to the people for an abuse of his power and punishable by removal. He was also declared ex-officio judge of the police court. The first mayor was a gentleman named Cook, but he soon retired from the office, and Mr.

Bartlett, who had become conspicuous among the "vigilantes," was appointed his successor. An arrangement was effected with the Commanding officer at Fort Sedgwick by which, in the event of resistance to the constituted authorities, the aid of troops could be procured. But the military authorities, while sustaining the city government in the protection of business and in maintaining order, would permit the exercise of no civil function by that organization; hence there were no means of enforcing contracts or collecting debts if parties concerned refused to pay.

Mr. Bartlett at once entered upon the duties of his office, increasing force to twenty-five, agreeing to pay each man $125 per month, and otherwise improved the apparatus of government. He caused a log jail to be erected, and kept a well-armed guard around it day and night. Rioting and murder were of daily occurrence, and he was compelled to hold court seven days of the week. The punishment of all but capital offenses was by fine and imprisonment, but in case of murder the culprit was ordered to be imprisoned till the United States marshal at Denver or Omaha could be notified; the vigilantes, however, generally disposed of him the first night, so that the marshal was in a great measure relieved. By fines the mayor collected money enough to defray nearly all the expenses of the city government, so that resort to taxation was seldom necessary. A single case will suffice as an illustration of the character of those brought before him for trial, and his manner of administering justice. His court room was a rough board building 20x50 feet. Behind a rough table sat the judge upon a rough bench. Around his waist was a belt, hanging from which were two heavy Colt's revolvers. Two desperadoes, named Jack Hayes and "Shorty," arrived in the city from Cheyenne, and soon made their presence known by rioting among the saloons and gambling houses, destroying property, discharging their revolvers, threatening life, and assaulting and maltreating several persons, and swearing they would kill any man who attempted to arrest them. The two roughs were soon brought before the mayor, however, in charge of half a dozen stout policemen. They had a large number of friends and sympathizers in the city, over fifty of whom were in the court room, each heavily armed with knives and revolvers; threats were freely made that the prisoners should never pay a fine nor go to jail. The vigilantes were also present in considerable force, and well armed. The judge summoned a jury of business men, permitted the defendants to be heard by counsel, examined a large number of witnesses, and gave them a fair trial. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, whereupon the judge arose, with a cocked revolver in each hand, and proceeded to render the judgment of the court, which was that each pay a fine of $250, and be imprisoned until the fine and costs were made. Revolvers were drawn all over the room, but the judge coolly added: "I have heard your threats and understand your intentions, and if you are disposed to resist the execution of the sentence, the best time for you to commence is now, and the best place is here; and I give you notice that there is room enough in the sand-hills for every man of you. Police, remove these prisoners to the jail." Over 200 revolvers were in the hands of those present, but not a shot was fired, and the prisoners were removed to jail. In less than two hours they had paid their fines and were at large again. In a short time they returned to Cheyenne, and were soon after hung by the vigilantes for murder.

The mayor did not often find it necessary to telegraph to the fort for troops. On one occasion a detachment of cavalry dashed into the city and reported to him for orders half an hour from the time he dispatched for them. At another time a company of infantry in army wagons drawn by mules reported within an hour.

In November, 1867, Mr. Bartlett, having received intelligence of the dangerous illness of his father, hastily returned to Monroe, and in the following spring opened a law office, and continued in the successful practice of his profession until the autumn of 1869, when he received a flattering offer to edit a republican newspaper at Thibodeaux, the capital of Lafourche parish, in the State of Louisiana, which he accepted, repaired to the place and entered upon his labors. A republican press association was organized at New Orleans while he was editing the Lafourche Republican—the first organization of the kind in Louisiana—of which he was made secretary. In April, 1870, he resigned the editorial chair to accept a situation in the New Orleans customhouse, but during the summer, his health failing, he resigned his position, returned to Monroe, and after a season of sickness resumed the practice of his profession. In 1874 he was again elected clerk of the circuit court of Green county, and re-elected in 1876, and now holds that office.

In January, 1857, he received the first degrees in Masonry, by dispensation, and soon after took all the chapter degrees. He has several times been elected master of Smith Lodge, No 31, F. & A. M., located at Monroe. He is also an Odd Fellow; received the degrees of the subordinate lodge in 1855, and has passed all the chairs in Monroe Lodge, No. 72. He also received the encampment degrees in Odd Fellowship. He is not a member of any Church organization, but holds to the orthodox faith, and is generous in his contributions to religious and benevolent objects. In personal appearance Mr. Bartlett is what may be called a fine looking man—fair complexion, sanguine countenance, with brown hair and hazel eyes, five feet nine inches in height, good breadth of shoulders, measuring forty-two inches around the chest, and weighing 185 pounds. Reared as he was, in the backwoods, he excelled in all athletic sports; he was swift of foot, and found but few equals at wrestling and all the various muscular efforts to which youth is addicted. He is a superb horseman, and most fearless and daring rider; an unerring marksman with rifle and pistol. His skill with the former weapon was known to many of the hostile Indians of the plains, not a few of whom he sent to the happy hunting grounds of their fathers. He killed more than fifty buffaloes from the saddle during the season he remained on the plains.

As a writer and public speaker he has a few superiors. His pen is trenchant and graphic His letters from the seat of war during the Rebellion were of the most thrilling and vivid character, his descriptive powers being of the highest order, while his style is scholarly and ornate. He is also favorably known in the regions of fictitious literature, and as a poet has produced a volume of verse, which, for brilliancy of conception, beauty of language, depth of thought and fineness of fancy, is excelled by few of the laureates of these days, and which is destined to perpetuate his name for all time. As a fluent and ready speaker, graceful, complacent, and commanding an exhaustless flow of language, he is the peer of any “stump” orator in the country. His marriage with Miss Righter—still in the prime and grace of woman hood—was blessed with a family of four children, two of whom—Edmund Morgan, born April 8, 1849, and Ellen L., born Oct. 16, 1846—survive. The son studied law in the office of Judge Dunwiddie, of Monroe, was admitted to the bar of the State at the age of twenty-one, and three years later to that of the United States courts. He subsequently attended the law school at Albany, N. Y., one year, and graduated from that institution. On Sept. 14, 1875, he married Lida L. Filkins, a beautiful and accomplished lady of that city, and entered into partnership with the Hon. A. J. Colvin, one of the oldest and best lawyers of Albany. Miss Bartlett, the only daughter, is a young lady of rare beauty of person, amiable and engaging manners, of the highest mental endowments, and superior culture and refinement.

A volume of 114 pages, just issued by Dr. Levi Bartlett, of Warner, N. H., contains the pedigree of the Bartlett family for the last 800 years, down to 1875.

The Bartlett "arms," which are now in some of the families in America, is a device consisting of three open gloved hands on a shield, gold tassels pendant from the wrists, a swan couched, with wings extended. In the English branch of the family these "arms" have been "quartered" with some eight other noble families who have become extinct in the male line—the female representatives of whom have intermarried with male members of the Bartlett family. Mr. Bartlett is now a resident of Omaha, Neb.

ANDREW J. BRUNDAGE came from Andover, N. Y., in 1855, and practiced law until 1859, in Monroe. He was taken with consumption and died on the road to California, and was buried in a solid rock coffin, on the plains. He was a man of great promise, but his health was poor. He was jovial and full of fun—was bound to ride on top, and was never discouraged. He was an honorable and upright man, and was quite a politician. He was always ready to speak when called upon; being sometimes unable to get on the stand, he was frequently placed there by others. After Mr. Brundage's death, his widow returned to Andover, and thence to the city of New York where she died. They had two sons born to them, one of whom—Maynard K.—is now an operator in a telegraph office in Kansas.

WILLIAM C. FILLEBROWN was born in Winthrop, Kennebec Co., Maine, in the year 1800. During his youth, he received a good education, as thorough as his native town offered. His father was a wealthy farmer on the Kennebec, and William was looked upon as a man of more than ordinary abilities. In 1826, he removed to Penobscot county and engaged in a hotel, as clerk for a time, and was appointed deputy sheriff—which office he held twenty years. He was town clerk and treasurer of Oconto county for many years. In 1832, he married Ann Maria Reed, of that town. With his wife and two children, he removed to Monroe, Green Co., Wis., in 1840; a distance of 1,500 miles, in an emigrant wagon. He died, Nov. 9, 1876, and was buried in Monroe. He had the entire respect of his fellowmen—and was very faithful to any trust imposed on him. He had a family of ten children—three sons and three daughters are now living.

Mr. Fillebrown practiced law to a limited extent in Monroe and was a justice of the peace.

He was a strong republican and temperance man. He started the first temperance society on the Penobscot, in 1830.

He had the respect of his fellow men in Maine, as well as in Wisconsin. He was a good talker and very social. He was a Universalist in belief.

JOHN B. PERRY,

one of the pioneers of Green county, was born at Elizabethtown, Essex Co., N. J., Dec. 11, 1812. His father, Nathan Perry, was born in the town of New Ipswich, N. H. and was there married to Rebecca Brown, of the same town. They soon after, moved to York State and settled in Essex county, where he bought unimproved land, lived on that a few years, then moved to Elizabethtown. He soon became prominent and was appointed under-sheriff, and held that office for many years. He served in the War of 1812, and participated in the battle of Plattsburg. He died in Elizabethtown in 1847. The subject of our sketch grew to manhood in Elizabethtown, securing his education in the public schools. In 1838 he came west and located at Dundee, Ill., where he engaged in teaching school. In December, 1839, he came to Green county, and engaged in mining lead ore at Exeter. In 1842 he was appointed justice of the peace by Gov. Doty. He remained in Exeter until 1844, when he returned to Dundee and there engaged in farming. In December, 1840, he returned to Green county and engaged in teaching at Albany, January, 1847. In the fall of 1847, he went to Monroe and read law in the office of J. W. Stewart, until the fall of 1848, then again went to Exeter and was elected justice of the peace there in 1849. In 1850, he was elected town clerk, and the same year, he was appointed United States marshal, to take the census of Green county. In 1851, he removed to Albany, and in 1852, was elected justice in that town, and has held the office continuously since that time. He has also held other offices of trust. He served as town clerk and deputy town clerk eighteen years. He has filled the office of county commissioner, two years; has been notary public, twelve years, and school director, fifteen years. In 1881, was sergeant at arms of the assembly at Madison. He was joined in marriage, in 1840, to Amy M. Kellogg. She was born in Chautauqua Co., N. Y. They have seven children—Rebecca B., Nathan A., Cora A., Amy M., Oliver H., Martha A. and Edwin R. In 1883 Mr. Perry acted as attorney for the village of Albany and secured the incorporation of the village. He was admitted to the bar, in Monroe, in 1854.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

HIRAM MEDBERY, a prominent lawyer of Green county, was born in Saratoga Co., N. Y. Jan. 30, 1832. When he was quite young his parents moved to Fulton county in the same State, where they remained until he was sixteen years old. They then removed to Wisconsin and settled in Walworth county. He had received a common school education in his native State, and after coming to Wisconsin, attended the Waukegan Academy two terms. He then returned to Walworth county and taught school one term, and with the proceeds, went to Saratoga Springs, where he engaged in the study of law in the office of Judge Bockes. He was admitted to the bar at Fonda, Montgomery Co., N. Y., Jan. 2, 1854, in the class with Mansfield Walworth and Joseph A. Shoudy. He immediately returned to Wisconsin and commenced practice at Troy. He was admitted to the circuit court of Walworth county, May 23, 1854. In 1855 he went to Prairie du Sac, Sauk county, where he remained a few months, then went to California, and was employed as civil engineer, eighteen months. He then returned to Troy. In 1857 he came to Albany, Green county, and began practicing law. He was admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court of the State June 11, 1859, and to the United States district and circuit courts, for the western district of Wisconsin, Sept. 15, 1871, to the United States district court for Wisconsin, Jan. 3, 1860, to the Supreme Court of Illinois, Oct. 19, 1873, and to the Supreme Court of the United States, Jan. 13, 1880. He was elected district attorney in 1859. In 1861 he entered the United States civil service, receiving the appointment of revenue assessor, which office he held ten years. In 1864 he removed to Monroe and practiced law, also attended to the duties pertaining to his office. In 1877 he was appointed revenue agent and traveled extensively until 1881, when he resigned and became postmaster at Monroe, which position he held two years. He then went to Chicago and resided until October, 1883, when he returned to Albany, and remained a short time, then removed to Monroe, where he now resides. Mr. Medbery has been twice married; first, in January, 1860, to Lucy Royce, a native of Ohio, who died April 15, 1881, leaving two children—Jessie and Paul; and again Jan. 28, 1882, to Myra Hollinshead, a native of Elkhorn, Walworth Co., Wis.

P. J. CLAWSON, attorney at law, was born in Green Co., Penn., Oct. 27, 1839. He is a son of Phineas and Hannah (Ross) Clawson, who emigrated to Waukesha county in 1851. Phineas Clawson was a man of superior ability. His first vote was cast for James Monroe, for Presidents He afterwards voted for Gen. Jackson, but again changed, and joined the whig party and became a member of the republican party at its organization in 1856. The subject of this sketch received the foundation of his education in the graded schools at Waukesha, and afterwards attended Carroll College. In 1859 he entered the State University at Madison, and graduated in the class of 1863, the degree of Master of Arts was conferred in 1867. He enlisted in the 20th Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, company D, in June, 1862. He was wounded at Prairie Grove, in the left thigh. Soon after he was commissioned as 2d lieutenant of company A, on account of meritorious service, and again as 1st lieutenant. He participated in all of the engagements of the regiment, and was always at his post. He was on the staff of Gen. Bailey in the Mobile campaign. He left the service in impaired health, and was for two years under treatment from his physician. In 1872 he was elected clerk of the circuit court. In 1874 he received the nomination for district attorney, but was defeated. He was again nominated in 1876, and elected to that office, which he still holds, having been re-elected three times. He was married Jan. 1, 1867, to Kate L. Moore, a daughter of Hon. H. T. Moore. They have three children—Sophia, May and Harvey P.

A. S. DOUGLAS, attorney at law, was born in Hamilton, St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., June 19, 1841. His parents were Adam B. Douglas, a native of Scotland, who emigrated to America in 1835 or 1836, and Mary A. Starring. In 1844 he went to Chautauqua Co., N. Y., where he engaged in the mercantile business. He afterwards engaged in keeping hotel and became one of the noted horsemen. In the fall of 1852 he landed in Portage City, Wis. He was educated in the common and high schools at Portage City. In July, 1863, he graduated from the high school at Janesville. In 1864, he enlisted in the 40th Volunteer Wisconsin Infantry, serving the end of his time of enlistment, 100 days. After leaving the army he entered the office of H. A. Patterson, of Janesville. On Feb. 16, 1865, he was admitted to the bar, and soon after formed a partnership, known as Patterson & Douglas. In October, 1866, he located at Brodhead, and in the fall of 1868 was elected as State's attorney, receiving the whole vote of the county, with the exception of two votes. In April, 1869, he came to Monroe, and was re-elected in 1870, 1872 and 1874. Mr. Douglas was among the leading spirits in organizing the Young Men's Christian Association, and was chosen president of the same, which was instrumental in building up one of the finest libraries in southern Wisconsin. He was married in 1868 to Laura E. Welch, a daughter of Dr. John Welch, of Janesville. Three children have blessed their union—Arthur G., Malcom C. and Helen. Mr. Douglas is a member of the Masonic fraternity, Blue Lodge chapter and commandery, also the A. O. U. W., K. of P., and G. A. R.

ARCHIBALD N. RANDALL is not an old settler of Green county, but is among the prominent men who came to the county at a later date, and is well and favorably known throughout this section of country. He was born at Sardinia, Erie Co., N. Y., Aug. 22, 1830, and obtained his education in the district school, supplemented by a course of study at Brockport Collegiate Institute. His father, Archibald H., was born in 1796; served in the New York Active Militia in the War of 1812; was married in 1815 to Eunice Cheney, daughter of David and Irene (Munson) Cheney. His grandfather, Elisha Randall, was born in 1762, near Boston, Mass., and at the age of fourteen years, entered the marine service of the colonies, on board a privateer, and served until the close of the Revolutionary War. When twenty-two years old, he was married to Isabel McElroy, a Scotch lady, and removed to Erie Co., N. Y.

In September, 1847, the subject of this sketch removed to Avon, Rock Co., Wis. At the age of twenty-one years, he was elected superintendent of schools, and served three years. He represented his town five years upon the Rock county board. He entered the army Aug. 22, 1862, and was commissioned captain company G, 13th Wisconsin Volunteers, Oct. 12, 1862. He served with his command in Kansas, Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee and Georgia, until the spring of 1863, when he was detailed to command a battalion of mounted infantry, with headquarters at Fort Donelson, Tenn. He remained in command about eight months, and until the troops at Donelson rejoined the army at the front, and the mounted infantry rejoined their several commands. While in command of this mounted infantry, he engaged in many fights with the numerous bands of guerillas, with which West Tennessee was at that time infested, never failing to either whip or capture such parties, and often returning from a raid through the country with as many horses and mules as his men could manage. This command is reported to have kept the large area of country between the Cumberland and Tennessee rivers, from the Ohio river on the north, to Clarksville and Florence under complete subjection, until relieved.

In January, 1864, he was detailed upon the staff of Major Gen. Lovel H. Rosseau, as acting assistant inspector-general of the district of Tennessee with headquarters at Nashville, which position he held until the expiration of his term of service, Feb. 1, 1865. While thus engaged as a staff officer, he was in every battle fought by Gen. Rosseau, including seven with Wheeler, two with Forrest and the battles of Franklin and Nashville. He was also with that general in his noted raid around Atlanta. He was married March 27, 1865, to Emma C. Loofbourrows, daughter of the Hon. Judge Wade Loofbourrows, of Washington, C. H., Ohio. Two children have been born to them—Maggie M., May 25, 1866 and Louis A., January 24, 1869. Maggie died at Brodhead, Sept. 7, 1881, of typhoid fever. He moved to this county in 1868. He has served three terms upon the county board of Green county, and was chairman thereof at the session of 1883. He was elected to the State Senate in 1881, and was chairman of the Senate judiciary committee at the session of 1881—3. His term of office expires in November 1884. Mr. Randall is a lawyer by profession, having his office and residence at Brodhead. He was admitted to the bar March 3, 1873.

As a public man, Mr. Randall's superior ability is unquestioned. He possesses superior executive ability, as has been clearly demonstrated since his connection with the State Senate. He has always filled the various offices to which he has been elected with credit to himself, and satisfaction to his constituency, and no man is more deservedly popular among the people.

CORNELIUS N. CARPENTER, president of the bank of Brodhead, was born in Moretown, Washington Co., Vt., in 1826. His parents removed to Montpelier when he was a child, and afterward to Northfield, in the same State. Mr. Carpenter is a lawyer by profession. He was admitted to the bar in the fall of 1848, and was elected librarian of the State the same fall. It was at this time that excitement ran high in consequence of the discovery of gold in California, and Mr. Carpenter yielded to his inclination to try his fortune in the land of gold. He was absent three years, one of which was spent in going and returning. He went by way of Cape Horn and returned through Central America, with a party of about 100, traveling with ox teams, and shipped at Chagres, for New York, in the fall of 1852. He saw much of the world, and secured some gold. On his return he engaged in the practice of his profession at Northfield. In 1856, he came to Milwaukee and practiced law two years, then returned to Vermont and engaged in law practice with Judge Carpenter. In 1862, he raised a company of volunteers for nine months service, company C, of the 15th Vermont Volunteer Infantry. He commanded the company six months, then resigned, in consequence of sickness in his family, and soon after, returned to Milwaukee. He came to Brodhead in 1863 and engaged in the practice of his profession until 1881. He then engaged in banking. He is a lawyer of ability and possessed a large and lucrative practice. Mr. Carpenter was elected district attorney in 1864 and served two years. He is a cousin of A. V. H. Carpenter, of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, also of the late eminent senator and statesman, Matthew H. Carpenter. Mr. Carpenter has been twice married. His first wife was Hannah Burnham, who died in Milwaukee in 1857. His present wife was Lucy Burnham, a sister of his first wife. He has one daughter by his first wife—Lizzie, now the wife of H. P. Young, and by the latter union there is one son—C. W., who is cashier of the Bank of Brodhead.

COLIN W. WRIGHT, attorney at law, was born at Lancaster, Grant Co., Wis., Feb. 8, 1858. His parents were natives of England, and emigrated to the States in 1849, first settling in Lafayette Co., Wis., where his father was engaged in mining and real estate business, which he followed for a number of years, and is now engaged in business at Mineral Point. The subject of this sketch was reared in Lafayette county, where the foundation of his education was laid in the common schools. He afterwards attended the high school at Platteville, and spent two years at the State Normal. In 1881, he read law in the office of Lanyon & Speasley, at Mineral Point. In 1881-82, he attended the law department of the Michigan State University, at Ann Arbor, graduating in the spring of 1883. Soon after, he came to Monroe and engaged in the practice of his profession. Mr. Wright is a young man of more than ordinary ability and is gradually building up a good practice.

BENJAMIN SANDERS KERR, attorney at law, was born in Knox Co., Ohio, Feb. 17, 1841. His father, Joseph Kerr, was born near Pittsburg, Penn., whose parents were born in the north of Ireland, but were of Scotch ancestry, the father of the long line of Scottish chieftains of that name of early times. His mother, whose maiden name was Rebecca Sanders, is a native of Ohio, and is of English ancestry, her grandparents having been Quakers during the Revolutionary War, residing in the then colony of Virginia. His grandfather, Benjamin Sanders, was one of the early advocates of the doctrines of Alexander Campbell, and preached for many years in different parts of the State of Ohio, and was a man of great ability and influence in the early days of that Church. His grandfather, Joseph Kerr, was a farmer, and died at the age of 103 years. In 1845 Mr. Kerr's parents removed to Green Co., Wis., where he has since resided, and where, in 1854, his father died, leaving him the second of eight children, five boys and three girls. He was reared upon a farm, and attended the short winter country schools until his nineteenth year, at which time he gave up farming and devoted himself entirely to study, and was a student at the academy in Platteville, Wis., at the breaking out of the Rebellion in 1861. He remained in that institution till the spring of 1862, and then returned to Green Co., Wis., where he engaged in school teaching till the spring of 1863, at which time he began the study of law in the office of Judge Dunwiddie, of Monroe, and which he continued till the spring of 1864. He then received a recruiting commission from Gov. Lewis, of Wisconsin, and raised a sufficient number of men to secure a 1st lieutenant's commission, and was mustered into the United States military service with that rank on the 15th of April, of that year, in company D, of the 38th regiment, of Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers, at Camp Randall, Madison. On the 3d day of May following, he, with his company and regiment, left for the front, and arrived at Washington, D. C., a few days later, and were encamped on Arlington heights, Va., for a short time. While the regiment lay there he saw and heard President Lincoln. It was levee day, and the Marine Band was discoursing sweet music from the pavilion in the park south of the White House Mansion. The President, Mrs. Lincoln and others sat on the south balcony, which elevated them above the crowd gathered around. Some one called to the President for a speech, others joined in the call, whereupon, President Lincoln arose to his feet and said: "Fellow citizens: You call upon me for a speech. In lieu of it I propose three cheers for Gen. Grant and his army." Grant was then in the Wilderness in front of Petersburg, Va. It is needless to say the cheers were given with a will. Lincoln at the same time swinging his long right arm above his head and shouting with the people. This little incident and speech of Lincoln's, in that darkest of the years of the War of the Rebellion, gives us a view of the inner-man, that, although surrounded by friends and heavily weighted with the cares of the civil government, visions of the army were ever before him and his heart and mind with his generals and boys at the front. Mr. Kerr's company and regiment were moved to the front and arrived at Cold Harbor at the close of the battle, where one of his men was killed. They became a part of Grant's army and moved with him from in front of Richmond to the attack on Petersburg, Va., Mr. Kerr remaining with the company during that long and bloody siege, excepting a short time he was detailed on a court martial at City Point, Va. The siege lasted from the 16th of June, 1864, at which time they first went under fire in front of the city, till the works were carried by storm, April 2, 1863, he commanding his company at that time in an assault in which one-third of the column fell. On the 17th of June, 1864, he was with his company in an assault in which the losses in killed and wounded were equally great. About the 1st of July, 1864, the captain of Kerr's company was taken sick and resigned, leaving him in command, and in which position he continued till the muster out and final discharge of the company, Aug. 11, 1865. He, having in the mean time, been promoted to the rank of captain. At the close of his military service Mr. Kerr returned to Monroe, and at once resumed the study of law with Judge Dunwiddie, and which he pursued until March, 1866, at which time he was admitted to the bar. In the fall of 1866 he was elected district attorney of Green county, which office he held until 1869, and was complimented by Judge Lyon, then on the bench, for his ability and care in the discharge of the duties of the office. Nov. 12, 1866, the subject of our sketch was united in marriage with Angeline Eliza Fayette, daughter of Shanalia Fayette, lineally descended from the family of the Marquis de La Fayette. Mrs. Kerr is a relative of ex-Senator James R. Doolittle, of Wisconsin through her mother, whose maiden name was Doolittle. They have two children—Maud and Fayette, born, respectively, Jan. 29, 1868, and Feb. 12, 1870. Mr. Kerr is a man of more than ordinary ability, a good, reliable office lawyer, and a forcible and earnest speaker. He is a man of medium height, fine personal appearance, and gentlemanly deportment; is of most exemplary habits and highly esteemed in the community in which he lives.

BURR SPRAGUE, attorney at law, Brodhead, is a native of Cattaraugus, N. Y., where he was born in 1836. In 1846 he removed to Rock Co., Wis., with his parents, settling in the town of Spring Valley. At the age of eighteen years he engaged in merchandising, which he continued in Spring Valley and in the town of Oxford till 1868, when he came to Brodhead. In 1871 he opened the first book, store in the village. He continued in the book trade till 1878. He served as postmaster here for a number of years, and was admitted to the bar in 1878. He served in the legislature from the first district, Rock county, in the session of 1868, and from the second district, Green county, in 1878. He owned and conducted the Register of Brodhead from October, 1878, till June 1879. He was superintendent of the schools of Brodhead for five years. He has taught many years and always took a deep interest in educational matters. He married Vina Lamphear, an adopted daughter of Dr. S. W. Abbott. They have three children—Louis, proprietor of the "Brodhead Register," Jessie and William.

JOHN J. PUTNAM was one of the prominent and well remembered early settlers of this town. He came to Green county in 1848 and purchased, in the town of Decatur, a tract of 500 acres of land. He located here with his family, in June of the next year. He was born in Hampshire Co., Va., in 1801. His advantages for education, in early life, were very limited. The death of his father, when he was seventeen years of age, placed upon him, to a great extent, the support of the family. He was married before leaving Virginia, to Mary M. Fleek, daughter of Adam Fleek. After marriage he removed to Hocking Co., Ohio, and thence to Licking county, engaging in agricultural pursuits. He remained there until he came to Green county. Mr. Putnam was a man of strong mental powers and of sterling integrity, and although he died comparatively early in the history of Green county, he left a record that is not forgotten. He was a justice of the peace for a number of years, also held the office of chairman of his town. He accumulated a valuable property, owning at his decease, about 1,400 acres of land. His death occurred June 5, 1856. His wife survived until February 1874. They had ten children, seven of whom are now living, four sons and three daughters, all residents of this county, except the second son, John J., Jr., who resides in Texas. Two of his sons, Oliver S. and Henry C., are residents of Brodhead.

OLIVER S. PUTNAM, Esq., was born in Newark Ohio, May 15, 1838. He came with his father's family, to this county in 1849. In April 1861 he enlisted in the three months' service and reenlisted Aug. 6, 1862, on company F, 31st Wisconsin Infantry. He was made 1st sergeant at the organization of the regiment. In April 1864 he was promoted to a lieutenantancy, commanded his company during the siege of Atlanta, Sherman's march to the sea, and in the final battles of Sherman's memorable campaign. He began the study of law, in the winter of 1865 but discontinued it to engage in coal mining in Illinois. He resumed the study of law and was admitted to the bar in 1871, since which time he has been engaged in the practice of his profession in Brodhead. He was police justice for a number of years. Mr. Putnam's army life seriously impaired his health and he has never recovered his former vigor. His wife was formerly Alice M. Copp, daughter of John E. Copp, who settled in Decatur in 1846. Mr. Copp was formerly from the State of New York, but came to Green county from Ohio. He went to California in 1850 and was absent thirty years. He then settled in Texas where he recently died. His widow still resides in Texas. Henry C. Putnam was a soldier in the Civil War, and was made a non-commissioned officer by election of his company, and served with marked distinction and rare bravery in the 1st Wisconsin Cavalry, company B.

The following letter from Hon. I. F. Mack, of Chicago, is a fitting tribute to the memory of his life-long friend, J. J. Putnam

Chicago, Aug. 6, 1884.

Union Publishing Company

DEAR SIR:—I learn that you are compiling and publishing a History of Green County, Wisconsin, and as the writer was a resident of that county from 1848 to 1870, it fell to my lot to be well acquainted with many of the early settlers and prominent men of that section. Among the latter class in the eastern portion of the county, I am pleased to name the late lamented John J. Putnam, Esq., who, with a large family connection of six or eight families, left Ohio and settled in the town of Decatur in that county, a little earlier than 1848, forming one of the most frugal, thrifty, granger settlements it has ever fallen to my lot to know, some of whom will regard it invidious if I place Mr. Putnam, during his life, in the front in point of intelligence and noble manhood. Although a farmer, Mr. Putnam was a man of extensive reading, a keen observer of men and things, an astute reasoner, thoroughly posted in regard to all questions that then divided political parties and councils of ripe judgment and of unassailable integrity. Though firm and decided in his conviction he was not intolerant, but genial and kind to last degree. A prominent figure in the old whig ranks and a sincere admirer of Henry Clay many a democrat felt the incision of his sharp cut political thrusts, in the early days, and with true patriotism in his bones, he could but pass into the republican ranks. Stricken with fatal malady while endowed with manly vigor, he passed away, leaving a handsome competence the for a sorrowing wife and an interesting family of several sons and daughters.

CHAPTER XV.

RAILROADS OF GREEN COUNTY.

In 1816 the frontiers of the United States settlements had been extended into Michigan, Illinois and Missouri, while Prairie du Chien was its most distant military post. This remote village was brought into communication with approaching civilization by the agents of the American Fur Company from the way of the lakes, and by military transportation from the way of St. Louis. Canoes or keel boats pursued these ways at long intervals, yet with some degree of regularity, and this intercourse, slight as it was in comparison with modern connections by steam and rail, was sufficient to draw hither a few Americans for purposes of trade, or in discharge of some United States agency in connection with Indian or military affairs. The arrival of the first steamboat inaugurated a new era in commercial affairs and the building of roads in various directions tended to increase trade and traffic at this point. But the multiplication of steamboats and roads did not satisfy the demands of the public for cheap and rapid transit. Railroads began to be looked upon as a necessity, and a line that should connect Lake Michigan with the Mississippi as particularly desirable.

THE MILWAUKEE & MISSISSIPPI RAILROAD.

Between the years 1838 and 1841, the Territorial legislature of Wisconsin chartered several railroad companies, but with the exception of the "Milwaukee & Waukesha Railroad Company," incorporated in 1847, none of the corporations thus created took any particular shape. The commissioners named in its charter met Nov. 23, 1847, and elected a president, Dr. L. W. Weeks and a secretary, A. W. Randall (afterward governor of Wisconsin). On the first Monday of February, 1848, they opened books for subscription. The charter of the company provided that $100,000 should be subscribed and five percent thereof paid in before the company should fully organize as a corporation. The country was new. There were plenty of active, energetic men, but money to build railroads was scarce, and not until April 5, 1849, was the necessary subscription raised and percentage paid. A board of directors was elected on the 10th day of May, and Byron Kilbourne chosen president. The charter had been previously amended, in 1848, authorizing the company to build a road to the Mississippi river, in Grant county, and in 1850, its name was changed to the "Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad Company." After the company was fully organized, active measures were taken to push the enterprise forward to completion. The city of Milwaukee loaned its credit, and in 1851 the pioneer Wisconsin railroad reached Waukesha, twenty miles out from Milwaukee. In the spring of 1852, Edward H. Brodhead, a prominent engineer from the State of New York, was put in charge of the work as chief engineer and superintendent. Under his able and energetic administration the road was pushed forward in 1852 to Milton, in 1853 to Stoughton, in 1854 to Madison, and in 1857 to the Mississippi river, at Prairie du Chien.

The first regular train reached Prairie du Chien, in April, 1857 ; and the terminus of the road was located at "Lower Town." It is appropriate here to observe, that this enterprise, a great one for its day, and for the era in which it was achieved, was undertaken and successfully carried through, (to their honor be it said) by citizens of Wisconsin, residents of the city of Milwaukee.

In this connection it is proper to state that E. H. Brodhead, of Milwaukee, was the then president of the road. William Jervis, of the same city, was superintendent, and E. P. Bacon, general freight agent. Among other gentlemen who took a leading part in carrying through this great work, may be here mentioned, the Hon. Edward D. Holton, still living, and the Hon. Ashael Finch, lately deceased, (both of the city of Milwaukee).

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE & ST. PAUL RAILWAY

In 1859 and 1860, the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad Company defaulted in the payment of the interest on its bonds. A foreclosure was made and a new company, called the "Milwaukee & Prairie du Chien," took its place, succeeding to all its rights and property. In 1867, the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company obtained control of the Milwaukee & Prairie du Chien Railroad. The legislature of 1857 had passed an act, authorizing all stockholders in all incorporated companies to vote on shares of stock owned by them. The directors of the Milwaukee & St. Paul Company had secured a majority of the common stock, and, at the election of 1867, elected themselves a board of directors for the Prairie du Chien Company. All the rights, property and interests of the latter company came under the ownership and control of the former. In 1865, Alexander Mitchell, of Milwaukee, was elected president, and S. S. Merrill, general manager, of the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company, now the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company. They were retained in their respective positions by the new organization, and still continue to hold these offices, a fact largely owing to the able and efficient manner that has characterized their management of the company's affairs.

FIRST RAILROAD IN GREEN COUNTY.

All things considered, it must be set down as a fact that one of the most important, (if not the most important) event which has ever happened in Green county, was the building of its first railroad. While the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad Company was in existence, it not only proposed to build a road from Milwaukee to Madison and Prairie du Chien, but also one to Dubuque, Iowa. We have already seen what success that part of its project met with which contemplated a road to Prairie du Chien. Let us now consider what more nearly concerns the people of Green county, the Dubuque project. But before dwelling upon the results of that scheme, it must be stated that there was an undertaking having in view a railroad through Green county which antedates the other. This was the incorporation of the

SOUTHERN WISCONSIN RAILROAD COMPANY

The object in view in organizing this company, was the building of a railroad from Milton, in Rock county, by way of Janesville, the county seat, through the counties of Green, Lafayette and Grant, to the Mississippi river. Of course, this was a project calculated to interest the people generally of Green county. Everybody wanted a railroad, and they wanted it as near their own homes as it could be built. The chartering of this company was a scheme originating in Green county, so great was the desire here to have communication with the outside world by means of the iron rail. This was early in the year 1852. A survey followed, reaching from Janesville to Monroe, and in the fall of 1858 work began near Monroe, but was soon discontinued for want of means. Early in 1854 the Southern Wisconsin Railroad Company. transferred all its rights to the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad Company, and the first-mentioned company ceased to exist. The projected road now took the name of authorizing them to build the line, the intention being to extend it to Dubuque, in Iowa. This company, in the spring of 1855, employed a party of engineers to re-survey the line from Janesville to Monroe, preparatory to obtaining the right of way and commencing grading. J. T. Dodge, then of Janesville, now of Monroe, had charge of the surveying party.

THE SOUTHERN WISCONSIN BRANCH OF THE MILWAUKEE & MISSISSIPPI RAILROAD

The contract for the work was let late in the fall of 1855 to C. P. Cook, of Milwaukee, a leading railroad contractor of the State. The work had commenced in February, 1856, and the track laid to Brodhead in September, 1857. Meanwhile the road had been mortgaged three times and, in August, of this year, was sold on the third mortgage. Owing to the difficulty of obtaining money, there was now an actual suspension of track-laying for want of means to pay the duty upon the rails. That difficulty was at length overcome by advances made mainly by the Bank of Monroe; so that the track was laid to Juda, in November and to Monroe in December, 1857.

THE RAILROAD CELEBRATION AT BRODHEAD

[FROM THE MONROE SENTINEL, SEPT. 23, 1857.]

Early on the morning of a drizzling, rainy, muddy Thursday of last week, we left home to attend the celebration of the opening of the Southern Wisconsin Railroad to Brodhead. The day was an unfortunate one as to appointment the weather being unpleasant, and the circuit court for Green county being in session and engaged upon the case of Nehemiah Root.

About 11 o'clock A. M., an excursion train of six passenger and three or four freight cars, all crowded full, left the depot to meet the excursionists from Milwaukee, Waukesha, and towns along the line of road. At Janesville, the Milwaukee train of five crowded cars was added, and the train returned to Brodhead, arriving just in time to permit the whole company to take refuge in the large depot before the approach of a passing shower. This unexpected moistening, not down on the bills, disconcerted the reception and dinner arrangements; everything, however, passed off pleasantly and harmoniously. After dinner Judge Randall responded to a call in a few pertinent and well-timed remarks, succeeded by the banging of guns and the more pleasant roar of instrumental music.

The train returned at half past three o'clock, a number remaining to participate in a hop to come off in the evening.

The Monroe Brass Band furnished an excellent quality of music for the day, their playing being a matter of universal admiration; the Brodhead Brass Band also played excellently well for so young a band; there was also a martial band from Decatur, that participated in all the festivities.

Brodhead is fast getting to be a lively village, and the business over the railroad is already quite important, though at the present ruling prices of produce the exports from this county are not a tithe of what they soon, probably will be.

A GREAT EVENT.

The completion of the Southern Wisconsin Railroad to Monroe, in Green county, was, indeed, a great event; perhaps, when viewed in all its bearings, the greatest that has ever occurred within the limits of the county. That this may not pass from the minds of future generations readily, we give a few extracts from the Monroe Sentinel, concerning its progress from the eastern edge of the county to Monroe, and the happy time had by the people upon its completion to the county-seat of Green county.

THE SOUTHERN WISCONSIN RAILROAD

[FROM THE MONROE SENTINEL, OCT. 28, 1857.]

We have the satisfaction of announcing that the track-laying on the Southern Wisconsin line is resumed, and the workmen to-day commence laying the rail this side of Brodhead. Some of our moneyed men have given their names as surety that if the company will commence laying the rail, they shall receive the necessary money, $1,300 per mile—to take iron out of bond, or enough to lay as far as Juda. If the stock-holders will come right up to the work like men, the road will be opened to Monroe in a few weeks. There are but fifteen miles to lay, besides side tracks and switches at Juda. We are well aware that the times are very hard, but it must be borne in mind, that the produce of the stock-holders is taken at Milwaukee quotations, and if every one will take hold with a will, we will have the road. "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush;" we can get the road this fall by one earnest and concentrated effort. Next season the difficulty may be greater.

H. Thompson is the accredited agent of the company, to take and forward produce or subscriptions, and pay over only so fast as the company actually expend on the line. If he calls at your house don't send him away empty.

SOUTHERN WISCONSIN RAILROAD.

[FROM THE MONROE SENTINEL, NOV. 18, 1857.]

The track-layers to-day, (Wednesday) will have the rail laid into Juda, and by Saturday night, will probably have finished all side-tracks. It is now but eight miles from Juda to Monroe, and a little more hard work will bring the cars to this point. Let every man who has a cent in money or a bushel of wheat, pay the same to B. Dunwiddie, director, or Henry Thompson, Esq., agent, and those gentlemen will faithfully apply the same to the taking of iron out of bond. It will not do to let the track-layers cease until the last switch in this town is laid.

SOUTHERN WISCONSIN RAILROAD.

[FROM THE MONROE SENTINEL, NOV. 25, 1857.]

We are informed by friend Graham, of this town, [Monroe] that the track-layers are now putting down the switches and side-tracks at Juda, and towards the latter part of this week will commence moving westward towards Monroe.

One of the Messrs Graham is personally superintending the work and doing all that man can do to hasten its progress.

Stock-holders and citizens along the line of this road are very much indebted to the Bank of Monroe, for the aid it has rendered and is now rendering, to secure the completion of our road. It has furnished money to carry on the work when no other bank in the State would loan a penny—a fact that must not be forgotten when the cars shall rumble into town.

SOUTHERN WISCONSIN RAILROAD.

[FROM THE MONROE SENTINEL, DEC. 9, 1857.]

By politeness of friend Graham, we paid another visit to the railroad, Tuesday. At the time we left, 4 o'clock p. m., the rail was laid half way across the trestle-work—which is nearly a quarter of a mile in length. To-day the train will run over it, and we have engaged a passage on the first car.

The road is open within three and a half miles of Monroe, and the work is progressing rapidly.

SOUTHERN WISCONSIN RAILROAD.

[FROM THE MONROE SENTINEL, DEC. 23, 1857.]

We are in high feather, we are elated. We feel good. Why? Go with us a few rods towards the southern portion of the village, and we will show you two parallel iron rails leading to the east and connecting with all her roads, over which the strong engine with its ribs and muscles of iron and steel, is hereafter to play back and forth like the weaver's shuttle; fetching and carrying its load of men and merchandise.

The cars have come to town, and every day "Richland timber" echoes the scream of locomotive. The facts that our people have paid the M. & M. R. R. Co., thousands of dollars within a few weeks, and that the Messrs Graham have laid the rail at the rate of about half a mile per day throughout the worst month of the year, all go to demonstrate one thing, namely, that this village is to be a little world of bustle and activity, from this time henceforth; and here we make the assertion, which we will prove by-and-by, by the figures, that Monroe will be the heaviest produce station in Wisconsin. It is a strong assertion, we know, but not over-grown, when it is considered that there will be tributary to this market alone over 156 square miles of territory, all well settled and improved.

Some kind of a celebration will undoubtedly take place at the formal opening, which will not occur for two or three weeks yet, inasmuch as there are several places where the track will have to be ballasted, to be safe. We are told that some of the officers of the road will be in town the present week, to examine depot grounds, and arrange for the opening.

THE RAILROAD CELEBRATION.

[FROM THE MONROE SENTINEL, JAN. 13, 1858]

Below we give the order of arrangements for the approaching railroad celebration in honor of the opening of the Southern Wisconsin Railroad to Monroe, to take place on Tuesday the 19th inst:

THE RAILROAD CELEBRATION.

[FROM THE MONROE SENTINEL, JAN. 20, 1858.]

At a few minutes after 7 o'clock A. M. Tuesday, as lovely a January morning as poet's fancy ever created—seven passenger cars almost filled with citizens of Monroe and vicinity, left the depot grounds of this village to meet at Janesville the guests from the cities and villages of our State, who were disposed to join with us in our joy and good cheer.

All were happy and cheerful as a party could well be; some chatting, some singing, some silently enjoying their first ride upon a railroad train—all possessing with satisfaction the hour after the bent of their minds. At the various stations fresh additions were made to the load, so that by the time the train arrived at Janesville, the citizens of that seldom astonished place actually rolled their eyes in wonder that so many people could be collected anywhere between that vast city and sundown.

The Milwaukee train with some six cars arrived a little before 11 o'clock, and soon afterwards attached itself to the down train and started for this point, both trains being made one. The return trip was made in good time and the excursionists welcomed by a large body of our citizens.

As soon after the arrival as quiet could be restored, the president, George E. Dexter, Esq., presented S. P. Condee, of this village, who made an eloquent, appropriate and cordial reception speech, which was replied to on behalf of the guests by Hon. E. D. Holton, in an equally appropriate manner. At its conclusion, the excursionists proceeded to the various hotels and to private residences, whither they were cordially invited by our citizens, the specially invited guests stopping at the American.

The dinner at the American was of the best order, and heartily greeted by hungry humanity. After dinner, came toasts in the following order:

1st. The city of Milwaukee, responded to by Col. George H. Walker, of that city.

2d. The Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad, responded to by Hon. E. D. Holton, of Milwaukee.

3d. The city of Janesville, responded to by Mr. Williams of that city.

4th. The village of Whitewater, responded to by Rufus Cheney, of that village.

5th. The press of Wisconsin, responded to by Col. Hart, of Milwaukee.

6th. Roads and bridges, the first prints of the dawning sun of civilization.

7th. The iron roads of our country, a network binding State to State in political union, community to community in commercial and social intercourse, the only talisman which can convert into reality the statesman's dream of a single and united Republic stretching from ocean to ocean.

8th. The whistle of the locomotive. It swallows up the secret of the fife, and the roll of the drum; its resonant echoes sounding peace on earth and good will to man.

9th. The railroad system of the western continent; already has it entwined the flags of two Nations.

10th. Panics. The thunder storms of the financial atmosphere purifying it, and compelling, as politicians say, a recurrence to fundamental principles.

11th. The State of Wisconsin, nestled between two great highways, scooped out by nature. The energy of her people will complete the work in crowning with success her splendid projected system of railways.

12th. Our invited guests—by the aid of yonder iron arms, may we often grasp them with the hand of fellowship and welcome.

There were a few incidents and arrangements of the celebration that had some little effect to mar the festivities, and for which our citizens may be unjustly blamed. We have not time to allude to them, and it would perhaps do no good if we could.

We cannot close without giving in our testimony to the very affable, kind and courteous manner in which Conductor Sanburn discharged all the duties of his station. He never wearied in answering the thousand questions that were given him by inquisitive folks unaccustomed to railroad travel, greeted all with the same unvarying politeness, and assiduously labored for the comfort and safety of the large family he had to provide for. It is of vast importance to a railroad corporation to have obliging and courteous employees, such as we feel and know Mr. Sanburn to be, and we are twice glad that we have such upon the Southern Wisconsin Railroad.

HOW THE RAILROAD WAS BUILT TO MONROE.

So great was the desire of the people of Green county to have a railroad, that, at an early day, they had subscribed liberally toward the building of the one contemplated from Janesville to Monroe; but, with all their liberality, there was still a lack of means to carry forward the enterprise. The system of "Farm Mortgages" was therefore resorted to, which, in the end, caused a great deal of trouble and anxiety to many of the farmers of Green county, although no very great pecuniary loss (except in a few cases) was the result—thanks to the energetic and self-sacrificing efforts of E. D. Clinton of Brodhead, Brooks Dunwiddie of Monroe, and per haps one or two others in a less degree.

"In mortgaging their farms," says Miss Bingham (History of Green County, pp. 34—36), "some of the farmers were influenced wholly by a desire to get the railroad here, but most of them were also moved by a spirit of speculation. Stock in the railroad company was given them for their mortgages, and the general opinion of its value was such that farmers made their mortgages as large as the company would allow them to be. The company promised to pay the interest on all the mortgages, and promised that no mortgages on land west of Brodhead should be sold until the road reached Brodhead, and none from west of Monroe until the road reached Monroe. In October, 1854, stock to the amount of $485,900 had been taken. The greater part of it was in Green county, but the mortgages given in the vicinity of Shullsburg amounted to $128,000. By February, 1856, work on the road had begun. The mortgages were taken to New England, where they sold readily. The company also obtained money at three different times by mortgages on the road; but much of the money obtained in these ways was used on the Prairie du Chien road, and work, on the Southern Wisconsin was not prosecuted with the vigor which the mortgagor's had hoped for. The road to Prairie du Chien was finished in April, 1857, but the company had not then the money to push forward the other road. It was really Green county, not the railroad company, that brought the road from Janesville, and a great number of citizens are entitled to a share of the credit of it; but, much as it cost in money, the greatest cost of the road was in the anxiety and long suspense it brought the mortgagors.

“The company assumed an appearance of great fairness towards the mortgagors. Sometimes a director was chosen from among them, and, as was especially the case in the election of Judge Dunwiddie, this was conducive to the interests of both the company and the mortgagors; but the appearance was frequently deceptive. On one occasion, all the stockholders and their wives were given a free ride to Milwaukee, to attend a railroad meeting. They were all urged to go, but, after their arrival at the meeting some pretext was raised by which almost every one of them was prevented from voting. The agreement of the company in regard to using the mortgages from the country west of Monroe was so far kept that, before the sale of the road in August, 1857, all those given west of Green county were released. The desire for the road was so great in Lafayette county that E. D. Clinton, the general agent of the road, and the man who, more than any one else, was the cause of its extension from Janesville, found more difficulty in releasing the mortgages than he had found in obtaining them. Two men refused to comply with the condition of a release, which was to pay the recorder's fee, and in these cases Mr. Clinton paid the costs himself. The mortgages given in the western part of the county were all sold before the road reached Monroe, and the promise in regard to paying the interest on the mortgages was not fulfilled. After the completion of the road, the stock was raised by a fictitious dividend and by some other devices to ninety percent. The holders of the mortgages were by this time glad to sell them, and the company bought them and settled with the mortgagors by buying their stock at ninety percent. A few of the farmers had previously effected a settlement with the purchasers of their mortgages, and paid more; but ten cents on a dollar was all that any of them were obliged to pay, and a few of them never paid anything.”

FARM MORTGAGES.

[BY E. D. CLINTON.]

I was sent by the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad Company, as their stock agent, to ascertain what could be done to build the road west of Janesville. I went to Monroe, there being very little interest at Janesville, and called on Judge Dunwiddie and Mr. Ludlow, also on Judge Bingham, who has since died. These men introduced me to John H. Bridge, who then lived eight or ten miles south of Monroe (now in Monroe). I informed them there was so little money in the country, we could not build as rapidly as we wanted to without resorting to farm mortgages. We had taken farm mortgages and used them successfully in building the road to Janesville. I consulted with the men referred to at Monroe, and others they introduced me to. I tried to impress upon them that giving farm mortgages would secure an early completion of the road to Monroe, and that they had only to convince the farmers that by mortgaging their farms they would not put their property in jeopardy.

For the purpose of giving them an understanding on what condition the mortgages were taken, we appointed a county meeting at the court house in Monroe, and invited all the people of the county interested to be present.

There was a general rally, and the court house was filled. Quite a number of the directors of the railroad were present, with the chief engineer. I was called upon to explain the object of the meeting. I then said: "I am glad the directors are present, as I have just come from the La Crosse road. in my explaining the plan of the company, if I do not state it correctly they will correct me." I then laid on the table a large number of copies of reports of work the previous year, which, as it regards correctness, was certified to by John Catlin, the president of the company, and William Taintor, secretary, by affidavit. Their veracity was not doubted by any one acquainted with them. I requested each one interested to take stock by mortgage; also to take a copy of the report home and look it over carefully. "After you have heard what I have to say," I continued, "and these directors in explanation, if you feel safe and wish to secure the road to Monroe, you will come to Monroe, where Dr. Peck, who is with me, and is a notary public, will fill up the mortgages and take the acknowledgement at your houses. We do not wish any but genuine mortgages, with the expectation of your paying it; if the company fail to pay, just as you would have to pay a bank note. We want to do everything in good faith, so that we can realize the money on the mortgages to build the road without loss. I now attempt," I said farther, "to explain the proposition of the company to take your mortgages—This is the plan, that you give your note and mortgage to the company or holder, for any amount you wish to take, to run ten years, with coupons attached, interest payable annually, at the rate of 8 percent., for which the company authorizes me, as their agent, to give you a receipt in full for the shares of capital stock, or any number of shares, of $100 each in said company. The company will give you an indemnifying bond that they will, pay the interest for ten years, also pay you 2 percent. annually, making it that the company allows you

10 percent. interest, while the coupons called for 8 per cent."

Perhaps this is not worded precisely, but it is the general idea, as I now recollect. At the close of my first talk in the court house at Monroe to induce men to give their mortgages, the directors were called upon to speak. They fully endorsed what I had said in regard to the good faith and responsibility of the company. If you give your mortgages you will be protected as the mortgagors have been heretofore, and you will secure the completion of the road to Monroe. One of the directors said the first man that will give his mortgage to the amount of $10,000 shall have an engine put on the road bearing his name. I believe John H. Bridge secured that honor, and the company fulfilled their agreement. There was a full representation of Green county at that meeting. I then explained to them that the mortgages given east of Green county a number of years previous to this drew 10 percent. annually, the company agreeing to pay 12 percent. interest, also the 2 percent. bonus. "Now you will find in these reports," said I, "that the company have promptly paid the interest as agreed. [If I recollect right this report was for the previous year's earnings.] After the road was completed to Madison, that year the road earned, after paying interest on farm mortgages and mortgages on the road, and running expenses, enough so that the company gave 15 percent dividend to paying stockholders, as you will see by the report. I gave $5,000 among the first. I have never been called upon to pay 1 cent of interest, and no other mortgagor. I am credited upon the stock book annually 2 percent., to lay there until the principal becomes due. You know the country better than I do. I have never been west of Monroe on this line. I know of no reason why the company cannot be as successful in the future as in the past. I see no waste land from Janesville to Monroe that compares with the non-producing land next to Madison on that line half way to Rock river. I do not want you to give mortgages because I have. After you look the report over, if you want to give a mortgage, let me know."

I told them also I believed their land would be doubled in value by having the road completed to Monroe. I think that has been more than realized. There is one farm, to my knowledge, that was sold for $20 an acre, the highest price that could be obtained at that time, which has since been sold for $64 an acre. The rise of land, and increased facilities for transportation, have exceeded my representation. In Rock county, farmers could not get their wheat taken to market at the half's. I presume the same fact existed in Green county. After the road was built to Whitewater, they could market their wheat from that point at less than 10 percent., while before they could not get it done for less than 50 percent. The same facts existed along the whole line. Circumstances occurred that the cost of the road exceeded all expectation and greatly exceeded the expense of the road that had been built. At that time there was very little prospect of any benefit from the road until completed to the Mississippi river. The company gave such an extraordinary contract to complete it in so short a time that I have no doubt they were slaughtered a half million dollars; consequently they piled up liabilities of bonds to pay interest upon without a corresponding income from the road. This embarrassed the mortgagors. The company failed to pay annual interest according to agreement. When the road was completed to Prairie du Chien, the company found themselves in competition with the Mississippi river, and was compelled to carry wheat from Prairie du Chien to Milwaukee for nine cents a bushel, which was a very little, if any, more than from Madison to Milwaukee, half the distance.

The company suffered a great loss in negotiating farm mortgages with irresponsible parties who made a fictitious company to perpetrate a fraud on the railroad company. They got possession of $130,000, only paying $10,000. The company lost in that transaction at least $130,000. These circumstances combined had a tendency to discredit the company, and disable them from making any negotiations with capitalists, for further means to build the road. They had issued, under press of circumstances, third mortgages to the amount of $300,000 and the coupons had become due, and there were no means of paying them in hand. It was thought best by some of our directors to negotiate with parties who would take the road on the irresponsible foreclosure of the third mortgage bonds subject to the first and second mortgage, on conditions that all of the common stockholders should not be entitled to vote until the earnings of the road should be sufficient to pay up running expenses and interest on bonds, and yield a dividend to common stockholders; then, they should be restored to vote as provided in the charter. This proposition was acceded to by the directors very reluctantly. However the road was sold and taken possession of by Mr. Myers from New York, their president. This measure being adopted, left no provision to carry out the obligations of the former company to the mortgagors.

I explained the obligation of the old company, and said there was no necessity of giving the road up. The crops on the ground if they could provide rolling stock to move it to market would pay every cent of the interest, and the bonds and farm mortgages before they could get judgment or foreclose on the mortgages. The road was worth in cash all the mortgages and bonds, including the farm mortgages and, the president could well afford to provide for the latter. He appeared very friendly to the mortgagors. I could not get him, however, to agree to make any provision to protect them. Believing, as I did, that the road was well worth all the liabilities, I turned my whole attention to the legislature. I paid my own expenses at three sessions to get legislation to compel the railroad company to protect the mortgagors from paying interest as agreed when the mortgages were taken. I did not believe the directors had a right to hand over the road voluntarily to be foreclosed, and disfranchise the stockholders from representation of their stock. When I held meetings I read the charter which showed that each stockholder was entitled to one vote for every share of stock held by him. I consulted with lawyers; they agreed with me that it was an illegal organization until recognized by the legislature. I consulted with Mr. Harvey while he was a candidate for the governorship. I submitted to him what had been agreed upon by the friends of the mortgagors, that we would ask the legislature to pass a bill to appropriate 3 percent of the freight of every bushel of wheat, and all other freight in proportion, and of the fare of passengers, for a sinking fund to pay off the farm mortgages. He said if he was elected he would include that in his message. He considered it reasonable and just. He was elected, and failed to include the fact in his message. I went to him, after reading his message, to know the reason of his not fulfilling his agreement. He said he went to Milwaukee and consulted with the principal railroad men who said it would embarrass mortgagors if we provided a sinking fund to pay off the mortgages, because it would raise the price of the mortgages so they could not be bought. Then I said: "Governor, your advisers do not care anything about the holders of the mortgages. They bought the mortgages in good faith; we have their money to build the road when we could not raise it anywhere else; they ought to have their pay."

The governor replied: "I will do anything in my power for the right to save all parties."

We went to work to get up a bill while the legislature was in session to carry out our idea of a sinking fund. Mr. Spencer, the manager of the road, had a bill that would legalize, it passed, their organization. When offered, this bill was laid on the table, and our bill was introduced, and referred to a committee. Mr. Spencer come to me, and said if their bill was passed it would protect the mortgagors. I said to him, Mr. Small holds large amounts of these mortgages to collect. If you can bargain with him to surrender the mortgages for the stock, you can have any legislation you want, that is reasonable." He consulted with Mr. Small, and they came to an agreement and Mr. Spencer's bill passed.

It seemed impossible at the time we took the mortgages that any man should suffer by mortgaging his farm if the company had fulfilled their agreement that they would pay the interest on the mortgages and hold the givers of the same harmless for ten years, besides paying them the 2 percent. annually. It will readily be seen that if the stock was worth only 80 percent. at the end of ten years, the 2 percent. per annum, which the company agreed to pay would make up the amount of the principal. At the time the mortgages were given in Green county, the stock was, I believe, worth 100 cents on the dollar.

FARM MORTGAGES—EXTRACTS FROM THE MONROE SENTINEL.

I.—MILWAUKEE & MISSISSIPPI RAILROAD.

[Sept. 6, 1854.]

The plan for the consolidation of the above railroad interests under the name and style of the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad Company is now in process of completion, through the agency of E. D. Clinton, agent for the M. & M. R. R. Co.

Mr. Clinton is authorized to procure stock for the consolidated company.

The plan which he has adopted comprises two kinds of stock. The first, personal or cash subscription; and the second mortgage or real estate security stock.

The first of these plans will require the payment of cash at the rate of 25 percent, per annum; the second requires merely the giving of a mortgage for one-half the value of the real estate named therein, the valuation thereof to be made by your own neighbors, and the appraisals to be made in good faith. The conditions of this valuation will be fully explained by the agent at each meeting.

We suppose this proposal to be stated sufficiently clear to meet the understanding of all.

It remains for us to give our opinion of the plan, the policy of which will be questioned by some, and the deep interest we believe the owners of real estate have in taking all the second kind of stock that lies within their power. We believe the plan to be thoroughly feasible, safe and desirable, and that the opportunity to take stock in this way, should be embraced by every one with a view to his own interest alone.

The plan is safe. The company will pay the interest on all money borrowed for the use of the road upon the credit of these real estate securities, and allow to each of the mortgagors the sum of 2 percent. per annum, giving a certificate for stock to the amount of the mortgage, more or less, as if the whole had been paid up or into the treasury of the company. The money borrowed upon the strength of these securities will be carefully appropriated for the building of the road, and by the legitimate operation of the process for the liquidation of the debt the mortgagor becomes a bona fide stockholder to the amount of his mortgage without the outlay of a dollar. In fact it amounts to the payment of all his stock as a bonus for the use of his credit.

Now, in our judgment, every farmer, every real estate owner, should deem it a privilege to have the opportunity under the mortgage system. The great advantage offered by railroad facilities in getting produce to market, we need not dilate upon. But the additional advantage of receiving into our own pockets the proportional net earnings of the road, is a consideration too important to be lightly thrown away. Should the farmers of Green county let an opportunity pass for becoming stock-holders when the opportunity is offered to do so without the outlay of a dollar of consideration, further than loaning their credit to a perfectly reliable company, of which they may become a part? We think not—and we feel very sure that that man, whoever he may be, that lets this opportunity pass, will have occasion to regret it at no distant day, when it is too late to remedy the evil his timidity has wrought to himself and family. We would rejoice to see our farmers become stock-holders to the amount of $500,000 if it were possible, and it is possible. Why should not the farmers of Green and the counties west, become the real owners of this line of railroad at no distant day? Is it really an object for you to pay into the pockets of eastern capitalists the necessary expenses of transporting your own produce? Why not have it return to your own pockets? Answer, if you please.

When you have notice of a meeting or meetings in your respective neighborhoods, by all means turn out. You will then meet with the agent, who will explain to you fully and clearly, the mode and manner of all these things, and when you come out to the neighborhood meetings bring your women folks. They have an interest in all this matter. Your wives, your daughters, have an interest in common with yourselves, men. They, should have an opportunity to become informed in the premises. It is necessary that the wife should join her husband in executing the mortgage. She should be permitted to understand it, and thereby enabled to give an intelligent signature to the papers.

Mr. Clinton will be able to satisfy any man or woman who may be desirous of making a permanent investment under circumstances peculiarly favorable to those persons, that it is not only a privilege, but really a duty they owe to themselves and their dependants.

Since writing the above, the committee having the matter in charge have made the following appointments in the township.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

At Delavan's school house, in Clarno, Thursday, August 31, at 2 o'clock.

Twin Grove, town of Jefferson Friday, September 1, at 2 o'clock.

Juda, Saturday, September 2, at 2 o'clock.

Clarence, Monday, September 4, school house.

Decatur, Tuesday, September 5, at 2 o'clock. Sylvester, Wednesday, September, Thompson's school house.

Jordan, Thursday, September 7, 2 o'clock, Morton's school house.

Cadiz, Friday, September 8, 2 o'clock, Swank's mill.

We earnestly recommend a general attendance at these meetings. It may be pretty safely estimated, judging from the manifestations here to-day, August 30, that Green county will take of mortgaged stock about $300,000. At this place, the meeting to-day, have subscribed over $66,000. The work goes bravely on, and we are bound to have the road.

Here are the proceedings of the meeting held at the court house, in Monroe, on Tuesday afternoon, 29th inst.:

Pursuant to adjournment of a meeting held on the evening of August 19, a large number of the citizens of Green county assembled at the court house, in Monroe, at 2 o'clock, on the afternoon of Aug. 29, 1854, to deliberate upon the construction of the Southern Wisconsin Railroad.

The meeting organized by appointing James L. Powell chairman and Edmund Bartlett secretary.

David Noggle, Esq., of Janesville, was then called upon for a speech, who responded by a few pertinent remarks in reference to the importance to Green county of the speedy completion of the road.

E. D. Clinton, Esq., agent of the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad Company, was then introduced to the meeting, who addressed the audience upon, 1st, The feasibility of the route; 2d. The certainty that the road will pay; 3d. The ability of the farmers to build the road; and 4th.

The safety of mortgaging real estate to raise the necessary means to get the road into successful operation, and the benefits which would accrue to the farmers should they mortgage their farms to build the road and own it themselves.

By invitation Mr. Finch, of Milwaukee, spoke in relation to the consolidation of the stock of the Milwaukee & Mississippi and Southern Wisconsin Railroad Companies.

Mr. Brodhead chief-engineer of the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad Company, added remarks in reference to the feasibility of the route, its value and importance, and the superiority of the narrow over the broad gauge.

B. Dunwiddie, Esq., of Monroe, suggested the propriety of appointing a committee of farmers, and others interested in the road, to confer with Mr. Clinton upon the subject under consideration.

It was voted that a committee of seventeen be appointed by the chair for the above purpose.

The committee appointed by the chairman was as follows:

Allen Woodle, Spring Grove.; Israel Smith, Cutler Wilkins, George Adams, William McDowell, Clarno; Joseph Perrine, John Walworth, Monroe; Jacob Strader, Jabez Smith, Jordan; Jeremiah Bridge, William Rittenhouse, Abraham Sanborn, Jefferson; Joseph McCracken, James Caughey, Justus Sutherland, George Bloom, Sylvester; Mordecai Kelly, Cadiz..

Voted to adjourn until 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

EDMUND BARTLETT, JAMES L. POWELL,
Secretary. Chairman.

MONROE, Aug. 29, 1854.

II.—THE RAILROAD

[Sept. 6, 1854.]

We learn by a gentleman who has been in company with the Messrs. Clinton and Peck, of the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad Company, who are now engaged in the several towns holding meetings, explaining the plan of the company, and taking mortgages for stock in the road, that something over $160,000 of stock has been taken and but four towns as yet been visited by the agents. It is now the expectation that a sufficient amount of stock will be taken during the week, to complete the consolidation and this will warrant the purchase of the iron for the road as far as to Monroe, which will be effected immediately by Mr. Holton, who is now in New York on business connected with the road. There will be an opportunity to take stock at Monroe during this week.

III.—THE RAILROAD STOCK SUBSCRIPTION.

[Sept. 20, 1854.]

We shall report weekly the state of the railroad stock subscription until the whole is taken. Up to this day (Monday, September 18,) Green county has raised the figures to $410,000. Today and tomorrow meetings are to be held at Decatur and Clarence, at which places we feel quite safe in saying the figures will be raised to $460,000. In addition to this the subscription west of Green county has reached the sum of $40,000. The people of Green cannot be stopped short of $500,000. The citizens of this county will be the recipients of the benefits of this large amount of stock in a paying road. We feel justly elated at the display of so wise a selfishness on the part of our citizens. It is an evidence of their intelligence and sagacity. The aggregate accruing wealth to the county we will not stop now to delineate. Mr. Clinton has held two meetings in Lafayette county, but being obliged to return home on business for the La Crosse & Milwaukee Company, his further visit to the counties west will be deferred until further notice—two or three weeks perhaps.

IV.—SOUTHERN WISCONSIN RAILROAD.

[From The Milwaukee Sentinel—Copied By The Sentinel
Oct. 4, 1854.]

We copy below the latter part of a report just made by Mr. Clinton, agent of the Milwaukee &

Mississippi Railroad Company, to the directors, concerning his operations in the southwestern counties. The business seems to have been managed with great ability on the part of the agent, and his efforts have been seconded nobly by the people. The plans of the company have been frankly laid before the farmers and business men of the west, and have met with their approval, as the stock books plainly tell. Only two meetings had been held in Lafayette county, one at Benton and one at Shullsburg, when Mr. Clinton was obliged to return; but such men as Messrs. Earnest, Williams, Townsend and Lee, of Shullsburg, Murphy, Parker, Johnson and Gibson, of Benton., and Edwards, of Hazel Green, Grant county, have exhibited great interest in the movement, and the people will be on hand when called upon.

Mr. Clinton says:

On Monday we closed our work at Decatur, in Green county, with a good, bona fide subscription of $485,900, and was obliged to leave blank papers with Brooks Dunwiddie, of Monroe, to fill up for those who had spoken for an opportunity of subscribing, but had been unable to meet us for that purpose before we left. Every dollar of that stock is reliable. It is taken by the very best, the most cautious, prudent and intelligent men along the line. Hardly a successful, candid farmer who has taken the time to examine the subject but has become a stockholder by all the cash stock he can carry, or by a mortgage upon his farm. The whole line of road to the Mississippi river is through a country not excelled by any portion of our State, and no estimate can be made of the amount of business which it will furnish to this road. Not only is it rich in agricultural products, but untold wealth is buried beneath the soil for many miles through which this road will run. In addition to the fertility of its soil and the wealth of its mines, the prairies are everywhere skirted with heavy timber, supplying almost every farm with sufficient for all the purposes of successful and economical farming, and a surplus large enough to supply the road with ties and wood, at a low price. With so many of the elements of prosperity surrounding this road, it cannot but pay large returns to those who have subscribed so liberally to construct it, if their means are judiciously and economically expended in its speedy construction. I am, gentlemen, yours truly,

E. D. CLINTON.

V—RAILROAD MATTERS.

[Oct. 25, 1854.]

We are informed that some evil disposed persons, or grossly misinformed, are circulating stories to the effect that some of the farmers who early mortgaged to the M. & M. Railroad Company had lost their lands, or suffered loss by doing so. This whole story is a sheer fabrication. We are authorized authoritatively to state that there is not only no truth in this story, but that there is no foundation whatever for it. There are rival interests at the bottom of these undermining reports. Our Green county farmers have come nobly to the work of raising the stock for this important road, and we have no patience with those malicious persons—tools for other interests—whose vocation seems to be to raise fears in the minds of those who have had liberality and forethought enough to enter into this matter. They still have confidence, but some will feel uneasy at these reports, not knowing whether there may be some truth in them. We now, once for all, say to our farmers that they have made a good and safe investment, and will reap a full reward in time. What they have done they will never see cause to regret. The stock of this company is to-day worth 100 cents on the dollar. Men can judge whether it is likely to be less when built to Monroe, or to the Mississippi river, and Prairie du Chien.

VI.--RAILROAD STOCK SUBSCRIPTION,

[Nov. 15, 1854.]

E. D. Clinton left this place on Monday morning for the counties west, and Dubuque. We obtained from Dr. Peck; who accompanies Mr. Clinton, a full abstract of the present amount of stock subscription. There are 6,255 shares, making the round sum of $625,000. Rock county has about $100,000 of stock, Green near half a million, with many thousand over in Illinois, adjacent to the State line. That we feel a little elevated at a sight of what the Green county farmers have done, we won't take any pains to conceal. They have done the wisest thing that has been done, for they have taken the most stock of any county in the State, by very many tens of thousands. Before ten days shall have elapsed, all that will be required to give this county a half million will have been done. We desire that this sum shall be reached and fixed as a permanent investment for this county. Had it not been for the unavoidable call of Mr. Clinton away from this line of operation, there could, if desirable, have been $1,000,000 of stock taken. There is hardly half the people in the southern part of the county that have yet taken stock. We mean those who desire it, and are only waiting opportunity. For although there have been many meetings held, yet they were so hurried that the people could not be accommodated. We now regret, and all will have cause to regret, that, although the interests of the county will be largely represented in the new board of directors, the people will not own all the stock in the road or that portion from Janesville to Monroe. The best system of building railroads is now pursued by this company that has ever been adopted in the world. Because the owners of the road are those who will be chiefly benefited by its completion. It is only strange that the system had not obtained long ago. By this system the earnings of the road remain with the people through whose country the road passes. The inhabitants are thus interested in having a good road, taking care of it, and having it generally well managed.

We expect to live to see the day when this plan will obtain in building the Pacific rail way. It can be done. We don't want Uncle Samuel to give any great company land to build a road to the Pacific. Let him give the land to settlers and we will insure the building of the railway to meet the waves of the western ocean in less than ten years. The people will do this, only give them the land, and let the land jobbers and robbers go the devil or to Washington—there ain't much to choose.

Now Messrs. Lafayette county, Grant county and Dubuque folks, don't let the agent, Mr. Clinton, return until he gets the railroad matter finished up, as far as you are concerned. Let us know on what basis we stand with you. If you want anything to do with our road, please do it soon, or let us know it at your earliest convenience; and the people in Green county will take good care that the work goes on anyhow. To those who feel an interest in knowing what the people of Green county think of Mr. Clinton, we all had abundant opportunity to see him and learn his character as a railroad man, the whole souled men of Green are his endorsers, to-day. The people of Green desire that his reception shall be of such a nature in the west, that upon his return they will know the basis on which the work is to be commenced in the spring. They desire to be satisfied with it at that time.

VII.—A CARD FROM E. D. CLINTON.

Editors Sentinel:—Business connected with the line of another road in which I am interested, calls me away from the line of the M. & M. R. R. for the present, and I wish to say through your paper to those who have spoken for an opportunity of taking stock, and upon whom I have in some instances promised to call, that Dr. Peck, who has been with me through the whole work, will be in Monroe, from and after the 6th of December next, and if any persons wishing to subscribe will leave their names with H. B. Poyer or B. Dunwiddie, he will call on them at their residences. We have met with the most complete success west of here to the Mississippi river, and now only lack $30,000 of the sum at which the board of directors have limited us in the way of stock subscription.

E. D. CLINTON.

VIII.—IMPORTANT TO STOCK SUBSCRIBERS.

[Dec. 13, 1854.]

The subscribers to the stock of the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad Company in Green county are respectfully notified that they ought to procure the recording of patents and certificates at the earliest day possible, as a matter of convenience to themselves individually and the company.

Dr. Lewis E. Peck is now in Monroe, and desires to get through with the recording at the earliest day.

This notice applies equally to those in other counties along the line of this road.

We had intended to have published the very satisfactory report of Mr. Clinton to the M. & M. board of directors, but the message takes all the room we have to spare for this week. Next week we will give the report and some other railroad matters. We have had a lengthy article on hand for several weeks, from the Milwaukee Sentinel, and are only waiting room.

IX.—E. D. CLINTON'S REPORT.

[FROM MILWAUKEE SENTINEL—COPIED BY MONROE SENTINEL, DEC. 20, 1854.]

We take pleasure in publishing the annexed report of E. D. Clinton, embodying the result of his canvassing tour through the southern counties for subscriptions to the stock of the Southern Wisconsin Railroad. It will be seen that the most gratifying success attended Mr. Clinton's labors, and that the farmers, miners and property owners all along the line of this road stand ready to help forward the enterprise, not only with their good will, but with substantial aid and comfort. It is confidently believed that a subscription of $2,000,000 will ensure the building of the road, and that work can be commenced and steadily prosecuted as soon as the money market recovers from its stringency. The indications now are that the ensuing year will be a favorable one for railroad projects founded on a proper basis and secure of a good business. Labor and materials, especially iron will be much cheaper than during the past two years, and though capital is not likely to be abundant, it can be had for such a road as the Southern Wisconsin, which is backed by a liberal home subscription, traverses a most productive region is sure of a heavy traffic and connects at Janesville with the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad, one of the most successful enterprises in the west.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

Milwaukee, Nov 30, 1854.

To the board of directors of the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad Company:

Gentlemen:—The amount of stock subscriptions to the M. & M. R. R., on the line between the city of Janesville and Mississippi river at the date of my first report was a little short of $500,000. At that time I had visited only hurriedly that part of the line west of Green county, and but casually that part of Rock county west of Janesville. Since the date of that report I have visited almost every town immediately upon the line and at every point where the books have been opened, very liberal subscriptions have been made; and had I not been hurried through by the urgency of other engagements, I am satisfied that a very much larger amount would have been raised. The amount now upon the books, every dollar of which is believed to be of the most available character is $950,300 a very large proportion of which is farm mortgages. To this amount may safely be added $50,000 from men who are only waiting for an opportunity to subscribe and who would be upon the books if we had not been so hurried that we could not call upon each man personally. This amount I feel confident will be more than realized on the return of Dr. Peck, who will go immediately back and remain for some time upon the line for the purpose of perfecting the abstracts of titles to the mortgages already taken and who will call upon all those awaiting an opportunity to subscribe.

By Bonds of Milwaukee City	$300,000
Janesville City	50,000
Dubuque (pledged by com	300,000
New stock subscribed	950,300
Pledged at Dubuque	100,000
Old stock subscribed to S. W. R. R	180,000
Total	$ 1,980,300

In addition to the above amount, the committee appointed at a meeting of the citizens of Dubuque held on the 15th inst. pledged to me at least $100,000 of individual cash subscriptions and at least $300,000 of the bonds of the city.

The amount now especially appropriated to the construction of that line of road is as follows:

This amount could be very considerably increased and should you determine to take a less amount of the city bonds when they are voted to be given for a subscription of stock it would, I have no doubt, be very generally satisfactory to the stockholders, and individual subscriptions would be quickly raised to an equal amount.

In conclusion allow me to say that we have everywhere met with a hearty reception and, our efforts have been materially aided by the exertions of the most reliable and substantial men all along the line. At Shullsburg, New Diggings, Benton and Jamestown, we had the hearty co-operation of Messrs. Griffin, Townsend, Judge Knowlton, Earnest, Murphy and others who took hold with a determined will. At Shullsburg, aided by such men as I have mentioned, we took, in a single day, a subscription of $127,000 the largest amount subscribed in any one day on the whole line.

At Dubuque also we found warm friends who took hold of the matter with an earnestness that speaks well for the interest felt at that place in the success of the enterprise. Messrs. Jones, Langworthy and Farley, are particularly zealous in their efforts and felt quite confident that an amount fully equal to that pledged, would be very speedily raised.

In your efforts for the early completion of the road you will have not only the sympathies and good will of the whole community through which it passes, but what is far more important in the construction of this road, their aid in a material way will be given to the extent of their ability.

Respectfully yours,

E. D. CLINTON.

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE & ST. PAUL RAILWAY.
MONROE BRANCH.

It has already been explained that, in 1857, the State legislature passed an act authorizing all stock-holders in all incorporated companies to vote on shares of stock owned by them. Upon this subject Mr. Clinton says: "Benjamin Hopkins, a member of the legislature (a shrewd manager), under the head of a petroleum bill, got an act passed to enable all stock-holders to represent what was known as "common stock." There being a majority of that character of stock of the railroad then furnished to Monroe, in the hands of what is now the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company, the railroad to Monroe was carried over to their control, where it still remains. This was in 1857—the year the road was completed to Monroe."

MINERAL POINT DIVISION

The road from Janesville to Monroe continued to run from the former to the latter place as the "Monroe Branch" until 1881, when, it having been extended west to the old Mineral Point road, the name was changed to the "Mineral Point Division," including the following stations: Janesville, Hanover, Orford, Brodhead, Juda, Monroe, Browntown, Wayne, Gratiot, Darlington, Calamine and Mineral Point. This is the road extending east and west through Green county, at the present time (1884), and the only one.

The work west of Monroe was commenced in July, 1880, and finished to Gratiot in August, 1881. The first passenger train for Mineral Point left Monroe on Sunday, the 21st of the month last named.

DEACON EDMUND D. CLINTON was one of the first to become identified with the history of Brodhead, his residence here dating from the fall of 1856. He was born in Ferrisburg, Addison Co., Vt., April 19, 1804. When he was thirteen years old his father, Henry Clinton, removed with his family to St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., where Edmund grew to manhood and learned the blacksmith trade, which business he followed a number of years. He was married in St. Lawrence county to Amanda Conkey, and in 1832 removed to Ohio. He came to Wisconsin in 1836, reaching Milwaukee June 29 of that year. There he opened the first blacksmith shop in that city, and went to work at his trade. In February, 1837, he went from Milwaukee to what is now Waukesha, and claimed land, to which he removed his family the following April. Here he engaged in farming and blacksmithing, and was also connected with a milling interest. A younger brother, Allen, went with him to Waukesha county, and an elder brother, Norman, came on in 1838, accompanied by their parents. Mr. Clinton was engaged in railroading for many years. He was one of the directors of the Milwaukee & Waukesha Railroad Company, when the first railroad in the State was built; afterwards with the Milwaukee & Prairie du Chien Railroad; also of the Milwaukee & La Crosse Railroad, all of which are now included in the corporation known as the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company. He was the agent for the taking of stock and securing the right of way for these companies, in which he was eminently successful. He has been prominently identified with the interests of Brodhead, since he came here in 1856, and in the advancement of moral and religious sentiment he has been a prominent actor. He and his wife were converted at Canton, St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., in 1832, and soon after removed to Portage Co., Ohio, where they united with the Presbyterian Church, but the society with which they united soon after withdrew from the Presbytery and became a Congregational organization, with which denomination he has ever since been identified. He assisted in the organization of the First Congregational Church at Milwaukee in 1836, and was made one of the deacons. In 1836 he was connected with the organization of the First Congregational Church of what is now Waukesha county. He helped to organize the Congregational Church at Brodhead in 1856, and was at that time appointed one of the deacons, in which capacity he has ever since served in that Church. He has faithfully served the Church of his choice for a period of more than forty-nine years. His influence, also, in the temperance cause, and other social and moral reforms, has been marked and effective, especially in the cause of anti-slavery. Deacon Clinton's first wife died in February, 1874. His present wife was Mrs. Harriet Smith Adams, born in Essex Co., N. Y. He had, by his first marriage, seven sons, only three of whom are now living—Albert T., born June 25, 1830, now of Chicago, Ill.; George, born Aug. 21, 1839, who was major in the 1st Wisconsin Cavalry, was taken prisoner and confined at Richmond and Andersonville, then exchanged and served till the close of the war. He is now superintendent of a division of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, and resides in Chicago. DeWitt is the youngest surviving son. The oldest son, Henry P., born Oct. 4, 1827, was quartermaster in the 7th Wisconsin regiment, and died in February, 1862, from the effects of exposure at and following the first battle of Bull Run. Charles W., the fourth son, born April 28, 1835, was a lieutenant in the 1st Wisconsin Cavalry, and died from the effect of vaccination, at Murfreesboro, Tenn.

Edmund D., Jr., born Sept. 26, 1846, was the sixth son, and died at the age of thirty-one years. The third son, Edson, born July 31, 1832, died Feb. 2, 1871. He was one of the original owners of the village of Brodhead.

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE & ST. PAUL RAILWAY.
ALBANY BRANCH.

This branch of the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway is the same nearly as the old track of the Sugar River Valley Railroad. concerning the last mentioned, the Monroe Sentinel of April 18, 1855, says:

“Our friends in the Sugar river valley may have been puzzled to know why we have said nothing of this new and promising enterprise. We will briefly explain. We were wanting to know something definite of the result of all the negotiation in reference to the extension of the M. & M. Railroad over the line of the Southern Wisconsin. This last matter is finally closed and as this was a necessary step, as a connection with this is specified in the Sugar River Charter, we feel now at liberty to say something of the road which, we trust, is to be built for the benefit of the people, especially those living in the valley of the Sugar river.

“This latter road is to be commenced in the valley of Sugar river, near where the M. & M. R. R. crosses the Sugar river, running up the valley of Sugar river by way of Decatur, Albany, Attica, Dayton, Belleville, etc., in a northwest direction, until it reaches the line of the road to Prairie du Chien, in the neighborhood of Arena. It is believed that this road will be good stock, or this is the opinion of several competent engineers who ought to know. If built it will accommodate a large and fertile section of country and contribute to enhance the value of the stock of the Milwaukee & Mississippi Road.

“We understand that the line can be built very cheap. We know this latter fact personally—and when graded the Milwaukee Company agree to iron and put on the rolling stock—or at least such an offer has been made.”

The work of grading this road was begun by the Sugar River Valley Railroad Company upon subscriptions to stock. The Milwaukee Sentinel, under date of January, 1857, says:

“We learn from J. H. Warren, an enterprising merchant of Albany, Green county, that the work on the Sugar River Valley R. R., which is to give the people of the fertile and popular region near the east line of Green county, an outlet to market and a connection with all the world and the rest of mankind, is being pushed forward with commendable diligence.

”The contractors expect to have the track from Albany to Brodhead, on the Southern Wisconsin Railroad ready for the rails by the time the S. W. Railroad reaches Brodhead in the spring. This enterprise has been pushed along quietly, but surely, and rests on the sure basis of home subscriptions of stock.”

The following from the Monroe Sentinel of April 13, 1870, shows the majority given in the town of Albany for aid to this railroad:

“The majority in the town of Albany for railroad bonds to aid in the construction of the Sugar River Valley Railroad was ninety. There was also a good majority for the same in the town of Exeter. We believe all the towns along that route, in this county, except Spring Grove, have fully expressed a willingness to aid in building the road. We believe it is the purpose of those having in charge the construction of this road to grade and tie it, and then mortgage the same for the iron and rolling stock. Things look encouraging for our neighbors, and everything shows that they are working with a will.”

On the 11th of June, 1873, the Monroe Sentinel has the following:

“Charles Campbell, the president and principal man of the Sugar River Valley Railroad Company, has returned from his visit of several months in Europe, where it is said he has arranged matters for the probable speedy construction of the road. An engineer is to be sent over immediately to make a survey and report the condition of things, and, if found to be satisfactory and as represented by Mr. Campbell, that gentleman has no doubt of his being able to complete the arrangements for money to finish the road from Portage to Rockford, or some other connecting point. The Sugar river valley folks, including Mr. Campbell, are highly elated with the prospect. The road, when built, will be a good thing for Albany.”

The grading of the road was finished by the contractors—James Campbell and L. H. and E. F. Warren—from Albany to Brodhead in May, 1859. Nothing further was done on the line for twenty-one years. In July, 1880, J. H. Warren closed a contract with the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company to complete the road. The old grade, which, in many places, had been washed away, was repaired, and two and one-half miles of new grade made. The work was at once put in charge of E. F. Warren, who completed it so as to enable the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company (who had only to lay the rails and put on the rolling stock) to commence running on the “Albany Branch” Oct. 22, 1880. The expense of grading and ties was paid by citizens of Albany.

JAMES CAMPBELL

was born in Susquehanna Co., Penn., Feb. 19, 1814. He belonged to a numerous family, and the parents not possessing largely of this world's goods, the children were early taught the important lesson of self-reliance; and in the case of James this lesson was never forgotten. He received what at that day was deemed a good common school education, and at the age of twenty-one started out in life for himself, and in 1835, came to Wisconsin. The next season he rented a farm in Green county and devoted himself vigorously as a farmer. He soon purchased a farm in Albany, moved on to it in 1841, and was the first settler in that town. He was successful in his calling and accumulated sufficient capital to establish a store in the village of Albany, about one mile north of his farm, in 1850. He had a vigorous constitution and a mind able to grasp and pursue large business operations. As early as 1855, he conceived the scheme of constructing the Sugar River Valley Railroad, and through his influence a charter was obtained, first for the construction of the road from the State line north to Albany; shortly afterward it was extended to Madison by an amendment. In 1856 matters had progressed so favorably that he was confident of success. While he has given that enterprise considerable thought and effort, he only lived to see the first link of the original road completed between Albany and Brodhead. The completion of this short line, being the point of his first railroad enterprise, gave Mr. Campbell great satisfaction. In 1861 Mr. Campbell served as a member of the general assembly from this county, and was an influential member of that body. He was watchful of every State interest, and as chairman of the committee on Claims, was vigilant in guarding the State treasury. The interests of his favorite railroad scheme received from him close attention, and he succeeded in procuring an amendment to his old charter of the Sugar River Valley Railroad, extending the line from Madison to Portage; and that portion of the land grant of 1856, that had been given to aid the construction of a railroad between those two cities, was given to this company. In 1862 Mr. Campbell gave up his mercantile pursuits and devoted his whole time and energies to the construction of this road. For a while everything was prosperous and satisfactory; but, in 1863 there was some trouble, the company became involved in debt, and work for a time upon the road was suspended, much to the pecuniary injury of Mr. Campbell, who was the principal contractor for building the road. The property was subsequently sold on execution and Mr. Campbell became the purchaser. In 1870, the time fixed in the charter for the completion of the road having expired, and the company having forfeited all claim to the land grant, Mr. Campbell procured from the legislature the charter of the Madison & Portage Railroad Company, and a transfer of the land grant to it. He then felt that the securing of the construction of his favorite railroad was within reach, and he bent his whole energies to the work, and in less than one year after the passage of the charter his hopes were realized the road was completed, and cars were running on it between the cities of Madison and Portage. The labor of constructing this road was attended with many and serious obstacles, but Mr. Campbell knew no such word as "fail," and succeeded in overcoming all difficulties through his great perseverance and by the force of his will power. Considering all things this work was an important accomplishment, and placed Mr. Campbell prominently among the railroad men of the State. After this, for a number of years he was engaged in an effort to extend the road both north and south, so as to connect the immense lumber regions of Wisconsin with the vast prairie land and extensive coal mines of Illinois. For a time his prospects for success seemed excellent; he made three trips to England in this interest, and would no doubt have succeeded in the enterprise but for the general depression of railroad securities following the crash of 1873. He always claimed that he would have obtained all the money he desired for his project but for the passage of what was known as the "Potter Law," governing railroads in this State. How this may have been it is difficult to tell, but such was Mr. Campbell's claim. He gave up the work with great reluctance, as he never gave up willingly any favorite project. After running the Madison and Portage road a few years, arrangements were made by which it became a part of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul line, and is now owned by that corporation. Mr. Campbell was a contractor for the construction of a railroad in Iowa, and also sections of the Union Pacific, and completed his work in a satisfactory manner.

For a few years previous to his death which occurred in January 1883, he lived a more quiet life, devoting his attention mainly to the management of a farm in the town of Dane, Dane county, and to another one in the State of Iowa. He also has been extensively engaged in the sheep husbandry in Texas, and within the space of two months during the last year of his life, he made two trips, one to California and one to Texas, in connection with his sheep operations. He possessed many original ideas in regard to farming, and was generally successful in them. He had large interests in real estate and other valuable property. Mr. Campbell was married Nov. 26, 1840, to Lorinda Hills. By this marriage three children were born to them, one of whom is now living. She is the wife of George O. Clinton, who at one time was superintendent of the Rio Grande division of the Texas Pacific railroad and now occupies a similar position on a division of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul line. Mrs. Campbell survives her husband, and is now living in the village of Albany. As a citizen Mr. Campbell was universally respected for his sterling integrity of character, for his wonderful energy, and for his broad, liberal and thoroughly practical views on all questions of public interest. He was true to his friends and generous toward all who proved themselves worthy of his confidence. As a business man, he was clear headed, sound in judgment, energetic and decisive in his action, and while modest and unassuming in his bearing, he was characterized by strong individuality, positiveness in opinion, and tenacity of purpose that caused him to succeed, where most men would have failed. As a husband and father, Mr. Campbell was generous, indulgent and kind, ever ready and anxious in seeking the comfort of all around him. The loss of such a man is no common one. He was of use in the world, and his example is worthy of imitation. and his removal during the time of such apparent usefulness, is among those mysterious dispensations of Providence, which to the finite mind is incomprehensible. Such a life deserves more than a passing notice, and some of the more important events of it have been mentioned, forming an imperfect sketch of the career of a generous and honest man thus called to his final rest.

JOHN H. WARREN

is a native of Hogansburg, Franklin Co., N. Y. He was born on the 23d of August, 1825, and is the son of Lemuel and Betsey Warren (nee) Richardson. His grandfather served in the Revolutionary War, and his father, a descendant of the New England Warren of very early date, was a soldier in the War of 1812. John attended the common schools of his native place until thirteen years of age, and after removing to Wisconsin attended the first school taught in Janesville; later he was a pupil in a school which was kept in a log cabin in the town of Centre, and there completed his early education. Having decided to enter the medical profession, he began his studies at the age of twenty in the office of Dr. Nichols, of Janesville, and afterward studied with Dr. Dyer, of Chicago, and at the same time attended a course of lectures at Rush Medical College, from which he graduated in 1849. Immediately after graduation he established himself in his profession at Lodi, Columbia county, but in 1851, at the urgent request of a brother, relinquished his practice, and removing to Albany, Green county, engaged in milling and mercantile business, continuing in the same with uniform success till 1870. Aside from his regular business he has been honored with many public trusts, and in all his active career has been a leading and influential man. In 1857, he was elected to the State Senate and was afterward chief clerk of the same. He was appointed collector of internal revenue in 1862 by President Lincoln and held the office during a period of seven years, and was also appointed by Secretary Stanton receiver of commutation during the rebellion. He was also at one time a director of Sugar Valley Railroad and a stock-holder in the same. Subsequently he was the largest mail contractor in the United States, having over 100 mail routes. His business has caused him to travel extensively over the different States and Territories, by reason of which he has become well acquainted with the character of the Indians and heartily favors every movement that tends to further the interests of the peace policy. In the discharge of all his public trusts his conduct has been marked by that energy and spirit of enterprise that ever characterized him in his private affairs, and by an honorable and upright course in all his dealings he has become known as one of the leading and prominent men of his State. In his political sentiments, he was formerly a whig but is now identified with the republican party Dr. Warren was reared under Presbyterian influences, and although not connected with any Church organization is a firm believer in the principles of Christianity, and still adheres to the doctrines taught him by his mother. He was married on the 18th of December, 1854, to Louisa M. Nichols daughter of his old preceptor, the pioneer of Albany, Wis., and by her has two sons and five daughters—Herbert N., Julia, Lissie, Gertrude, Lulu, Benjamin and Fannie. Domestic in his habits, Dr. Warren finds his chief enjoyment in his own home, surrounded by his happy family, by whom he is respected and esteemed as a devoted husband and indulgent father. He is now a resident of Janesville.

THE CHICAGO & NORTHWESTERN RAILWAY.

The Territorial legislature of 1848 chartered the "Madison & Beloit Railroad Company" with authority to build a railroad from Beloit to Madison only. In 1850, by act of the legislature, the company was authorized to extend the road to the Wisconsin river and La Crosse, and to a point on the Mississippi river near St. Paul, and also from Janesville to Fond du Lac. Its name was changed, under legislative authority, to the "Rock River Valley Union Railroad Company." In 1851, the line from Janesville north not being pushed as the people expected the legislature of Illinois chartered the "Illinois & Wisconsin Railroad Company" with authority to consolidate with any road in Wisconsin. In 1855, an act of the Wisconsin legislature consolidated the Illinois and Wisconsin companies with the "Rock River Valley Union Railroad Company," and the new organization took the name of the "Chicago, St. Paul & Fond du Lac Railroad Company." In 1854, and previous to the consolidation, the company had failed and passed into the hands of the bondholders, who foreclosed and took stock for their bonds. The old management of A. Hyatt Smith and John B. Macy was superseded, and William B. Ogden was made president. Chicago was all along deeply interested in reaching the rich grain fields of the Rock River Valley, as well as the inexhaustible timber and mineral wealth of the northern part of Wisconsin and that part of Michigan bordering on Lake Superior, called the Peninsula. It also sought a connection with the Upper Mississippi region, then being rapidly peopled, by a line of railroad to run through Madison to St. Paul, Minn. Its favorite road was started from Chicago on the wide (six feet) gauge, and so constructed seventy miles to Sharon on the Wisconsin State line. This was changed to the usual (four feet, eight and one-half inches) width, and the work was vigorously pushed, reaching Janesville in 1855 and Fond du Lac in 1858. The Rock River Valley Union Railroad Company had, however, built about thirty miles from Fond du Lac south toward Minnesota Junction before the consolidation took place. The partially graded line on a direct route between Janesville and Madison was abandoned. In 1852 a new charter had been obtained, and the "Beloit & Madison Railroad Company" had been organized to build a road from Beloit by way of Janesville to Madison. A subsequent amendment to this charter had left out Janesville as a point, and the Beloit branch was pushed through to Brooklyn in Green county, and on to Madison, reaching that city in 1864. This was the second railroad for Green county.

CHAPTER XVI.

AGRICULTURE AND THE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

The trend of the earliest industries of a country, is the result of the circumstances under which those industries are developed. The attention of pioneers is confined to supplying the immediate wants of food, shelter and clothing. Hence, the first settlers of a country are farmers, miners, trappers, or fishermen, according as they can most readily secure the means of present sustenance for themselves and their families. In the early history of Wisconsin this law is well exemplified. The southern part of the State, consisting of alternations of prairie and timber, was first settled by farmers. As the country has developed, wealth accumulated and means of transportation have been furnished, farming has ceased to be the whole interest. Manufactories have been built along the rivers, and the mining industry of the southwestern part of the State has grown to one of considerable importance. The shores of Lake Michigan was first mainly settled by fishermen, but the latter growth of agriculture and manufactures has nearly overshadowed the fishing interest; as has the production of lumber, in the north half of the State, eclipsed the trapping and fur interests of the first settlers.

Farming, at the present time, is almost entirely confined to the south half of the State, the northern half being still largely covered by forests. A notable exception to this statement is found in the counties on the western border, which are well settled by farmers much farther north. The surface of the agricultural portion of the State is for the most part gently undulating, affording ready drainage, without being so abruptly broken as to render cultivation difficult. The soil is varied in character, and mostly very fertile. The southern portion of the State consists of undulating prairies of variable size alternating with oak openings. The prairies have the rich alluvial soil so characteristic of the western prairies, and are easily worked. The soil of the "openings" land is usually a sandy loam, rapidly tilled, fertile, but not as "strong". as soils having more clay. The proportion of timber to prairie increases passing north from the southern boundary of the State, and forests of maple, basswood and elm, replace, to some extent, the oak lands. In these localities, the soil is more clayey, is strong and fertile, not as easily tilled, and not as quickly exhausted as are the more sandy soils of the oak lands. In that portion of the State known geologically as the "driftless" region, the soil is invariably good where the surface rock is limestone. In some of the valleys, however, where the lime-rock has been removed by erosion, leaving the underlying sandstone as the surface rock, the soil is sandy and unproductive, except in those localities where a large amount of alluvial matter has been deposited by the stream. The soils of the pine lands of the north of the State, are generally sandy and but slightly fertile. However, where pine is replaced by maple, oak, birch, elm and basswood, the soil is "heavier" and very fertile, even to the shores of Lake Superior.

The same natural conditions that make Wisconsin an agricultural State, determined that during its earlier years the main interest should be grain growing. The fertile prairie covering large portions of the southern part of the State had but to be plowed and sowed with grain to produce an abundant yield. From the raising of cereals the pioneer farmer could get the quickest returns for his labor.

There is the same struggle for existence, and the same desire for grain the world over, and hence the various phases of development of the same industry in different civilized countries is mainly the result of the widely varying economical conditions imposed upon that industry. Land is thoroughly cultivated in Europe, not because the Europeans have any inherent love for good cultivation, but because their land is scarce and costly, while labor is superabundant and cheap. In America, on the other hand, and especially in the newer States, land is abundant and cheap, while labor is scarce and costly. In its productive industries each country is alike economical in the use of the costly element in production, and more lavish in the use of that which is cheaper. Each is alike economically wise in following such a course, when it is not carried to too great extremes. With each the end sought is the greatest return for the expenditure of a given amount of capital. In accordance with this law of economy, the early agriculture of Wisconsin was mere land skinning. Good cultivation of the soil was never thought of. The same land was planted successively to one crop, as long as it yielded enough to pay for cultivation.

The economical principle above stated was carried to an extreme. Farming, as then practiced, was a quick method of land exhaustion. It was always taking out of the purse and never putting in. No attention was paid to sustaining the soil's fertility. The only aim was to secure the largest crop for the smallest outlay of capital, without regard to the future. Manures were never used, and such as unavoidably accumulated was regarded as a great nuisance, often rendering necessary the removal of stables and outbuildings. Straw stacks were invariably burned as the most convenient means of disposing of them. Wheat, the principal product, brought a low price, often not more than fifty cents a bushel, and had to be marketed by teams at some point, from which it could be carried by water, as this was, at an early day, the only means of transportation. On account of the sparse settlement of the country, roads were poor, and the farmer, after raising and threshing his wheat, had to spend, with a team, from two to five days, marketing the few bushels that a team could draw, so that the farmer had every obstacle to contend with except cheap and fertile land, that with the poorest of cultivation gave a comparatively abundant yield of grain. Better tillage, accompanied with the use of manures and other fertilizers, would not, upon the virgin soils, have added sufficiently to the yield to pay the cost of applying them. Hence, to the first farmers of the State, poor farming was the only profitable farming, and consequently the only good farming, an agricultural economical paradox from which there was no escape.

Notwithstanding the fact that farmers could economically follow no other system than that of land-exhaustion, as described, such a course was none the less injurious to the State, as it was undermining its foundation of future wealth, by destroying the fertility of the soil, that upon which the permanent wealth and prosperity of every agricultural community is first dependent. Besides this evil, and together with it, came the habit of loose and slovenly farming acquired by pioneers, which continued after the conditions making that method a necessity had passed away. With the rapid growth of the northwest came better home markets and increased facilities for transportation to foreign markets, bringing with them higher prices for all products of the farm. As a consequence of these better conditions, land in farms in the State increased rapidly in value. With this increase in the value of land, and the higher prices paid for grain, should have come an improved system of husbandry which would prevent the soil from deteriorating in fertility. This could have been accomplished either, by returning to the soil, in manures and fertilizers, those ingredients of which it was being rapidly drained by continued grain growing, or by the adoption of a system of mixed husbandry, which should include the raising of stock and a judicious rotation of crops. Such a system is sure to come. Indeed, it is now slowly coming. Great progress upon the earlier methods of farming have already been made. But so radical and thorough a change in the habits of any class of people as that from the farming of pioneers to rational method that will preserve the soil's fertility and pay for the labor it demands, requires many years for its full accomplishment. It will not even keep pace with changes in those economical conditions which favor it. In the rapid settlement of the northwestern States this change has come most rapidly with the replacement of the pioneer farmers by immigrants accustomed to better methods of culture. In such cases the pioneers usually "go west" again to begin anew their frontier farming upon virgin soil, as their peculiar method of cultivation fails to give them a livelihood. In Wisconsin as rapid progress is being made in the system of agriculture as, all things considered, could reasonably be expected. This change for the better has been quite rapid for the past ten years, and is gaining in velocity and momentum each year. It is partly the result of increased intelligence relating to farming, and partly the result of necessity, caused by the unprofitableness of the old method.

As has been before stated, Wisconsin is essentially a grain growing State. This interest has been the principal one, not because the soil is better adapted to grain growing than to general stock or dairy farming, but rather because this course, which was at an early day most immediately profitable, has been since persistently followed from force of habit, even after it had failed to be remunerative. The increase in the production of grain was very rapid up to 1870, while since that time it has been very slight. This rapid increase in grain raising is first attributable to the ease with which this branch of farming was carried on, upon the new and very rich soils of the State, while in the older States this branch of husbandry has been growing more difficult and expensive, and also to the fact that the war in our own country so increased the demand for grain from 1861 to 1866, as to make this course the most immediately profitable. But with the close of the war, came a diminished demand. Farmers were slow to recognize this fact, and change the character of their productions to accord with the wants of the market, but rather continued to produce the cereals in excess of the demand. The chinch bug and an occasional poor season seriously injured the crops, leaving those who relied principally upon the production of grain, little or nothing for their support. Hard times resulted from these poor crops. More wheat and corn was the farmer's usual remedy for hard times. So that more wheat and corn were planted. More crop failures, with low prices, brought harder times, until gradually the farmers of the State have opened their eyes to the truth that they can succeed in other branches of agriculture than grain growing, and to the necessity of catering to the demands of the market.

AGRICULTURAL HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

[BY THOMAS H. EATON, OF CLARNO.]

The farming interest in Green county has always been fully up to that of any other of its industries.

The first settlers were young and middle aged men. They came here with but little stock-in-trade, save their strong hands and a determination to succeed. The early settlers in this county had some advantages not common to all new counties. The proximity to the lead mines furnished them with a ready market at remunerative prices, for all their surplus products. In fact, a considerable portion of the county was a mining district. Some of our most wealthy farmers got their first start by "digging" lead ore. When the lead miners of Lafayette, Iowa and Grant counties began to supply themselves by their own agricultural resources, the farmers of Green county still had an outlet for their exports in the lumbering camps in the Wisconsin pineries.

Before the days of railroads, in Wisconsin, when a Green county farmer wished to build a new house or barn, it was his custom to load a train of wagons, in the winter season, with wheat, oats and pork, and take it to the lumber camp, where prices were always satisfactory. He would load back with pine shingles and the better qualities of finishing lumber. It was thought, at that time, a grand luxury to put on an inside finish to a house. We had an almost inexhaustible supply of the finest black walnut lumber, also butternut, but the walnut was entirely too common, and it must be painted some other color. At the present time, most anyone with a house thus painted, would give something to have the paint removed, and the rich walnut finish restored.

But there came a time in the history of Green county agriculture, when the tune was changed. The lead mines and lumber camps were being supplied by fertile fields nearer home, and the Green county farmer was compelled to cart his surplus crops to the lake shore; and these came in competition with the older settled districts of the country. There were still, at this time, many ox teams in the country, oxen were a natural adjunct to breaking the new prairie—sward; for when night came on they could be unyoked in the last furrow, the yokes and chains dropped there, and the next morning the oxen would be found close at hand fully fed on the luxuriant blue joint grass, that abounded every where. But, when it came to loading a wagon with wheat and, with an ox team, starting for Milwaukee, it was quite a different affair. It meant, on the part of the farmer, camping out and doing his own cooking, and if his "train" was overtaken with a "spell" of weather, he was lucky if he got home without being in debt. Many is the story I have heard related where the entire proceeds of a load of wheat would be eaten up in expenses, and the farmer would come home in debt.

Green county in its first settlement was as fine a wheat growing country as any on record. I have known as many as forty bushels of number one spring wheat to be grown to the acre, on large tracts of land; and thirty bushels to the acre was a common thing. Wheat was about the only crop grown in this county until the chinch bug made its appearance. I have often thought the little pest was a blessing in disguise, because there never was any money in wheat raising. The expense attending the harvesting and threshing always made too large a hole in the farmer's profits. Then, when there was an occasional failure, or partial failure, it left the cultivator of the soil badly in debt.

There was one compensation, however, in wheat farming which cannot be said about corn raising: Our rolling prairies did not wash so badly. The farmers of this county made some mistakes, however; they thought, at an early day, that the soil was inexhaustible, and they were, in the habit of burning their straw as soon as it was threshed. There was another custom adopted by many, and that was to plow a few furrows around a field, so as to protect the fences and then set fire to the stubble. I have heard many an argument on this practice. The claim was that the ash was of as much value for manure as the stubble turned under. I have always thought that the heating of the surface of the soil had a quickening influence on it, and caused it to produce well for the time being; but had an exhausting influence upon the productiveness of the soil in later years. Be this as it may, there is no one now that allows any thing to be burned on his farm.

The raising of pork, for the market, has been a leading industry ever since the wheat crop began to fail, and, in fact, to a considerable extent for a good many years before that time; as this county has always been measurably free from 'hog cholera' and all other diseases peculiar to swine.

The farmers of Green county have always used the newest inventions and the best improved farm machinery that the market afforded. The use of the land roller by all classes of farmers was said to have been brought about in this way: One of the most enterprising farmers of the county, having plowed up a number of large boulders, determined to remove them so as to have them out of the way of the reaper when the harvest came. Having no means at hand, he employed an old fashioned "stone boat." Having loaded it with boulders, he drove over the new sown wheat to a ravine at one side of the field, making, of course, different roads all over his field. He found that the wheat came up much quicker, also thicker, in these roads, and when harvest came on the wheat was found to have ripened some days sooner in these roads than on other parts of the same field—so much so, it is said, that you could see the track of the stone boat as plainly in the early harvest, in the earlier maturity of the wheat, as when they were fresh made.

Speaking of the custom of burning the straw and stubble ground, reminds me of a novel kind of threshing machine which was in use to some extent in this county when I first came here. The machine was mounted on wheels, to which was attached a platform upon which a number of shocks of wheat or oats could be loaded. The practice was to drive up to the stack and load the platform, then take a circuit round through the field. The movement of the carriage set the machinery in motion. The straw was scattered in the rear, or wake, if you like it; the cleaned grain deposited in a receptacle for that purpose; and the straw was left in a good condition to set fire to.

During the stimulus to the wool interest caused by the War for the Union, the farmers of this county went largely into sheep husbandry, hereby demonstrating that the county was remarkably well adapted to sheep culture. But, from several causes, some of which were, the want of an efficient dog law, the existence of an occasional hungry wolf, and the want of a proper discrimination on the part of Congress in behalf of the farmer, and especially the wool interest, the people largely changed off to cattle and horses—although there are at this late (1884) some very fine flocks of sheep kept in the county. The winter feeding of sheep for the Chicago fat stock market is largely and profitably engaged in by a number of our most enterprising farmers.

Several of the most wealthy citizens of this county are engaged in breeding herds of cattle of the famous "Shorthorn," and other pure breeds, largely for the supply of other communities. And the same may be said of the swine breeders of this county. Probably no other county in the State has done more to improve the several different breeds of hogs than has Green county.

But, to the dairying interest, this county owes more than to any other industry for her unparalleled prosperity. Through it the people of the county have been able to pass through two almost entire failures of the corn crop without a ripple in their finances. There are at this time, in this county, seventy-five cheese factories, of which forty-eight are engaged in the manufacture of Limburger cheese, twenty in Swiss cheese, and seven in American cheese, besides several butter dairies that make a large amount of first-class butter. The number of milch cows in the county (as per assessor's report) is 17,433; number of pounds of butter manufactured, 933,041; and of cheese, 2,015,760. Since the farmers of this county have turned their attention to the dairy interest and stock raising, the fertility of the soil has been largely increased.

In later years much interest has been manifested in the improving of the breed of horses. There is probably as fine specimens of the Norman breed owned and kept in this county as can be found anywhere in the United States. There are also some fine specimens of the Clydesdale breed. A. Ludlow, the chief breeder of Shorthorn cattle in this county, has as fine a stud of full blood Clydesdale horses as can be found anywhere. He uses no other kind of horses on his extensive farm, which lies immediately adjoining the city of Monroe. He informs me that the Clydesdale are easily broken; always reliable, and good walkers; and always bring a good price when he wishes to sell.

There is one question that the farmers of Green county have settled to their own satisfaction, at least, and that is the question of "railroad monopoly." While other communities are sweating and toiling over the subject of "cheap transportation," the farmers in this community are perfectly happy and contented.

When the markets of the lead mines and of the pineries were supplied by communities nearer to them, heretofore referred to, the farmers of this county thought if they only had a railroad to Milwaukee and Chicago, this would be a paradise indeed; and they set to work to build the Milwaukee & Mississippi Railroad (now the Milwaukee & St. Paul). The farmers along the line of the road subscribed all the money they could rake and scrape towards building the road. Many of them even mortgaged their farms to the enterprise. During the time the road was being built, times were improved somewhat by the large consumption of farm produce by the railroad hands; but when the road was once built, it augmented the class of producers to as great an extent as it facilitated the transportation of our surplus crops. The cry up to this time had been that of "quick transportation," but when the farmer's bushels of wheat, or bushels of oats or corn, had been whirled away to Milwaukee in eight hours, when it used to take him three weeks to haul it there with an ox team, he found that the railroad freight and warehouse charges had eaten up all his profits, and he was in no better plight than he was before the road was built. Then came the cry of "cheap transportation," and the subject of additional lines of railroads was agitated. There were a few farmers in this county—notably Mr. Crowell, of Green's Prairie, several of the Swiss colonists of New Glarus, and a few others—that never seemed to be in any worry about the "transportation question." It was noticed that five times out of every six when Mr. Crowell came to Monroe with a team) he came with an empty wagon and returned with it loaded. He was engaged in cheese making, and fed up all the products of his farm to his milch cows and purchased large quantities of feed besides. The example of these men was sufficient for the balance of the county. The cost of transportation of a pound of butter or cheese is so insignificant when compared with the cost of its production that it is scarcely felt by the producer.

Then, again, the dairying interest goes largely hand in hand with that of hog raising; so that the Monroe depot is the banner station in the State as a hog shipping point.

As a further evidence of the very satisfactory condition of the farming interests of this county, and, in fact, of that of every other branch of industry, is the fact that interest is not allowed on special bank deposits.

There are probably few districts of country any where that is better adapted to dairying and stock raising than Green county. The unbounded supply of pure spring water on nearly every farm in the county; the grand facilities for fencing; and its rich pasture lands; together with its steady and dry winters; make it a very healthy region for all kinds of stock.

EXTRACT FROM THE AGRICULTURAL ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY, 1855.

"I wish to call your attention to some statistics, which I have carefully gleaned from the census of June, 1850, and from which, with the aid of the census of last June, I have been able to make some calculations for the present year.

John Maxwell

By the census of 1850, the population of Green county was 8,566. The value of all stock owned in the county was $223,000, and of all animals slaughtered $34,000.

Of wheat and oats, there were raised 150,000 bushels of each; corn 134,000 bushels; potatoes 17,000 bushels; and of wool 15,000 pounds, and of butter 114,000 pounds.

Those who resided here in 1849, will recollect that owing to the immense emigration to California, and other reasons, thousands of acres of land, before improved, lay idle and uncultivated. According to the census of June last, our population has almost doubled the last five years, and there is no doubt twice as much land to the inhabitant, is cultivated the present year as there was in 1849; the value of stock has doubled, and its quantity more than doubled. We are therefore safe in making the following estimate for 1855:

Value of stock owned in the county	$672,000
Value of animals slaughtered	$170,000
Bushels of wheat raised	600,000
Bushels of Oats raised.....	500,000
Bushels of corn raised.....	550,000
Bushels of potatoes raised.....	50,000
Pounds of wool	60,000
Pounds of butter	300,000

And many important articles are left out of the computation. Who that is able to reason from cause to effect, will doubt that through the introduction of improved breeds of stock, better implements, and better varieties of the different kinds of farm products, and by means of the improved cultivation which will naturally follow from the competition here induced, that the yearly products of the farm in Green county, may be increased without additional outlay, at least 25 percent. But to be sure to keep within bounds, suppose the annual product, be increased in value only 10 percent. Take the article of wheat alone (which I suppose amounts in value to near half of the aggregate products of the county), and on that, if worth $1 per bushel, this small increase would amount to $60,000, a sum which distributed among the farmers of Green county, would afford, at least, a temporary relief from that most disagreeable of disorders—"hard times."

CHEESE STATISTICS FOR 1883.

The following table shows the number of cheese factories doing business in Green county in 1883, and the number of cows furnishing milk. It also indicates the number of pounds of milk consumed each day, and the pounds of cheese made:

Number of factories manufacturing Limburger cheese.....	48
Number of factories manufactur ing Swiss cheese.....	20
Number of factories manufacturing American cheese	7
Total number of factories.....	75
Number of cows furnishing milk to Limburger cheese factories.....	6,365
Number of cows furnishing milk to Swiss cheese factories	1,920
Number of cows furnishing milk to American cheese factories.....	2,380
Total number of cows furnishing milk	10,665
Number of pounds of milk used at Limburger cheese factories (daily)	190,650
Number of pounds of milk used at Swiss cheese factories(daily)	60,300
Number of pounds of milk used at American cheese factories (daily)	69,000
Total number of pounds of milk used (daily)	319,950
Number of pounds of Limburger cheese made (daily).....	21,183
Number or pounds of Swiss cheese made (daily)	7,667
Number of pounds of American cheese made (daily).....	6,700
Total number of pounds of cheese made (daily)	35,550

The value of cheese made each day in Green county, for 1883, at an average price of ten cents per pound, was $3,555.

GREEN COUNTY AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

Green county, since its earliest settlement, has been pre-eminently an agricultural county. This fact early led to the organization of an agricultural society. On the 4th day of July, 1853, a few persons interested in a society of this kind met in the village of Monroe. An organization was effected by electing E. T. Gardner president, J. V. Richardson Secretary, John A. Bingham corresponding secretary, and A. Ludlow treasurer. The first fair of the society was held in November of the same year at the court house in Monroe, at which time the munificent sum of $100 was disbursed for premiums. It is to be regretted that the original list of entries and awards is not now in existence, as it would furnish very interesting reading for the agriculturists of the present day.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

Some time during 1854 arrangements were made by which the society secured grounds of its own just north of the village, on lands owned by A. Ludlow. The grounds then contained about seven acres, for which they agreed to pay the sum of $400, as appears from the deed now in the hands of the secretary of the society. In order to meet the expenses of fencing and erecting buildings, life membership certificates were issued and sold at $10 apiece. The second annual exhibition was held on the new grounds in October, 1854, and the sum of $200 paid out as premiums. It is impossible to arrive at any accurate record of the doings of this society, owing to the fact that the early records of the society, together with the treasurer's book and life membership list, was destroyed in one of the disastrous fires which visited Monroe several years since.

At the session of the State legislature in 1856 an act for the encouragement of agriculture was passed, and pursuant to that act the society reorganized, July 7, 1857, by electing S. M. Humes, president; M. Kelly, Sr., vice-president; J. V. Richardson, recording secretary, J. A. Bingham corresponding secretary; N. Churchill, treasurer; and A. Ludlow, superintendent.

The constitution and by-laws of the society adopted at this reorganization shared the fate of the early records of the society, and departed this life in a puff of smoke. At the present writing (1884) there has been no constitution nor by-laws adopted, and the constitutional business of the society is transacted on the strength of the memory of the "oldest inhabitant" as to what the constitution "used to be." What will be done when the "inhabitant" is no more, remains to be seen. At a meeting of the society July 20, 1857, we find the following:

Resolved, That a vigilance committee, consisting of one person from each town, be appointed, whose duty it shall be to solicit people of their town to become members of the society. Which resolution was unanimously carried; also the following resolution, which will explain how the present society secured the title to the fair grounds of the old organization:

Resolved, That the secretary and president be and are hereby directed to issue certificates of life membership to each of the life members of the former society (there being seventy in number) in payment for the fair grounds which was purchased and fenced by the former society, said certificates to be issued on the title to said grounds being made to the present society.

The first fair under the new organization was held Sept. 24, 25 and 26, 1857, on the fair grounds. The treasurer having neglected to submit his annual report, we have no means of getting at the financial condition of the society for that year.

In 1858 we find several of the members delegated to prepare essays on various subjects, which essays were afterwards published in the Sentinel and Independent.

At a meeting held on the fair ground in September 1858, the executive committee were instructed to inquire into the expediency of removing the fair ground and to examine any proposal made to the society.

A great many of the early premiums of the society up to and including 1859 were paid in subscription to the "Wisconsin Farmer." At the annual meeting in 1860 we find the following motion to which was appended a parenthetical note of the section, which we copy in full. "On motion it was ordered that the fair ground be mowed and not pastured, the hay to be reserved for the use of the society." (Gone to grass, hey?) A committee was appointed at this meeting to consult with the people of Albany in relation to holding the next fair at that point, but little seems to have been accomplished, as we find the next fair of the society held at Monroe, Sept. 20 to 22, 1860. At this fair the number of entries was 620,

The next fair of the society was held in Monroe, Sept. 26 to 28, 1861, at which time there were 532 entries, and $293.66 paid in premiums, the receipts and expenditures balancing at $384.36.

In 1863 the fair was held Sept. 24 to 26, with a falling off of the entries, there being only 356, and $254.81 being awarded as premiums.

The fair of 1864, which was held Sept. 22 to 24, seems to have proved discouraging in the extreme. We quote at length from the records of Sept. 24, 1864

“The three days set apart for this annual fair were enough to discourage any set of men, except men of Green county. The first day was raw and chilly, and but very few entries made. The second day, which is usually the day of the fair, was decidedly a rainy day, and nothing was done. The third day opened uncomfortably cold, and remained so until noon, the afternoon being fair and pleasant. Had the two days preceding been as favorable as the last half day of the fair, we should probably have had a good exhibition notwithstanding the irrepressible chinch bug.”

The number of entries at this fair was 391, and the amount awarded for premiums $167.04. At the July meeting, 1865, Mr. Ludlow offered to exchange for the seven acres of the old ground, ten acres to be selected by the society from lands owned by him described as being east of and adjoining the residence of E. E. Carr. A committee was appointed to examine into this matter, who reported at an adjourned meeting July 15, 1865, in favor of the proposed exchange, and the report was adopted. About $360 was subscribed at this meeting for fitting up a fair ground. At a special meeting in August the committee reported $627.00 subscribed, and further reported a strong preference in favor of Ludlow's addition, on which to locate the new grounds. No fair was held in 1865.

April 14, 1866, the old fair grounds were sold to Christopher Martin at $105 per acre, and a committee consisting of O. J. White, O. H. P. Clarno, J. S. Smock, C. J. Simmons and Christopher Martin were appointed to secure grounds proper for a fair ground and race course for the society. April 28, 1866, this committee reported that they had made arrangements whereby they could secure eighteen acres of land suitable for the purposes of the society. The said land lying east of east of and adjoining Ludlow's addition to the village of Monroe. Twelve acres belonging to A. Ludlow could be purchased at $100 per acre, and six acres belonging to William Hodge at $125 per acre, Mr. Hodge to donate $50 of the purchase price to the society.

The committee were at once authorized to conclude the purchase of these lands, fence the same and erect suitable buildings thereon, and to defray the expenses of the work, were authorized to sell life membership, and collect and receive subscriptions and donations in behalf of the society. Several parties, residents of the county, took the matter of building the race course in hand and proceeded with the work, under the name of the Jocky Club. At the annual meeting in 1867 their treasurer reported that he had expended on said track $183.17, and that he had received back in various ways the sum of $51.35.

On motion, at this meeting, the society decided to pay the club the balance of $131.82 due them on condition that said club relinquish all claims on the track and place it under the control of the society. The fair of 1867 was held on Sept. 19 to 21; there were 539 entries for premiums, and the sum of $462.95 paid as premiums. This fair was very successful, the society being able to pay $400 on its debt for ground. The fair of 1868 was held Sept. 24 to 26, and was only moderately successful, owing to the rainy weather, which continued during the whole fair. There were only 470 entries and $198.75 paid for premiums.

Of the fair of 1869 we have no record further than the fact that there were 648 entries.

At the January meeting 1870, the society found itself in debt about $1,206.21.

The fair of 1870 was held Sept. 15 to 17. There were 544 entries at this fair and $472.50 disbursed as premiums, and $400 paid on the debt of the society. At the July meeting 1871 the following premiums, open to the world, were adopted by the society:

For the best looking baby, one year old or under—

First Premium,	Silver Caster	$8.00
Second	Silver Mug.....	5.00
Third	Silver Mug.....	3.00

We have no record as to who the awarding committee were, they must at least have been men of iron nerve, to have willingly faced the avalanche of disappointed mothers which of necessity must have overwhelmed them when their decision was announced. In all probability they are even now hiding in some far western mountain range, afraid to return to the scene of their early triumphs.

The fair of 1871 was held Sept. 21 to 23. There being 731 entries and $599.42 in premiums awarded.

The annual fair of 1872 was held Sept. 12 to 14, at which there were 517 entries and $702 awarded for premiums, of which the society were only able at this time to pay $526.50, owing to a lack of funds.

At the April meeting, 1873, it was decided to hold the fairs four days instead of three as formerly.

The fair of 1873 was held Sept. 17 to 20; there being 624 entries, and $904.50 awarded as premiums. At the July meeting, 1874, it was decided to offer a premium of $25 and $15 to the townships making the best exhibition of farm, stock and dairy products.

At the annual fair of 1874 held Sept. 23 to 26, there were 865 entries and $749 paid for premiums. At this time the society were still in debt $496.34.

At the quarterly meeting in April 1875, it was decided to erect an exposition hall, and a committee was appointed to procure plans and specifications, and report at the next meeting, which was done the report being accepted, and contract let.

The annual fair of 1875 was held Sept. 15 to 18, at which there were 1,164 entries, a marked increase over any previous year, showing that the people of the county were becoming aware of the benefits to be derived from an exhibition and comparison of the products and industries of the county. There was paid this year for premiums, $871.05; for buildings, $2,954.38, the total receipts being $4,640, and the total expenditures, $4,628.35.

In 1876 it was decided to build what is now known as mechanic's hall, at an expense of not exceeding $1,500.

The annual fair of 1876 was held Sept. 27 to 30, at which the sum of $1,136.25 was disbursed for premiums, and $1,045.38 for new buildings. Thus leaving the society probably the best equipped of any in the State as far as buildings were concerned.

The fair of 1877 was held Sept. 5 to 8, the amount of premiums awarded was $1,108, aside from $353 special premiums.

We append below a table of fairs from 1878 to 1882, giving the dates, number of entries as far as known, and the amount paid for premiums:

Year.	Date.	No. Entries	Amt.
1878	Sept. 4 to 7	1,239	$730.30
1879	Sept. 17 to 20	1,219	1,042.75
1880	Sept. 15 to 18	1,101	1,282.00
1881	Sept. 14 to 17	1,004	734.00
1882	Sept. 20 to 23	1,196	1,232.29
1883	Sept. 26 to 29	1,012	1,419.21

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

The officers of the society have generally been men not afraid to undertake the necessary work which would make the fairs a general success. They have spared neither pains nor expense in fitting up the grounds, advertising and procuring attractions. The reputation of our fair has steadily increased under this judicious management, and at the present writing (1884) we have a reputation second to no county fair in the State. The grounds are well supplied with comfortable buildings, the society out of debt, and the agricultural and stock raising residents of the county are awakening to a due regard of the benefits of the association, the exhibits are yearly increasing, the society are doing all in their power to make it to the interest of visitors and exhibitors to patronize our fair. RULES AND REGULATIONS.

[IN FORCE IN 1883.]

FIRST.—It shall be the duty of the executive committee to receive all exhibits on their arrival and direct them to their proper places on the grounds; to see that there is no lack of forage and water for stock; to see that none of the rules of the society are violated with impunity, and that the daily programme is faithfully and promptly filled by all parties concerned.

SECOND.—It shall be the duty of the president to attend to the reception of the society's guests, to organize and lead all processions, and to have a general supervision over each department of the Fair; preserving order, and assisting to insure justice and impart satisfaction to all visitors and competitors.

THIRD.—The track master shall superintend all exhibitions on the track, keeping a record of all entries made and contests won, and shall labor faithfully to carry out his part of the programme punctually and with strict impartiality. No entries can be received after 4 o'clock P. M. of Thursday, the second day of the Fair.

FOURTH.—Members of the awarding committees will report themselves to the superintendent of their department punctually at 9 o'clock on Friday morning, the third day of the Fair, when all vacancies will be filled by the superintendent, and committees will receive their lists, instructions and dinner tickets.

FIFTH.—No person can act as an awarding committee in any department in which he may be directly or indirectly interested in the result, as owner, agent or otherwise.

SIXTH.—Any person interfering with the awarding committee during the adjudication will be promptly excluded from the grounds, and shall forfeit any premium he or she might otherwise be entitled to in that division.

SEVEN.—No spirituous or fermented liquors will be allowed to be sold or given away on the grounds. No gambling or gaming device of any nature or kind whatsoever, lottery, gift enterprise or prize packages will be allowed on the grounds.

EIGHTH.—All persons are notified that the fair grounds are private property and any individual detected or known to have damaged locks, broken open buildings, removed boards from the enclosure, or in any other way trespassed upon or injured the property of the society will be prosecuted to the full extent of the law.

NINTH.—A dining hall under the management of experienced caterers will afford proper refreshments at the usual rates.

TENTH.—Tickets of admission must be procured at the treasurer's office, as no money will be received at the entrance gates. Any gate-keeper receiving money should be reported immediately to the president.

ELEVENTH.—Hay and straw will be provided on the grounds free of charge. Grain for stock can be purchased at market rates on the grounds.

TWELFTH.—Visitors are instructed to show their tickets each time of entrance without finding any fault. Gatekeepers are instructed to debar any one not suitably supplied with team, membership or single admission tickets.

THIRTEENTH.—The executive officers shall meet each day of the Fair at 1 o'clock P. M., at the secretary's office, for the transaction of business:

FOURTEENTH.—Individuals renting booths, keeping dining halls, or receiving revenue from any sale or exhibition on the fair grounds, must buy admission tickets, aside from their permits, for themselves and help.

FIFTEENTH.—All premiums not called for on or before Jan. 1, 1884, shall be refunded to the society.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION.

In all new countries the learned professions are very apt to be represented by men poorly qualified for their respective vocations. In speaking of the early physicians in Green county, Miss Bingham draws this pen-picture: "The principal physician based his practice on the belief that when blisters, calomel and the lancet will not save a man, nothing will save him, but that bleeding is then to be resorted to in order to make him die more easily; and he is said to have bled, blistered, and salivated his patients successively or simultaneously with an energy that made this a very easy place to die in. Physicians seem to have been distinguished by peculiarities in their dress, rather than by those in their practice. There was one who was always called the calico doctor, not that there was anything unusual at that time in the calico coat he wore, but the name was distinctive because his principal rival always wore buckskin clothes and a coonskin cap."

But it is safe to say that the medical profession in Green county as at present constituted (or as it has been for the last thirty years), ranks second to none in Wisconsin.

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION OF THE PAST.

The following, are the names of physicians who formerly practiced in Green county, but who are now dead, or have moved away, or retired from the profession:

HORATIO N. BRADSHAW

is a native of Canada. He came to Monticello about 1869 and engaged in the practice of medicine until the summer of 1870, when he came to Monroe. Here he practiced alone a short time, when he formed a partnership with Dr. Monroe, which lasted two years. He then went into a drug store in Monroe till the summer of 1880, when he moved to Kansas. He is now in California.

GEORGE W. LEE, a native of Virginia, was a thoroughly educated man—holding at one time a chair in a medical college in the east. He practiced in the east before removing west. He settled first at Whitewater one year, thence he removed to Shullsburg, in Lafayette county, in 1844, where he practiced and was at one time quite extensively engaged in mining. He was reputed one of the ablest physicians and surgeons in the western country, being widely known. He is remarkably social, genial and benevolent, and one would be benefited by a conversation with him. He was a whig and then a republican, and was nominated by the republicans for senatorial honors, but was not destined to occupy the high position. He was county superintendent of schools in Lafayette county. He has been a good public speaker and has often been called upon to deliver orations. He has “stumped” in Presidential campaigns. From Shullsburg he removed to Milwaukee, where he engaged in the practice of surgery; but, on account of ill health gave up the practice and removed to Darlington. From Darlington, he came to Green county, at Monroe, in 1878. He remained here during that year and a part of 1879, when he returned to Darlington where he now lives. He has been married twice. His second marriage with the widow Fuller resulted in a family of three intelligent and interesting daughters.

HENRY VAN WAGENEN

graduated at Cincinnati Eclectic Medical College about 1852. He came from Beloit here and followed his profession in this county for a number of years. He married Susan Mills, and they are the parents of five sons and one daughter. He is a man of more than ordinary ability and had worked up a large practice in the city. In about 1871 he removed to Darlington, Wis., where he still follows his profession.

was a native of Fayette Co., Penn., where he lived until he was eighteen years old. He was educated on a farm and early engaged as a teacher. He now went to Illinois and taught school six or eight years. He then returned and commenced the study of medicine in Juda with his brother, James L. He continued his studies there and at Rush Medical College where he graduated in 1872. He was married about this time to a lady in Illinois, who died there. He afterwards married a lady by the name of Vance, whose maiden name was West. After his first marriage he removed to Gratiot, Lafayette county, and practiced ten years. He afterwards practiced in Dayton six years. He died in August 1883, at the residence of his wife's father, in Brodhead, and his remains were interred in Juda cemetery. He was a man of considerable talent and was the making of a very successful physician.

JAMES L. TROUSDALE was a native of Lafayette Co., Ill., reared on a farm, educated at Fayette, Wis., studied medicine with William Monroe four years, graduating at Rush Medical College about 1865; commenced to practice with Dr. Monroe in Fayette one year and then removed to Juda and practiced from 1866 to 1872. Removing to Brodhead he practiced there two years, and there died. Deceased was a very pleasant man and of good business ability, very quiet and well liked, sometimes eccentric with his remarks; was a Christian, Mason and Odd Fellow; had a good practice, and was a successful physician. He was married in Fayette, Lafayette county, in December 1857, to Harriet E. Gray, a daughter of Mayor R. N. Gray, of Mineral Point, and niece of Dr. Monroe, where she lived at the time; the ceremony was performed at the residence of Dr. Monroe. His children were—Clara E, Minnie G., Metta J, and May. He was buried by the Masonic order.

was the first resident physician in New Glarus. He came from Switzerland and located there in 1848. He practiced there until 1852, when he went to California, returning to New Glarus in 1855. He continued there until 1868, having an extensive practice. He then moved to Monroe, where he remained a few months, going thence to Galena, and from that place to Sioux City, where he died in 1871.

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION OF TODAY.

The physicians now engaged in the practice of medicine and surgery in Green county, are as follows:

Monroe—William Monroe, N. A. Loofbourow, John C. Hall, H. D. Fuller, F. W. Confer, F. W. Byers, H. E. Boardman, Mrs. Hannah C. Bennett, Mrs. Norman Churchill, E. Bindschedler, L. B. Johnson and J. D. Soseman.

Juda—J. N. Clemmer and E. S. Fessenden.

New Glarus—John J. Blumer.

Jordan—Christian Tochtermann.

Exeter—W. C. Roberts and Mr. Ormsby.

Albany—G. W. Roberts and N. Ziegenfuss.

Brodhead—L. E. Towne, R. Broughton, E. G. Bennett, A. E. Bulson, E. Miller, Robert Willis and Frank R. Derrick.

Brooklyn—W F. Howe.

Browntown—J. H. Stealy.

York—A. L. Day.

Mount Pleasant—Dwight Flower.

WILLIAM MONROE, M. D.,

was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, July 30, 1818. His father, William Monroe, was a graduate in medicine, and his mother, a daughter of Daniel Thurston, was Harriet (Thurston) Monroe, who settled in Ohio about 1814, then a wild and unsettled territory, where William Monroe, Sr., practiced his profession until he died Oct. 10, 1818. Soon after the death of her husband, Mrs.

Monroe, mother of the subject of this sketch, went to Delaware county, where she remained for twelve years. In 1831 she was married to Dr. John Loofbourow, and removed to Iowa Co., Wis., there being but twenty-four log huts in Mineral Point at that time. She died in April, 1835. The doctor went with his mother to Mineral Point, where he was engaged in the mines. When twenty-one years old he commenced to read medicine in the office of Dr. O. E. Strong, remaining with him eighteen months, after reading in the office of Dr. Loofbourow. In 1840 he commenced to practice medicine under a license granted by the county medical society. In the winter of 1868—9 he attended lectures at Rush Medical College, where he graduated in 1869. The doctor is a member of the Southern Wisconsin Medical Society, and of the State Association; also, of the Green County Medical Society. In 1868 the doctor came to Monroe. In 1841 he was married to Mary J. Beebe, by whom there were ten children, of whom two sons and two daughters are now living. In 1867 he represented his district in the legislature. He was appointed examining surgeon for Lafayette county preparatory to the draft in 1862. In 1870 he was appointed examining surgeon for pensioners. He is a Sir Knight, and a member of the K. of P.; also, of the I O. O. F. He was formerly a whig, but now supports the republican ticket.

N. A. LOOFBOUROW, M. D., is a native of Iowa Co., Wis., born Oct. 9, 1849. His parents, John and Rebecca (Lamb)Loofbourow; emigrated to Wisconsin and settled at Mineral Point. Here the subject of this sketch grew to manhood, receiving his early education in a log cabin built by his father. He afterwards attended school at Fayette, Lafayette county, and at Platteville, Grant county. When twenty-one years old, he commenced reading medicine in the office of Dr. Monroe, of Monroe, and afterwards attended lectures at Rush Medical College, at Chicago, where he graduated, Feb. 19, 1873. In 1876 and 1877 he attended a course of lectures at Bellevue Hospital Medical College, in New York city, and in the spring of 1881 again attended a course at Rush Medical College, Chicago. In 1874 he was married to Alice Banta, a native of Green county. Dr. Loofbourow is a member of the I.O.O.F, K. of P. and A. O. U. W.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

J. C. HALL, M. D., a native of Langdon, Sullivan Co., N. H., was born May 21, 1821. When he was quite young his parents moved to Maine, where his early life was spent obtaining the foundation of his education in the common schools. He afterwards attended North Yarmouth Academy and Westbrook Seminary. He graduated in the medical department of Harvard University in 1852. The same year he came west and located at Albany, Green Co., Wis. He was commissioned as examining surgeon for Green county, Oct. 21, 1861, and assistant surgeon of the 6th Wisconsin Volunteers, and served nearly three years as surgeon in the field. He was elected a State senator for the two years, 1870 and 1871. Dr. Hall is a member of the American Medical Association, and of the State Medical Association; also is president of the Southwestern Wisconsin Medical Association.

H. D. FULLER, M. D., one of the prominent practicing physicians and surgeons of Monroe, is a native of Montgomery Co., N. Y., where he was born May 23, 1848. His parents, Jonas and Margaret (Snook) Fuller, were married in 1821, and have lived together as husband and wife for more than sixty-three years, and now occupy the old homestead where his father moved in 1787, when he was eight years of age. The subject of this sketch was reared upon a farm and received a common school education, afterwards graduating at Amsterdam Academy. He is also a graduate of Union College. In 1860 he commenced reading medicine with Dr. D. Belding, afterwards with William H. Robb. In 1872 he went to Albany, N. Y., and prosecuted his studies under Dr. J. S. Mosher. In 1878 he graduated at Albany Medical College. In the fall of 1879 he settled at Sharon, Walworth Co., Wis., where he remained three years. In the fall of 1882 he came to Monroe, where he has followed the practice of his chosen profession since. The doctor is a member of the Albany Alumni and Southern Wisconsin Association. He was married Dec. 21, 1881, to Josephine Dodge, by whom he has had one child—Maynard H. He is a man who takes an active interest in the temperance cause, and was a candidate on that ticket for school commissioner.

F. CONFER, M. D.,

was born in the town of Washington, Green Co., Wis., on the 18th day of December, 1854; was reared on a farm and received a common school education. When seventeen years old he commenced teaching. At the age of twenty he came to Monroe and entered the high school, graduating in 1878. In 1879 he entered the office of Dr. J. C. Hall and prosecuted his studies in medicine for three years. He graduated at Rush Medical College in February, 1882. He commenced practice at Dayton, Green county. One year later he came to Monroe, following the practice of his profession. He here formed a partnership with Dr. N. A. Loofbourow. In February, 1882, he was married to Carrie Isley, by whom he has one child—Francis M. The doctor is a member of the A. O. U. W.

FRED W. BYERS, M. D., one of the prominent physicians of the city, was born in Shippensville, Clarion Co., Penn., Feb. 10, 1837, where his younger days were spent. The foundation of his education was laid in the common schools and he afterwards received an academic education at Cooperstown. In 1857, he came west to Stephenson Co., Ill., and Green Co., Wis., where he was employed as teacher in the public schools. He then went to Springfield, Ohio, and attended Wittenberg College, passing into the sophomore class. In the spring of 1860, he went to Missouri as traveling salesman. About this time the War of the Rebellion broke out, and the feeling was so strong against northern men, in that section, that he thought it advisable to leave. Accordingly he went to Orangeville, Ill., where he resumed the study of medicine (which he had previously commenced,) in the office of Dr. W. P. Naramore. In 1861 and 1862, he attended lectures at Rush Medical College. The following August, he was employed in the hospitals at Camp Douglas, Ill., and in the mean time attended lectures, and graduated in January 1863. Soon after he was commissioned assistant surgeon of the 96th regiment of Illinois Volunteers—joining the regiment at Franklin, Tenn. He participated in Rosecrans campaign, of 1863, remaining with that command until the army reached Chattanooga. He was then assigned to duty at Nashville, Tenn. In May 1864, he reported to his regiment, remaining with it through part of the Atlanta campaign and participating in the battles of Rocky Face Ridge, Resaca, Dallas, Kenesaw Mountain, Marietta, and Peach Tree Creek, where he was made chief surgeon of the artillery brigade, of the 4th army corps, served as staff officer during the siege of Atlanta, and the engagements at Jonesboro and Lovejoy station. He was present at the battles of Franklin and Nashville, and took part in the campaign to Huntsville and into east Tennessee. He returned to Nashville, and thence to Chicago where he was mustered out of the service at Camp Douglas, July 8, 1865. He never had a furlough nor slept on a bed, from the time of entering the service until he reached Chicago. After the war, he located at Lena, Stephenson Co., Ill., where he followed the practice of medicine, twelve years, when he removed to Monroe. He was married in July, 1865, to Olive DeHaven. They are the parents of six children—Morna, Winnie, Harry S., Joe Rodney, Grace and Ben Bayard. Dr. Byers is a member of the Southern Wisconsin Medical Association, of which he is secretary; also a member of the Stephenson County Association. Since graduating he has attended medical lectures in the Nashville University of Tennessee, and Missouri Medical College of St. Louis. He is a surgeon in the Wisconsin National Guard and United States examining surgeon for this district. He is the oldest active Knight Templar in Green county, and a companion of the first class in the military order of the Loyal Legion of the United States.

HORACE E. BOARDMAN, A. M., M. D., was born in Rutland, Vt., on the 18th day of May, 1835. His parents were Elijah and Mary (Foot) Boardman, who were the parents of four sons and two daughters. Dr. Boardman was brought up on a farm, receiving the foundation of his education in the common schools. Subsequently, he attended the seminary at Castleton, Vt., and Burr Seminary at Manchester, Vt., and graduated at Middlebury College in 1857. He was associate principal of Chester Academy till 1858, when he was elected professor of mathematics and English literature in Missouri College, where he labored for one year and a half. In consequence of the agitation concerning slavery, that part of the country became uncongenial to him, and, in the latter part of 1859, he returned to New England. He subsequently studied both theology and medicine, and, having attended the lectures of 1865, 1866 and 1867 in Hahnemann Medical College, Chicago, he graduated there in the spring of 1867. He then practiced his profession in Menasha, Wis., for two years, and afterwards in Sun Prairie, Dane county, for nine and one-half years. In the summer of 1878, he came to Monroe, Green county, where he now resides, engaged in the practice of his profession. The doctor is a member and an officer of the Wisconsin Homœopathic Medical Society, and a member of the American Institute of Homœopathy. He has contributed many articles to the medical journals. He was married in February 1863, in New Hampshire, to Susan C. Locke. They have now two children living—Dr. Edgar W., now the house-surgeon in Hahnemann Hospital, Chicago, and Horace P., who is fifteen years of age. Dr. and Mrs. Boardman are members of the M. E. Church.

MRS. H C. BENNETT, M. D.,

of the regular school, was born in Kent, England, in 1842. In 1850, her parents, John and Hussah (Rolfe) Russell, came to America and located at Sussex, Waukesha Co., Wis., where they resided until 1883. The subject of this sketch was educated in the common schools and afterwards attended Carroll College, Waukesha county, graduating in 1862. In 1870 she commenced reading medicine with her brother, Dr. Richard Russell, of Freeport Co., Minn. In the fall of the same year she attended lectures at Chicago Medical College where she graduated in 1875, after which she remained one year in the Woman's Hospital. She then returned to Sussex, her home, and practiced her profession until 1881, when she came to Monroe, and has here been engaged in practicing since. She has been very successful and has gained a reputation as physician, of which she may feel justly proud. She was married in March 1882, to Felix C. Bennett, a native of Ohio, who located in the county a number of years ago.

L. B. JOHNSON, M. D., was born in Steuben Co., N. Y., Nov. 23, 1822. He is a son of James T. and Lucretia (Ball) Johnson, who were among the early settlers in Steuben county. James T. Johnson was a soldier in the War of 1812 and was stationed at Niagara Falls. L. B. Johnson, of this sketch, was reared upon a farm and received a liberal education. At the age of eighteen years he commenced the study of medicine, and graduated at Geneva Medical College in 1844. Soon after he went to Allegany county and engaged in the practice of his profession. In 1844 he was married to Catharine Hubbard, in Steuben Co., N. Y. Two children were born to them, both of whom died in infancy. Dr. Johnson was, in 1855, elected to the legislature of the State of New York, from Allegany county. In 1857 he came to Monroe where he has since resided. He is a man of more than ordinary ability and much respected in the community where he resides.

DR. JOHN D. SOSEMAN,

dental surgeon, was born near Akron, Summit Co., Ohio, April 14, 1845. He is a son of Thomas Soseman, who settled in Ohio in 1835. He, (Thomas Soseman,) in early life, was engaged in milling and afterwards in farming. In 1864 he removed to St. Joseph Co., Ind., where he still resides. Dr. Soseman, of this sketch, was reared upon a farm and educated in the common schools. He commenced the study of his profession in 1871, in the office of Dr. Hall, remaining under his instruction two years. He was married in 1871, to Susan Swenk, widow of Lewis Swenk. In 1874 he went to St. Joseph Co., Ind., and in April 1883 came to Monroe, where he is receiving liberal patronage, and although a new comer, has already established a reputation for being a skilled and reliable dentist. He is a member of the I. O. O. F., of South Bend, Ind. Mr. and Mrs. Soseman have one child.

DR. J. N. CLEMMER

attended the Eclectic College at Cincinnati, having entered that institution in 1852, and holds a certificate from the same. He commenced the practice of his profession at Argyle, Lafayette Co., Wis., where he remained three years, then went to Winneshiek Co., Iowa, and two years later came to Green county, and settled in the village of Juda, where he has since remained, engaged in practicing medicine in the village and surrounding country. He was absent from Green county two and a half years, during the War of the Rebellion, having enlisted, March 9, 1863, and served until July, 26, 1865. He was mustered into the service at Madison, and at that time, promoted to regimental commissary. He was in fourteen battles, serving in the second corps, second division, 1st Brigade, army of the Potomac, Gen. Hancock commander of corps, and was mustered out at Jeffersonville, Ind. Dr. Clemmer was born in Fayette Co., Penn., Aug. 22, 1826, His father was a farmer and he was reared to agricultural pursuits, remaining on the farm until twenty years old. He was married Oct. 21, 1847, to Elizabeth A. Zerley, also a native of Fayette Co., Penn. They have nine children living—Lydia L., Mary L., Isabel C., William J., George G., D. Annetta, Anna D., Joseph N. and Elizabeth A. Lydia J. and William J., reside in Butler county, and Mary L. in Monona county. Dr. Clemmer is a member of the Masonic order. He is a man highly respected and esteemed throughout the community, and has an extensive and remunerative practice.

DR. J JACOB BLUMER, son of Dr. Samuel Blumer, was born in Canton Glarus, Switzerland, Sept. 10, 1843, his mother died in 1845, and his father came to the United States in 1848. Jacob remained in Switzerland until 1861, receiving a good preparatory medical education at Bern and Neuchatel. After coming to this State, he enlisted in the 3d Wisconsin Cavalry regiment, and served three years. After the war he went to Pennsylvania and completed his medical studies at the University of Pennsylvania at Philadelphia, spending about two and a half years there. He landed in New Glarus in 1869, since which he has been the resident physician of this place. He was married Feb. 28, 1870, to Margaretha Legler.

DR. CHRISTOPHER TOCHTERMAN was born in Canton Bern, Switzerland, Oct. 30, 1826. He is a son of Christopher and Margaret (Gally) Tochterman. His parents are both buried in Canton Bern. Christopher was educated at the University of Bern. He attended four courses of medical lectures, and was admitted to practice in the Old Country. In 1852 he came to America and settled in this county, in Monroe, where he practiced medicine a little, and learned the trade of wagon making. He worked at the trade for several years, then started in for himself in Oneco, Ill., where he remained a few years, then purchased eighty acres of land near Shueyville. In the fall of 1862 he enlisted in company G, 22d Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, being mustered in at Racine, Wis. He was commissioned assistant surgeon of 38th regiment, Wisconsin Volunteers, serving until 1865, the close of the war, when he returned home. He has 135 acres on section 36 in this town, and has made it a comfortable home. In May, 1852, he was married to Magdaline Greenwald, of Bern, Switzerland. They have had six children, three of whom are living—Mary M., married to Rev. H. A. Palmer, of East Delaware, Wis.; Carrie, who is employed in the watch factory at Elgin, Ill.; and Godfrey S., who is traveling in California. G. S. Tochterman has traveled extensively throughout the States and Territories. Mr. Tochterman is a republican, politically, and the family are members of the German Evangelical Church.

GEORGE W. ROBERTS, M. D.,

was born in Benington, Licking Co., Ohio, April 10, 1841, and was but three years old when his parents emigrated to the Territory of Wisconsin and settled in Rock county, where his father purchased land and improved a farm. Through the influence and teaching of a kind mother, who was possessed of a good education, he obtained a fair knowledge of the common branches of the English language, which was advanced by four terms at Milton College, Rock county. He commenced the study of medicine in the spring of 1854, receiving instruction from Drs. Barrows and Treat, of Janesville. In the fall of 1865 he went to Chicago and attended lectures at the Chicago Medical College and chemical instruction at the Mercy hospital for six months. Returning home in the spring of 1866 he commenced practice in town of Cook, Rock county. In the fall of 1867 he came to Albany and formed a co-partnership with Dr. Winston of that place. The following fall he again went to Chicago and attended lectures at Rush Medical College, where he graduated and received his diploma. He then returned to Albany, where he has since remained, engaged in the practice of his profession.

As a physician he is popular and successful. He deservedly possesses the reputation of a skilled practitioner and an extensive and remunerative practice. His genial manners and gentlemanly behavior has won for him hosts of friends. He was married in 1857 to Betsey C. Oleson. They have four children—Walter C., William D., Fred H. and Eugene Warren. Walter C. is a graduate of Rush Medical College and is practicing at Dayton, Green Co., Wis.

WALTER C. ROBERTS, M. D.,

resident physician of Dayton, was born in Fulton, Rock county, Dec. 18, 1858. He is a son of Dr. G. W. Roberts, of Albany. Walter early decided to enter the medical profession, and with that view studied with his father. He finished his preparatory medical studies at Rush College in Chicago. Dr. Roberts is a constant student and intends to keep pace with the advances in medical science. His literary education was obtained in high schools and at Milton College. He practiced in Monroe county, and in Elroy and Monewoc previous to coming to Dayton in 1883. He is gaining the confidence of the community and his practice is steadily increasing.

WILLIAM ELLWOOD ZIEGENFUSS, M. D.

of Albany, Wis., was born in Pleasant Valley, Monroe Co., Penn., Aug. 8, 1854. He is of German descent. He is the youngest of seven children of a good family, well to do, long lived, intelligent and religious. His great-great-grandfather, Andrew Ziegenfuss, and wife, left Strasbourg, France, for America in 1740. They settled near Philadelphia, Penn., from whence the family has scattered through that State, New Jersey and Virginia. The parents of the subject of this sketch, George and Catharine Ziegenfuss, are still living in Pennsylvania, aged respectively, seventy-eight and sixty-six years. His father is a retired miller. The educational advantages in the doctor's time and home were limited. All his education, so far as received from schools, was obtained in Monroe county, at the district school, four months a year, under teachers of but limited qualifications. At the age of seventeen, having privately studied of late, he began teaching school at $30 per month. He taught and attended the normal schools alternately for the next five years, thus taking an elective course of study, embracing a very liberal English education. Having a natural inclination towards scientific studies, he entered the office of Dr. M. G. Lesh, and began the study of medicine. In the autumn of 1876 he entered the department of medicine and surgery of the University of Michigan, and graduated in the first advanced course of studies in June, 1878. After graduating he spent a year in the east studying, traveling and corresponding for various papers, which, in addition to contributing to various medical journals, he still keeps up. In 1879 Dr. Ziegenfuss came to Dexter and began the practice of his profession. He is eminently successful as a physician. On Dec. 23, 1879, he was married to Hattie Loraine Sill, of Dexter, born at Port Huron, Mich., Oct. 19, 1857. Mrs. Ziegenfuss is of English-French descent. Her grand parents on both sides were early residents here. Her parents, George S. and Sarah P. Sill, live in Dexter, Mich. She is the oldest of three children, having a sister and a brother younger than she. Dr. Ziegenfuss is a man of extensive reading, both in his profession and in the collateral sciences, possessing native talent for metaphysics and the natural sciences. He is the author of various medical articles, and is a fine writer.

located at Brodhead in 1862. Dr. Towne is one of the well known physicians of this part of the State of Wisconsin, having for many years had an extensive practice in this and adjoining counties. He was born in Windham Co., Vt., on June 18, 1826, where he was reared. His father, Thomas Towne, was a native of Massachusetts. The doctor began reading medicine at the age of seventeen, with a maternal uncle, Dr. L. A. Smith. He continued with his uncle two or three years, having the use of his medical works. In 1848, in company with two other young men, he started for the west. He came to Rock county in this State that season, and engaged in teaching. In 1850, he resumed the study of medicine, and began practice with Dr. Samuel Harroud of the town of Newark, Rock county. He continued in practice some years previous to graduating, taking his degree at Rush Medical College in 1867. In the early years of his practice, the country was new and sparsely settled, and physicians were scarce, and his ride extended over a great area of territory, and he became widely known as a skillful and careful physician. Dr. Towne removed to Clarence in 1851, coming to Brodhead, as stated, in 1862. He has now, to a great extent, retired from practice, attending to professional calls only in the village. He was the second physician in the village of Clarence; Dr. P. B. Springsted being the first. He is now interested in the drug business, his son being associated with him. He has a beautiful and pleasant home in the village, and a fine farm of 160 acres near town, also owns thirty acres adjoining the village plat. Dr. Towne has been twice married. His first wife was Fannie Kendal, who died in February 1850. He was again married in the winter of 1850 to Caroline W. Harroud, daughter of Dr. Harroud, who died at Darlington about 1858. The doctor has one son by his second wife, Lucius A., who is associated with his father in the drug business. He was born at Clarence in 1861. He lost a son, W. H. S., in 1873, in his nineteenth year, also a daughter at Clarence, in 1859, at the age of seven years.

RUSSELL BROUGHTON, M. D., is a son of John Broughton, of the town of Albany. He was born May 16, 1842, during the same year his parents came to Green county, and but a few weeks previous to that event. He received his early education in the public schools of his town, He afterwards entered Milton College, in Rock county, intending to take a full course of study, but was diverted from his purpose by joining the army in 1863. After the close of the war he pursued a commercial course of study at Bryant & Stratton's Commercial College, Milwaukee, and having decided to enter the medical profession, pursued a course of study at Rush Medical College, in Chicago, where he graduated in February 1869. His taste for this profession developed at an early age, and he was greatly encouraged in fitting himself for it by Dr. H. F. Persons, of Albany, in whom he found a true friend. Since he began practice in 1869 he has had a steadily increasing business, and is widely known as a skillful surgeon and a careful physician. His entire career has been marked by industry and frugality. He began without means, and even while receiving his education paid the most of his expenses by hard work. At the age of twenty-one he had never been inside of a saloon, never used tobacco, and had never spent a half day in town. In these habits of morality formed in early life, we find the secret of Dr. Broughton's success. He has accumulated an ample fortune, and lives in the enjoyment of all the comforts of a happy home. He has never held public office, except that of superintendent of the public schools of Brodhead from 1872 to 1875; as he has no aspirations for official position. Dr. Broughton was married Feb. 1, 1869, to Miss J. A. Smiley, daughter of David Smiley, of Albany, this county.

E. G. BENNETT, M. D., located at Brodhead, May 1, 1878. He was born in Saratoga Co., N. Y., in 1849. His father, John G. Bennett, removed with his family to Rock Co., Wis., in 1853. Dr. Bennett was reared in Rock county, and received his literary education at Milton College, preparing himself for teaching and also laid the foundation of his medical education. He followed the occupation of teaching four years, at the same time pursuing his medical studies. He began the study of medicine in 1878, and graduated at Rush Medical College in 1878, taking three terms at that institution, locating here soon after. Dr. Bennett possesses excellent literary attainments and is skilled in all branches of his profession. He has a large and growing practice. His wife was Ruby E. House, whose father settled in Rock county in 1864.

A. E. BULSON, M. D.,

was born in Rochester, N. Y., Aug. 19, 1847. His father died when he was a child, and when nine years of age he removed with his stepfather to Westville, Ind. He entered the army in 1861, when only fourteen years of age. He enlisted in company I, 20th Indiana Volunteer Infantry. After two years he was promoted to the position of first principal musician of his regiment, which he held to the close of the war, re-enlisting in 1864. He witnessed many of the most exciting and important events of the great Rebellion, among which was the destruction of the frigates Congress and Cumberland, by the rebel ram Merrimac, and the fight between the Monitor and Merrimac on the succeeding day. He accompanied his regiment throughout McClelland's campaign on the peninsula; was present at the battles of Fredericksburg, second battle of Bull Run, Gettysburg, battle of the Wilderness and at the surrender of Gen. Lee. At the close of the war he attended school at Westville, where he also began the study of medicine. He graduated at Chicago Medical College in 1868. After graduation he practiced five years at Gobleville, Mich. Desiring still better opportunities to extend his knowledge of the science of medicine and surgery, he went to New York city, where he entered the Bellevue Hospital Medical College, and from which he graduated in 1874. Returning to Gobleville he resumed his practice, remaining there until 1879, when he came to Brodhead. Dr. Bulson is thoroughly educated in his profession, and his large and increasing practice attests the confidence that is placed in his professional skill. He was united in marriage with Sarah M. Abbott, born in Laporte, Ind. To them was born one child—Albert Eugene. In 1866 his wife died, and on Dec. 11, 1868, he was united in marriage with Florence I. Breck, born in Van Buren Co., Mich. This union has been blessed with two children—Florence A. and Glenn Allen. Dr. Bulson is a member of the Presbyterian Church of Brodhead, and an earnest worker of temperance reform.

DR. ROBERT WILLIS

is the homeopathic physician of Brodhead. He was born in Iowa Co., Wis., in 1859. He was educated at Platteville State Normal School, and entered Hahnemann Medical College, Chicago, in 1881; graduated in the class of 1883, and soon after came to Brodhead.

DR. FRANK B. DERRICK

is the dentist of Brodhead in 1884. He succeeded Dr. Joseph S. Reynolds, in 1876, with whom he was a student for two years. He is a skillful dentist, and has a large and growing practice. Dr. Derrick is a representative of one of the early families of Green county. He is a son of Frank H. Derrick, of Brodhead, and was born in the town of Spring Grove in May, 1850. He was married to Arabella N. Moore, a native of Vermont, and a daughter of William H. Moore.

W. F. HOWE, M. D., is a son of Rev. D. R. and Mary A. Howe. He was born in Princeton, Ill., March 8, 1857. He commenced the study of medicine in 1876, with Dr. William Monroe as preceptor, and graduated at the Rush Medical College in 1880. March 15, 1880, he located at Brooklyn, where he has since practiced.

JEREMIAH H STEALY, M. D., was born in Milton township, Ashland Co., Ohio, in 1858. He received his literary education in his native county. In April, 1875, he removed to Monroe, and in 1877 engaged in teaching. He began the study of medicine with Dr. William S. Caldwell, of Freeport, Ill. In 1879 he entered the medical department of the University at Ann Arbor, Mich., remaining there one year, when he returned to Freeport and continued his studies. In 1881 he entered Jefferson Medical College at Philadelphia, graduating therefrom in 1882. Dr. Stealy, although a young man, is possessed of excellent attainments, and is thoroughly educated in the modern school of medicine. His ability and success is well attested by his large and increasing practice. On the 31st of May, 1883, he was united in marriage with Emma, a daughter of John and Catherine Sullivan.

DR. A. L. DAY

was born in the town of York, Green Co., Wis., July 28, 1845. He received a liberal education in the Monroe Seminary, Albion Academy and the Algona College. In the last named institution he occupied the chairs of anatomy, physiology and hygiene for some time. In March, 1863, he enlisted in the 37th regiment, Wisconsin Volunteers, serving as non-commissioned officer till the close of the war. In the summer of 1866 he began the study of medicine under a preceptor, and in the fall and winter of 1866 and 1867 was a student in the Eclectic Medical College in Cincinnati, Ohio. In the spring of 1867 he began the practice of medicine at Postville, Wis. In the spring of 1868 he married Emma N. Fellows, of that place. She was born in the city of Kenosha, Wis., March 7, 1850. When she was about two years of age her parents removed to Monroe, where they remained until the fall of 1863, when they removed to Postville, where she resided until her marriage. She received her education in the schools of Monroe and Postville, and removed with her husband to Palo Alto Co., Iowa, where, during the year 1870, she taught school. Dr. Day, having located in Iowa, continued the practice of his profession there for about five years; during which time he was elected county superintendent of public schools for two years, the duties of which office he performed in connection with those of his profession. In the fall of 1875 he returned to Postville, where he has since been the resident physician, although in the year 1879 he attended the Bennett Medical College, where he graduated. Again, in the spring of 1883, leaving his practice in charge of his student, Dr. E. L. Clark, who had graduated the previous winter in Chicago, he attended the practitioner's course in the Rush Medical College, also a course in the Eye and Ear Infirmary. In 1882 he was appointed on the board of censors by the State Eclectic Medical Association, which position he now holds. He has gained considerable celebrity in the profession, having not only acquired the reputation of being a very skillful practitioner, but has also performed a number of important surgical operations, among which was the amputation of the leg, at the thigh, of John Paulson, of Adams, who is now (1884) in the employ of Samuel Mack, of Monroe, as machine agent. He has also performed a number of operations on the eye that, it is believed have never been performed by a resident physician in the county. He is a correspondent to the Chicago Medical Times. Mr. and Mrs. Day have four children May R., born in Palo Alto Co., Iowa, Jan. 1, 1871; Maude L., born in Palo Alto Co., Iowa, Oct. 18, 1872; Edward C., born in Palo Alto Co., Iowa, June 30, 1874; and Myrtle G., born in Postville, Wis., Dec. 14, 1876.

ROWLEY MORRIS, M. D., was born at Warsaw, Wyoming Co., N. Y., Dec. 30, 1811. He began studying for the medical profession in 1840, with Dr. Peter Cane of Warsaw, and graduated at the Albany Medical College, in his native State in 1844. He came to Green county in 1848. By close application to his profession he soon established a worthy reputation, and enjoyed a wide reputation as a skillful and successful physician. He was married in 1844, to Harriet J. Foster, who died in 1857. In 1857 he was married the second time, to Ann Mitchell; and by her has two children.

DWIGHT FLOWER, M. D.

the practice of his profession in Buchanan Co., Iowa, where he remained a short time. He then came to Wisconsin and settled at Arena, Iowa county. Two years later he came to Monticello where he has since resided. He was married Oct. 23, 1879, to Kate L. Roser, a native of St. Louis. They have one child,—Dwight. Dr. Flower is a gentleman of superior ability, and as a physician, is popular and successful. He has won the confidence and esteem of his fellow citizens and has an extensive practice.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE COUNTY BOARD—PAST AND PRESENT.

There is much in the early government of Green county to demand attention and awaken an interest in the mind of the reader. Nor is that interest lessened to any great extent as we examine the proceedings of the "county legislature" down even to the present day. Only the most important of the measures adopted by the board, from the organization of the county to this date (1884), can be given in this chapter. But first we will mention the various changes that the board itself has undergone since its first creation and the names of all those who have acted as its members to the present day.

COUNTY COMMISSIONERS.

From the organization of the county, in 1838, down to the date of the admission of Wisconsin into the Union as a sovereign State, in 1848, a period of ten years, Green, as well as other counties of Wisconsin Territory, was governed by a county board, formed of three commissioners. When in session, they held what was denominated a commissioners' court. The first term is given in their proceedings as "commissioners' court, March term, 1838," and so on.

The following are the names of the commissioners and the dates of their election:

NAMES.	When elected	NAMES	When elected

At the general election in September, 1841, the question as to whether the county would adopt the town government system was voted upon by the electors of the county and voted down by the following decisive majority: For town government twelve votes, against town government forty-eight votes.

COUNTY SUPERVISORS.

From 1849 to 1861, inclusive, the chairman of each town board of supervisors in the county was ex officio a member of the county board; so that the number corresponded exactly with the number of towns in the county (if there were no vacancies and if all the members were present), at the meetings of the board.

The county supervisors present at the meetings of the board while it had an existence, with the towns and villages represented by them, were as follows:

COUNTY SUPERVISION CHANGED.

A State law approved March, 1861, made the board of supervisors to consist of three electors, one to be elected in each of three supervisor districts. Elections were to be held in November of each alternate year, and the term of office was to begin the first of the following January.

Elected in 1861—Ezra Wescott, E. R. Allen and Henry Adams.

These supervisors divided the county into three supervisor districts, as follows:

First district—New Glarus, York, Exeter, Brooklyn, Washington, Mount Pleasant.

Second district—Jefferson, Spring Grove, Decatur, Sylvester, Albany.

Third district—Adams, Jordan, Cadiz, Clarno, Monroe.

ELECTED IN 1863.

First district—Henry Adams.

Second district—E. R. Allen (resigned, Hiram Dunwiddie appointed by the governor).

Third district—Ezra Wescott (died, J. V. Richardson appointed by the governor).

ELECTED IN 1865.

First district—Albert Pierce.

Second district—Hiram Dunwiddie.

Third district—J. V. Richardson (resigned, William Brown appointed).

ELECTED IN 1867.

First district—J. W. Smith.

Second district—William Coldren.

Third district—J. M. Staver.

By a change in the law, supervisors elected in 1867 from the odd numbered districts held office for one year, while those from even numbered districts held office two years.

ELECTED IN 1868.

First district—J. W. Smith.

Third district—J. M. Staver.

THE BOARD INCREASED.

The number of county supervisors in Green county was, by the following act, increased from three to nine:

An act to increase the number of county supervisors in the county of Green, and to provide for their election.

The people of the State of Wisconsin, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. At the first annual town meeting after the passage of this act, to-wit, 1869, the electors of the supervisors representing the even numbered districts in said county shall elect two additional supervisors, whose term of office shall expire at the same time, and who shall be elected in the same manner as the supervisor for such district is now elected, and the electors of the supervisors representing the odd numbered districts in said county, shall elect two additional supervisors in each district, whose term of office shall expire at the same time and who shall be elected in the same manner as the supervisors for said districts are now elected, and at each succeeding general election thereafter for the election of county supervisors, three supervisors shall be elected for the term of two years in each supervisor district.

SECTION 2. The supervisors elected at the aforesaid town meeting shall meet with the county board of supervisors in the county of Green, at their first meeting after their election, and qualify by taking the oath of office as now provided by law in relation to county boards of supervisors, and shall thereby become members thereof, with all the powers and duties now conferred upon such county boards of supervisors.

SECTION 3. All acts or parts of acts contravening the provisions of this, so far as the same may relate to the county of Green, are hereby repealed.

SECTION 4. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved March 3, 1869.

Under this law, there were elected in April, 1869:

First district—F. R. Melvin and Leopold Seltzer.

Second district—David Dunwiddie and J. B. Perry.

Third district—Samuel Chandler (resigned, S. W. Abbott, appointed) and A. DeHaven.

Those elected in the second district held office only until November, when three supervisors were elected: J. B. Perry, R. J. Day and M.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

H. Pengra. But the law under which these men were elected was repealed by the following act:

An Act to repeal chapter sixty-two of the general laws of 1869, entitled: "An Act to increase the number of county supervisors in the county of Green, and to provide for their election."

The people of the State of Wisconsin, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1. Chapter sixty-two of the general laws of 1869, entitled, "An Act to increase the number of county supervisors in the county of Green, and to provide for their election," is hereby repealed.

SECTION 2. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved March 15, 1870.

After the spring election of 1870, the county returned to the system of government wherein each town in the county, the city of Monroe, and the incorporated villages of Brodhead and Albany are represented by the chairman of the local board of supervisors—the city of Monroe sending two members to the county board; one from the first ward and one from the second ward. This was under the general law passed in 1868.

The members present at the meetings of the county board in 1870, and since, with the towns, wards of the city and incorporated villages represented by them, were as follows:

November 19, 1850.

On motion the petition from the inhabitants of the towns of Albany and Brooklyn, was taken up and referred to the same committee.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

The chair appointed H. Rust, William Coldren and James Hare, said committee.

November 20, 1850.

The committee on petitions made the following report, which was accepted and on motion amended by striking out the words fifty dollars.

The committee to whom petitions were referred, respectfully report, that we have the petitions from the gentlemen from Brooklyn and Jordan under consideration and would recommend that the north half of section 6, in town 3 north, of range 9 east, be taken off from the town of Albany and attached to the town of Brooklyn, in said county, also that an appropriation of fifty dollars be made by this board to the town of Jordan to aid in repairing road and bridges in said town, all of which is respectfully submitted.

H. RUST
Chairman.

November 11, 1851.

On motion, the petitions asking for that portion of the town of Brooklyn which was attached to said town from the town of Albany, to be set back to said town of Albany, was taken up, and a motion to grant the prayer of said petitioners was lost.

November 13, 1855.

By consent of the board Mr. Smith, of Clarno, presented the following petition and resolution:

WHEREAS, The Hon. Mr. West, late senator from the county of Green, did introduce into the Senate of the State of Wisconsin, in January, 1855, a bill asking for an alteration of the boundary line between the towns of Monroe and Clarno, and the said bill was introduced without the knowledge or consent of the inhabitants of said town of Clarno, the electors of Clarno did thereupon remonstrate by petition (signed 210), also from Monroe (signed 80), the Hon. Mr. West did thereupon withdraw from the said Senate bill and still affirms that he did withdraw and oppose said bill and that it was not again introduced until the Hon. Mr. West finally left and returned home, that after the return of Senator West some evil disposed person or persons did alter the title of said bill did then and there on the last day of the session by false pretenses procure a law taking from the said town of Clarno lots Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4, on sections 2 and 3, and attached the same to said town of Monroe, against the statute in such cases made and provided.

Petition:— We, the undersigned, inhabitants of the town of Clarno, petition your honorable body, the board of supervisors of the county of Green, to establish boundary line between the towns of Monroe and Clarno to its original United States government survey, and your petitioners as in duty bound ever pray.

Signed by 124 petitioners.

Dated, Clarno, Nov. 6, 1855.

On motion of Mr. Smith, of Adams, L. Hurlbut, Israel Smith and Samuel Johnson were appointed by the chair a committee to report upon the petition and resolution.

On motion of Mr. Newton, voted to add two other members to that committee, chair appointed as additional members W. C. Green and William Munson.

November 30, 1855.

By leave of board, Mr. Smith, of Clarno, withdrew his petition, asking that the boundary line between Monroe and Clarno be restored to its original United States government survey.

December 27, 1855.

REPORT OF INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE:

To the board of supervisors of the county of Green: Your committee appointed to investigate the frauds practiced on the county commenced their investigation on Monday, Dec. 10, A. D. 1855. Calling to their assistance Asa Richardson and James Bintliff, they continued the examination of the records and papers belonging to the office of the clerk of the board of supervisors from day to day until the 2nd inst.

The matter is involved in much obscurity, owing to the destruction and mutilation of records and papers. We are therefore unable to make as full and perfect a report as we could desire; we have, however, detected frauds committed from the year 1848 to 1854 inclusive.

The aggregate amount of which the county has been defrauded, so far as we are able to state from our imperfect means of ascertaining, including orders altered, orders wholly fraudulent, and the same raised for weights and measures, and exclusive of $895.17 of orders for the issuing of which no bills or resolutions can be found, is $2,541.28, from which deduct $696.80, the amount cancelled by payer, and there remains a balance now due the county of $1,844.48; all of which is respectfully submitted.

“J. W. Stewart offered the following resolution, which was adopted, to-wit:

“WHEREAS, The county of Green is the owner, in fee, of lot No. 12, in Russell’s donation, which lot has been used by the direction of the county for cemetery purposes; and,

WHEREAS, said lot is within the corporate limits of the village of Monroe; and,

WHEREAS, the said village has purchased new cemetery grounds, of greater extent, and it is desirous that the dead be removed thereto, Therefore,

Resolved, That the said lot first described, be donated to the village of Monroe, in consideration that the said village, at their own expense, maintain and protect the same, or cause the dead to be removed, at their own expense. And it is hereby ordered, That the chairman of this board execute, and cause to be delivered to the president of the said village, a deed, in accordance with the above resolution.”

CHAPTER XX.

THE WAR FOR THE UNION.

Before entering upon a consideration of the part taken by the citizen-soldiers of Green county, in the great contest between the slave-owners of the south and the lovers of freedom in the north, it is proper to dwell for a brief period upon the causes leading to the conflict of arms and the incipient steps taken by the general and State governments in arousing and marshalling the hosts of liberty-loving men who afterward so grandly kept step to the music of the Union.

WISCONSIN'S FIRST EFFORTS.

When Wisconsin was first called upon to aid the general government in its efforts to sustain itself against the designs of the secession conspirators, the commercial affairs of the State were embarrassed to a considerable degree by the depreciation of the currency. The designs of the secessionists were so far developed at the ending of the year 1860, as to show that resistance to the National authority had been fully determined on. It is not a matter of wonder, then, that Gov. Randall in his message to the legislature, early in January, 1861, should have set forth the dangers which threatened the Union, or should have denied the right of a State to secede from it.

“Secession,” said he, “is revolution; revolution is war; war against the government of the United States is treason.” “It is time,” he continued, “now, to know whether we have any government, and if so, whether it has any strength. Is our written constitution more than a sheet of parchment? The Nation must be lost or preserved by its own strength. Its strength is in the patriotism of the people. It is time now that politicians become patriots; that men show their love of country by every sacrifice, but that of principle, and by unwavering devotion to its interests and integrity.” “The hopes,” added the governor, most eloquently, “of civilization and Christianity are suspended now upon the answer to this question of dissolution. The capacity for, as well as the right of, self-government is to pass its ordeal, and speculation to become certainty. Other systems have been tried, and have failed; and all along the skeletons of Nations have been strewn, as warnings and land marks, upon the great highway of historic government. Wisconsin is true, and her people steadfast. She will not destroy the Union, nor consent that it shall be done. Devised by great, and wise, and good men, in days of sore trial, it must stand. Like some bold mountain, at whose base the great seas break their angry floods, and around whose summit the thunders of a thousand hurricanes have rattled—strong, unmoved, immovable—so may our Union, be, while treason surges at its base, and passion rage around it, unmoved, immovable—here let it stand forever.” These are the words of an exalted and genuine patriotism. But the governor did not content himself with eloquence alone. He came down to matters of business as well. He urged the necessity of legislation that would give more efficient organization to the militia of the State. He warned the legislators to make preparations also for the coming time that should try the souls of men. “The signs of the times,” said he, “indicate that there may arise a contingency in the condition of the government.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

when it will become necessary to respond to a call of the National government for men and means to maintain the integrity of the Union, and to thwart the designs of men engaged in organized treason. While no unnecessary expense should be incurred, yet it is the part of wisdom, both for individuals and States, in revolutionary times to be prepared to defend our institutions to the last extremity." It was thus the patriotic governor gave evidence to the members of both houses that he "scented the battle afar off."

On the 16th of January a joint resolution of the legislature was passed, declaring that the people of Wisconsin are ready to co-operate with the friends of the Union everywhere for its preservation, to yield a cheerful obedience to its requirements, and to demand a like obedience from all others; that the legislature of Wisconsin, profoundly impressed with the value of the Union, and determined to preserve it unimpaired, hail with joy the recent firm, dignified and patriotic special message of the President of the United States; that they tender to him, through the chief magistrate of their own State, whatever aid, in men and money, may be required to enable him to enforce the laws and uphold the authority of the federal government and in defense of the more perfect Union, which has conferred prosperity and happiness on the American people. "Renewing," said they, "the pledge given and redeemed by our fathers, we are ready to devote our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honors in upholding the Union and the Constitution."

The legislature, in order to put the State upon a kind of "war footing," passed an act for its defense, and to aid in enforcing the laws and maintaining the authority of the general government. It was under this act that Gov. Randall was enabled to organize the earlier regiments of Wisconsin. By it, in case of a call from the President of the United States to aid in maintaining the Union and the supremacy of the laws, to suppress rebellion or insurrection, or to repel invasion within the United States, the governor was authorized to provide, in the most efficient manner for responding to such call—to accept the services of volunteers for service, in companies of seventy-five men each, rank and file, and in regiments of ten companies of seventy-five men each, and to commission officers for them. The governor was also authorized to contract for the uniforms and equipments necessary for putting such companies into active service. One hundred thousand dollars was appropriated for war purposes; and bonds were authorized to be issued for that amount, to be negotiated by the governor for raising funds. It will be seen, therefore, that the exigencies of the times—for Fort Sumter had not yet been surrendered—were fully met by the people's representatives, they doing their whole duty, as they then understood it, in aid of the perpetuity of the Union.

Having defended Fort Sumter for thirty-four hours, until the quarters were entirely burned, the main gates destroyed, the gorge-wall seriously injured, the magazine surrounded by flames, and its door closed from the effects of the heat, four barrels and three cartridges of powder only being available, and no provisions but pork remaining, Robert Anderson, major of the 1st Artillery, United States army, accepted terms of evacuation offered by Gen. Beauregard, marched out of the fort on Sunday afternoon, the 14th of April, 1861, with colors flying and drums beating, bringing away company and private property, and saluting his flag with fifty guns. This, in brief, is the story of the fall of Sumter and the opening act of the War of the Rebellion.

"Whereas," said Abraham Lincoln, President, in his proclamation of the next day, "the laws of the United States have been for some time past, and now are, opposed, and the execution thereof obstructed, in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by law." Now, in view of that fact, he called forth the militia of the several States of the Union, to the aggregate number of 75,000, in order to suppress those combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed. "A call is made on you by tonight's mail for one regiment of militia for immediate service," telegraphed the secretary of war to Randall, on the same day.

THE STATE AROUSED.

In Wisconsin, as elsewhere, the public pulse quickened under the excitement of the fall of Sumter. "The dangers which surrounded the Nation awakened the liveliest sentiments of patriotism and devotion. For the time party fealty was forgotten in the general desire to save the Nation. The minds of the people soon settled into the conviction that a bloody war was at hand, and that the glorious fabric of our National government, and the principles upon which it is founded, were in jeopardy, and with a determination unparalleled in the history of any country, they rushed to its defense. On every hand the National flag could be seen displayed, and the public enthusiasm knew no bounds. In city, town and hamlet, the burden on every tongue was war." "We have never been accustomed," said Gov. Randall, "to consider the military arm as essential to the maintenance of our government, but an exigency has arisen that demands its employment." "The time has come," he continued, "when parties and platforms must be forgotten, and all good citizens and patriots unite together in putting down rebels and traitors." "What is money," he asked, "what is life, in the presence of such a crisis?"

Such utterances and such enthusiasm could but have their effect upon the legislature, which, it will be remembered, was still in session. So, although that body had voted to adjourn, sine die, on the 15th Of April, yet, when the moment arrived, and a message from the governor. was received, announcing that, owing to the extraordinary exigencies which had arisen, an amendment of the law of the 13th of the month was necessary, the resolution to adjourn was at once rescinded. The two houses thereupon not only increased the amount of bonds to be issued to $200,000, but they also passed a law exempting from civil process, during the time of service, all persons enlisting and mustering into the United States army from Wisconsin. When, on the 17th, the legislature did adjourn, the scene was a remarkable one. Nine cheers were given for the star spangled banner and three for the Governor's Guard, who had just then tendered their services—the first in the State—under the call for a regiment of men for three months' duty.

"For the first time in the history of this federal government," are the words of the governor, in a proclamation issued on the 16th of April, "organized treason has manifested itself within several States of the Union, and armed rebels are making war against it." "The treasurers of the country," said he, "must no longer be plundered; the public property must be protected from aggressive violence; that already seized must be retaken, and the laws must be executed in every State of the Union alike." "A demand," he added, "made upon Wisconsin, by the President of the United States, for aid to sustain the federal arm, must meet with a prompt response;" And it did, and nowhere with more genuine enthusiasm than in Green county.

GREEN COUNTY AWAKENED.

The county of Green was not slow to move when it was clearly seen by her citizens that the Union was in deed and in truth threatened by armed rebellion and avowed secession.

Her first company was company C, 3d regiment. It was enlisted in April and May, 1861. In December of that year, the county was credited with 229 soldiers. Her total credit in August, 1862; was 708 men; so, it will be seen, that Green county was not slow to respond to the calls made upon her when the war broke out.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

GREEN COUNTY'S ROLL OF HONOR.

The following are brief sketches of the various Wisconsin regiments in which, to a greater or less extent, Green county was represented during the war. To these sketches are appended the names of the citizen-soldiers from the county in each of these regiments, so far as ascertained:

FIRST WISCONSIN (THREE MONTHS) REGIMENT.

On the 15th of April, 1861, an informal meeting was held at Madison, at the executive office, to consider events, Judge O. Cole, of the Supreme Court in the chair. He made a speech full of patriotism and the noblest sentiments. On the day following, Gov. Randall notified Capt. George E. Bryant that the services of the Madison Guards had been accepted, and he was authorized to fill up his company; and, on the same day, the governor issued a proclamation for the organization of the 1st regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers. The enrollment of men for this company began on April 17, on which day twenty-eight names were enrolled, which on the 20th were increased to 118. On the 17th, the Governor's Guard, a military organization at Madison, by their captain, Judge J. P. Atwood, tendered their services, which were accepted on the 18th. The company had seventy-three names enrolled; and on the evening of that day, a large and enthusiastic meeting was held at the assembly room in the State capitol, at which Hon. H. S. Orton presided. A committee was appointed to receive from the citizens, and those in the vicinity, subscriptions for the support of families which should need aid. At this meeting, $7,490 were voluntarily subscribed. The two Madison companies, with the other companies composing the 1st regiment, rendezvoused at Milwaukee on the 27th of April; and, on the 17th of May, the organization of the regiment was completed, and mustered into the United States service, and the war department informed that it awaited marching-orders. The troops remained in camp until the 9th of June, when, in obedience to orders from Washington, they left the State for Harrisburg, Penn., fully equipped by the State, with the exception of arms. The commissioned officers were John C. Starkweather, colonel; Charles L. Harris, lieutenant-colonel; D. H. Lain, major; A. R. Chapin, adjutant; D. W. Keyes, quartermaster; B. F. White, surgeon; L. J. Dixon and J. Crugom, assistants; J. W. Plows, commissary; Charles Fairchild, assistant. The regiment was composed of four companies from Milwaukee county, two from Dane county, one from Rock, one each from Kenosha and Fond du Lac counties. The regiment was quartered for a time at Hagerstown, Md., under the command of Generals Nagley and Abercrombie respectively. It was assigned to the division of Major-Gen. Patterson, July 2. It led the advance on Martinsburg, participated in the battle of Falling Water, and won a reputation for bravery and veteran-like conduct excelled by no other regiment. After serving out the time for which it was enlisted, the regiment returned to Fort Scott, at Milwaukee, and was mustered out Aug. 22, 1861. The only person from Green county in this regiment, so far as is known, was Robert Hewitt, of Albany..

SECOND WISCONSIN REGIMENT.

The 2d Wisconsin was ordered to move into camp at Madison on the 1st of May, 1861, which was by S. Park Coon (who was appointed by the governor colonel of the regiment), named Camp Randall, in honor of the governor. This regiment was first organized for three months' service; but, on the 7th of May, orders were received to recruit the regiment for three years, or the war. The regiment was mustered into the United States service, and received orders to move forward to Harrisburg, Penn. They started on the 20th of June, arrived at Washington June 25, and went into camp near the city. After remaining in camp some time, Col. Coon was detached, and placed upon the staff of

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

Gen. Sherman; and the command of the regiment devolved upon Lieut-Col. Peck.

The numerical strength of this regiment when it left Camp Randall was as follows: field and staff, 9; company officers, 30; band, 24; noncommissioned officers, musicians, and privates, 985; total, 1,048.

The fate of the 2d Wisconsin, from its very inception, was one of privation and hardship. It was called into camp at an inclement season of the year, amid constant storms and cold winds, without shelter or proper clothing. It was in the "onward to Richmond" movement, participated in the skirmish at Bull Run, July 19, took an active part in the memorable battle of July 21, and won a fine reputation for bravery and soldier-like conduct. It took an exposed situation, faced the enemy for hours, and was among the last to leave the field at the disgraceful finish. The thinned ranks at roll-call the next day proved the part it acted. As an evidence of what this regiment had been through, it is sufficient to state, that it left the State, June 20, over 1,000 strong, and, October 1, reported for duty only 689 men. After this battle, a number of changes took place in the officers of this regiment. Lucius Fairchild, formerly captain of company K of the 1st regiment, was appointed lieutenant-colonel, and many others were promoted. Among the companies composing this regiment was one from Fox Lake, Dodge county, one from La Crosse county, one from Grant, one from Janesville, one from Oshkosh, one from Racine, one from Portage City, one from Madison and one each from Mineral Point and Milwaukee.

The 2d regiment—which had been identified with the Army of the Potomac from its first organization to the present time, and which was the representative of Wisconsin at the first battle of Bull Run—was joined, later in the season of 1861, by the 6th and 7th regiments. On the re-organization of the army by Gen. McClellan, these regiments, together with the 9th Indiana, were organized as a brigade, and assigned to the command of Brig-Gen. Gibbon; Gen. King having been promoted to the command of a division. Thenceforth their history is identical; and Wisconsin may well be proud of their record, which has procured for them the name of the "Iron Brigade of the West."*

Men in the Second Regiment from Green County.

Henry W. Peck, F. R. Melvin, F. Luchsinger, Frederick Geiser, Mathias Wichser, Adam Bopp, Jacob Bopp, Thomas Deitland, Sebastian Frey, Pauly Heitz, Henry Hoesli, Samuel Hoesli, Fridolin Klase, Henry Knobel, Ubiah Kubly, Melchior Luchsinger, Fridolin Marty, Henry T. Sperry, John Staub, Fridolin Streiff and Jacob Trumpy.

THIRD WISCONSIN REGIMENT.

The 3d regiment was called into camp at Fond du Lac about the 15th of June, 1861, and was placed under the command of Col. Charles S. Hamilton, a graduate of West Point, who had served his country with credit to himself during the Mexican War. Of this regiment, Thomas H. Ruger was lieutenant-colonel; Bertine Pinkney, major; L. H. D. Crane, adjutant. It was composed of companies from Watertown, Oshkosh, Monroe, Waupun, Mayville, Boscobel, Neenah, Darlington, Shullsburg and Madison. Its numerical strength was 979 men, and it was mustered into the United States service June 29, 1861, by Capt. McIntyre, United States army; received marching-orders July 6, and started for Harrisburg July 12. This regiment, like the 1st and 2d regiments, was fully equipped with the exception of arms. It was stationed, most of the time after its arrival at the seat of war, at Fredericktown, Md., and had but little opportunity to exhibit its bravery on the battlefield during the year. Three of the companies (A, C, and H) were engaged in the fight at Bolivar, early in October,

*A sketch of the "Iron Brigade" will be given when we come to treat of the Sixth and Seventh Regiments.

in connection with two companies of the Massachusetts 4th, against more than three times their number of the enemy in position. During the engagement, a charge was made by the Wisconsin companies; and a heavy field-piece was captured, which was afterward retaken by the enemy. The battle was terminated by another heroic charge by the three Wisconsin companies, led on by Capt. Bartram and Lieut. O'Brien. Under command of Major Gould of the 4th Massachusetts, the enemy was routed and forced from his position, and put to flight, and again the same field-piece was captured from the enemy, and brought off the ground by volunteers of the 3d.

On the arrival of the 3d regiment in Maryland, Col. Hamilton was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general; Lieut-Col. Ruger was promoted colonel; Major Pinkney, lieutenant-colonel; and Adjutant L. H. D. Crane, major.

The regiment passed the winter of 1861—62 principally at Alexandria, of which place Col. Ruger was appointed provost-marshal. In the spring campaign, they were assigned to the command of Major-Gen. Banks, entering Winchester, Va., on the 12th of March, and accompanied him in the sudden retreat towards Washington, which commenced on the 25th of May. They acted as a portion of the rear-guard, and lost, in the various conflicts occurring by the movement, about 120 men in killed, wounded and missing. The retreat was conducted with the most admirable coolness, the men facing about in line, three several times giving the enemy a number of volleys.

This division returned soon after to Winchester to co-operate with the commands of Generals Fremont and Sigel, and on the 9th of August took part in the battle of Cedar Mountain. The regiment went into battle with 423 men, of whom 107 were either killed, wounded or missing. In the official report of Gen. Gordon, who commanded the brigade, special praise is awarded to the 3d Wisconsin and a Massachusetts regiment for displaying great coolness under the terrible fire they were ordered to face. During this action, Lieut-Col. Crane was killed who fell gallantly leading his men upon the enemy. Capt. O'Brien of company I was wounded early in the day, but refused to leave the field. Later in the day, he received a mortal wound, and died three days afterwards. Capt. Hawley and Lieutenants Snow and Derring were also wounded, and Lieut. Widney taken prisoner.

Subsequently, they took part in the short and brilliant campaign under McClellan, in which Antietam was the finishing stroke to the invaders in Maryland. They took into action about 345 men, and lost, in killed and wounded, 197. In this battle, Lieut. Reed was killed, and Col. Ruger, Captains Stevenson and Whitman, Lieutenants Field, Shepard, Parks and Dick were wounded. On the 7th of December, the regiment was in Gen. Gordon's brigade headquarters near Antietam Ford, Md.

The 3d regiment, in January, 1863, encamped at Stafford Court House. Lieut-Col. Hawley was promoted to the command in March, and other changes made. The regiment took part in the operations of Gen. Hooker near Chancellorsville; and, in the battles that occurred from April 27, to May 6, they had nineteen killed, or died of wounds, and seventy-four wounded. On the 6th of June, the regiment was detached to accompany a cavalry expedition up the Rappahannock, and, as skirmishers and sharpshooters, contributed to the victory gained by our troops. In this engagement, the regiment had two killed and fourteen wounded.

The regiment passed the summer and fall in railroad guard-duty, picket-duty, etc., at various points in Tennessee. Being transferred to the army of the Cumberland, they proceeded to Columbus, Ohio; thence to Stevenson, Ala, where they arrived Oct. 3, 1863. A sufficient number having re-enlisted, as veterans, the regiment, on the 25th of that month, left for Wisconsin on a furlough. They afterward took an active part in the assault on the enemy's works at Port Hudson, losing thirty-nine killed, seventy wounded and thirty-one missing. After this engagement, the regiment remained in the vicinity of Port Hudson, while Gen. Banks was perfecting a plan for the capture of that place. On the 1st of September, 1863, the regiment was changed to the 4th Wisconsin Cavalry.

FIFTH WISCONSIN REGIMENT.

The 5th Wisconsin was called into camp at Madison from the 21st to the 25th of June 1861, and placed under the command of Col. Amasa Cobb. The officers under him were H. W. Emery, lieutenant-colonel; Charles H. Larrabee, major; Theodore S. West, adjutant; J. G. Clark, quartermaster; A. L. Castleman, surgeon; George D. Wilbur and C. E. Crane, assistants; Rev. R. Langley, chaplain. The companies were two from Milwaukee, and one each from Manitowoc, Beaver Dam, Janesville, Waukesha, Berlin, Richland, Taycheedah and Menomonee. The numerical strength of the regiment was 1,057 men. It was mustered into the United States service, July 13, 1861. On the 22d of that month orders were received to move forward to Washington. On the 24th, they were on their way and on arriving at their destination were attached to Gen. Rufus King's brigade. The regiment was detailed for advance duty most of the time after its arrival.

The 5th left their winter quarters at Camp Griffin, near Lewisville, Va., where they had been stationed during the winter, and marched on the 9th of March, 1862, to Flint Hill, two miles from Fairfax court house, whence they marched to the Potomac, within four miles of Alexandria. There they embarked, on the 23d of that month, to take part in the great expedition against Richmond, under the command of Gen. McClellan.

From their arrival at Hampton, Va., on the 26th of March to the day of the final retreat, their history is thoroughly identified with that of the Army of the Peninsula. Their conduct in the battle of Williamsburg, on the 5th of May, was such as to elicit a flattering encomium from Gen. McClellan. The regiment bore its full share in the series of great battles from June 29 to July 4. They went into winter quarters at White Oak Church, near Belle Plain. Col. Amasa Cobb, being elected to Congress, resigned, and Thomas S. Allen was made colonel.

The 5th regiment performed some daring deeds under Col. Allen,—taking the Washington battery, of New Orleans. They also participated in the charge on the enemy's works at Rappahannock station. They returned to winter quarters at Brandy station, where they remained until the opening of the campaign of 1864.

During the winter of 1863—64 over 200 of the men re-enlisted. After a visit to Wisconsin, they returned in time for the spring campaign. The regiment left its camp May 4, 1864, and took part in the Wilderness campaign. They crossed the Rapidan at Germania Ford, marched eighteen miles and bivouacked. They followed the movements of the 6th corps, and were engaged in the various actions from the 7th to the 11th of May. After leaving Spottsylvania, they engaged in destroying the Virginia Central railroad, and advanced to Cold Harbor, arriving June 1. They took part in the charge on the enemy's works at Cold Harbor, capturing the intrenchments with a number of prisoners. They remained here until the 12th, constantly exposed to the enemy's fire, when they marched to and crossed James river, and took their position in the trenches before Petersburg. In the charge of the 22d, they participated, proceeding on the 29th to Reams station, where they engaged in fatigue and picket duty until July 11.

The casualties for May and June were forty-eight killed or died of their wounds, and 144 wounded. The 5th accompanied the movement of the 6th corps to Washington to assist in the defense of that city, arriving on the 12th; on which day, the three-years' term of non-veterans having expired, they volunteered for the defense of the capital. The danger having passed, they left, on the 16th, from Washington, and arrived at Madison on the 22d, where they received a hearty welcome from the State authorities, and were finally mustered out on the 3d of August. Thus ended the service of the original 5th regiment.

The re-enlisted veterans and recruits were organized into an independent battalion of three companies, under the command of C. W. Kemp, of company A, Capt. J. H. Cook, company B, and Capt. M. L. Butterfield, company C. On the 13th of July, they moved, with the 6th corps to the Shenandoah valley, in pursuit of the enemy, participating in the engagement at Snicker's Gap. On the 18th they returned to Washington; and on the 26th they proceeded to Harper's Ferry, and united with the movements of the 6th corps, participating in the action at Charleston. They remained at Charleston performing picket and guard duty until the 18th of September, when they moved forward and took part in the battle of Cedar Creek. Afterward, with the brigade, they went to Winchester in the performance of garrison duty.

On the muster out of service of the "Old Fifth," Gov. Lewis authorized its re-organization, and re-commissioned Thomas S. Allen as colonel. Under his supervision, seven companies were rapidly recruited, organized and mustered into the United States service, and left the State on the 2d of October, 1864. They arrived at Washington, received arms, and were sent to Alexandria, where they remained doing provost duty, until October 20, when they proceeded, by way of Martinsburg and Winchester, to Cedar Creek, where they joined the battalion and the forces under Gen. Sheridan, and remained at that place until December 2. They rejoined the forces under Gen. Grant, in the trenches before Petersburg, on the 4th of December, where they remained until the 5th of February, 1865, when they took part in the extension of the lines at Dabney's Mills, on Hatcher's Run, suffering little loss, as they were held in reserve.

In the charge on the enemy's works at Petersburg, April 2, 1865, the 5th regiment, with the 37th Massachusetts, led by Col. Allen, were in the extreme front, supported by two lines in the rear. At 4 a. m., the signal for the charge was given, and the colors of the 5th were the first planted on the enemy's works. Col. Allen led a portion of his men two miles through the abandoned lines of the enemy to the left, capturing many prisoners; then back to the right, where the regiment was engaged in skirmishing till night.

On the afternoon of April 3, they joined in the pursuit of Lee—the 6th corps encountering Gen. Ewell's forces at Little Sailor's Creek on the 7th. The lines were hurriedly formed and pushed forward at double-quick; the regiment marching with unbroken line through a swamp waist-deep, under fire of the enemy's musketry. They moved to the brow of a hill, where the enemy was discovered but a few paces distant, admirably posted, and fighting with the energy of despair. The regiment was in an extremely hazardous position, being subjected to a severe flank and cross fire. Col. Allen rode in advance of the line as calmly as though danger were unknown. Company G, (Capt. Henry Curran) and company C, (Lieut. Evan R. Jones) were deployed as skirmishers. Lieut.-Gen. Ewell and staff surrendered to six men of the skirmishers, under command of Sergt. Cameron, company A, who was promoted lieutenant on the field for gallantry. The action of the regiment elicited high encomiums from the corps, division and brigade commanders.

In the action of April 7, the regiment had sixteen killed, seventy-nine wounded, and three died of wounds. The pursuit was continued until the 9th, when Lee surrendered. On the 10th the regiment commenced its return, and reached Burke's station on the evening of the 13th. They encamped until the 23d of April, and marched to Danville, arriving on the 27th, and reaching Richmond on the 20th of May. Leaving Richmond on the 24th for Washington, they arrived there June 2, after a long and tedious march. On the 16th of June they left for Madison, Wis., arriving on the 20th, and were soon after mustered out of the service.

SIXTH AND SEVENTH WISCONSIN REGIMENTS.

The 6th regiment was called into Camp Randall, at Madison, about the 25th of June, 1861, and was under the command of Lysander Cutler, of Milwaukee, as colonel. The other officers were: J. P. Atwood, lieutenant-colonel; B. F. Sweet, major; Frank A. Haskall, adjutant; J. N. Mason, quartermaster; C. B. Chapman, surgeon; A. W. Preston and A. D. Andrews, assistants; and Rev. N. A. Staples, chaplain. The companies forming the regiment were from Sauk, Pierce and Crawford counties, and two from Milwaukee, Fond du Lac, Rock, Buffalo, Monroe and Juneau counties. The numerical strength of the regiment when it left Camp Randall was 1,084.

The regiment arrived at Washington on the 7th of August, and was immediately assigned to King's brigade and went into camp on Meridian Hill, where it remained until the 3d of September, when it marched with the brigade to Chain bridge and was employed in picket and guard duty at Camp Lyon until it was joined by the 2d Wisconsin, the 9th Indiana and the 7th Wisconsin, about the 1st of October. These afterwards formed the famous "Iron Brigade," in which its subsequent history is merged.

The 7th regiment was called into camp during the month of August, 1861, and placed under the command of Col. Joseph Vandor. The other officers were: W. W. Robinson, lieutenant-colonel; Charles A. Hamilton, major; Charles W. Cook, adjutant; H. P. Clinton, quartermaster; Henry Palmer, surgeon; D. Cooper Ayers and Ernest Cramer, assistants; and Rev. S. L. Brown, chaplain. When the regiment left the State, its numerical strength was 1,016.

This regiment, unlike these that had gone before it, was mustered into the United States service by companies, and on the 4th of September, 1861, received orders to move forward to Washington, where it arrived October 1, and was assigned to Gen. Rufus King's brigade, McDowell's division. Its subsequent history is absorbed in that of the "Iron Brigade."

IRON BRIGADE.

Early in the war Gen. Rufus King, a graduate of West Point, tendered his services to the government and was appointed brigadier general, with authority to form a brigade composed of regiments from Wisconsin. In this he only partially succeeded, as the 5th Wisconsin was transferred to another brigade. He, however, succeeded in permanently attaching the 2d, 6th and 7th to the brigade; these, with the 9th Indiana, afterwards received the name of the "Iron Brigade," in the history of which is merged that of the 6th Wisconsin.

The brigade assigned to McDowell's division remained in camp at Fort Tillinghast until March 10, 1862, when they took part in the advance on Manassas, Col. Cutler, of the 6th Wisconsin, being in command of the brigade. The month of July found them at Falmouth opposite Fredericksburg. The brigade afterward took part in the celebrated retreat of Gen. Pope.

On the 28th of August, 1862, the battle of Gainesville was fought. This was one of the bloodiest battles of the war, and was fought by the "Iron Brigade" alone, it only receiving aid after the heaviest of the fighting was over. On the 29th of August the brigade was present on the battle field of Bull Run, engaged as support to a battery, and took part in the battle of the 30th and in the retreat which followed.

The "Iron Brigade" took part in the battle of South Mountain, Sept. 14, 1862.

Gen. Hooker was placed in command of the Army of the Potomac, and the campaign of

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

1863 was begun on the 28th of April. The "Iron Brigade" proceeded on that day to Fitzhugh's crossing, below Fredericksburg, and was attached to the first division of the first army corps.

The "Iron Brigade" was in the battle of Gettysburg and in the battle of the Wilderness.

Continuing our narrative of the Iron Brigade, we find, that, on the 12th of June, they crossed the Chickahominy, and marched to James river, and proceeded to Petersburg, where they erected breastworks on the 17th of June. In the engagements at this place, the 6th and 7th suffered terribly. The 7th lost twenty-one killed and thirty-seven wounded. The 6th lost seventeen killed and thirty-one wounded. From this time to July 30, the division and brigade were constantly engaged in the duties of the siege, and took part in the operations connected with the explosion of the mine. On the 18th of August, they left Petersburg, and marched to Yellow House, near Reams station, on the Weldon Railroad; and, at the action at the last-named place, the 7th captured twenty-seven prisoners without sustaining any loss. Until October 27, the brigade was engaged in siege duties, when they were transferred to Crawford's third division, and took a part in the engagement at Hatcher's Run. Subsequently they returned to their position in the trenches at Petersburg, where they remained until Feb. 6, 1865.

The "Iron Brigade," on the 6th of February, 1865, broke camp and took part in the engagement near Dabney's Mill, on Hatcher's Run. In this affair, the third division of Gen. Crawford, of the 5th corps, took the advance, and bore the brunt of the fight on the 6th and 7th of February. Our Wisconsin regiments fought with their accustomed gallantry; and their loss was very severe. The loss of the division was about thirty-seven officers, and 1,143 men, an aggregate of 1,180 out of about 4,000 who went into action. The loss of the 7th regiment in the battle at Dabney's Mill, on the 6th and 7th of February, 1865, as reported by Lieut.-Col. Richardson, is as follows: Four killed, and nineteen wounded. Returning to camp near the Military railroad, they remained until ordered, in the middle of February, to proceed to Baltimore. On arriving at City Point, the order, so far as it related to the 6th and 7th regiments, was countermanded; and the two regiments were ordered to return to their old camp, when, by order of Gen. Crawford, they were re-organized as the "First Provisional Brigade," and placed under the command of Col. Kellogg, of the 6th, Lieut.-Col. Kerr assuming command of the regiment. March 5, the 91st New York Heavy Artillery were added, making the brigade about 3,000 men. Here they remained until the opening of the final campaign, which resulted in the capture of Gen. Lee.

On the morning of the 29th of March, 1865, the brigade broke camp near the Military railroad, and moved to near Boydtown plank-road. Here line of battle was formed; the 6th and 7th Wisconsin forming the first line, in rear of the second brigade. The enemy being driven from his position, the brigade was ordered to a point near the road; the 7th Wisconsin, under Lieut. Col. Richardson, being placed on the road, and the balance of the brigade about eighty rods to the rear, in line of battle, where they remained during the night, and next day advanced to the road, and threw up breastworks. On the 31st the brigade moved from the breast-works, in a northwesterly direction, across Gravelly Run, where it was massed in column of regiments for a short time, when it was ordered to deploy into line of battle to the right of the second brigade. Before this movement was accomplished, only the 6th and 7th Wisconsin being in line, Col. Kellogg, in command of the brigade, was ordered to arrest the men from the front line, who were falling back in confusion. This could not be done, as the flying troops broke through his line, and threw it into confusion. The 6th and 7th were ordered to close their intervals, form into line of battle, and open fire on the enemy; which was done, and continued until the enemy had turned both flanks, and were firing on the flanks and rear. The 7th Wisconsin changed front, so as to meet the fire on their flank; but, the enemy appearing in strong force in the rear, the brigade retired across Gravelly Run in as good order as possible, being somewhat broken up by being compelled to fight their way back. The 6th and 7th were formed on the front line next to the creek, near the bridge, where they remained during the rest of the engagement. The brigade was re-formed in the rear of their first position, and ordered to lie down, and were afterwards moved forward on the battlefield, and encamped. The fifth corps had been ordered to report to Gen Sheridan, at Dinwiddie Court House. On the 1st of April, the brigade moved in line of battle in a westerly direction to the vicinity of the Gravelly Run church. In the afternoon the 7th regiment occupied the advance line on the left of the brigade, with the 6th Wisconsin on the right. Companies B and E of the 7th were deployed as skirmishers, covering the brigade front, advancing in line of battle. The enemy's advance was driven through the woods, back upon their entrenchments at Five Forks. Gen. Sheridan ordered Col. Richardson to move over the enemy's works, which the gallant colonel obeyed, wheeling to the right, and charging the enemy through the open field, driving them through the woods, following their retreating columns, and again charging them through a second open field. Night coming on, the brigade fell back two miles, and went into position behind the breastworks captured from the enemy.. This was the part taken by the 6th and 7th Wisconsin in the famous battle of Five Forks.

On the 2d, the brigade advancing to the South Side railroad, found the position abandoned by the enemy. This was about thirteen. miles from Petersburg. Continuing to advance rapidly in a westerly direction, the enemy were found entrenched on the Burkesville road. The brigade was deployed to the right of the road, in two lines; and the 7th, under Col. Richardson, were deployed as skirmishers, with orders to cover the entire front of the line of battle. The enemy, after dark, opened fire on their lines, which was replied to; and the command advanced, and halted within a few rods of their breastworks, where they lay on their arms all night. During the night the enemy abandoned their works. Pursuit was made; but they were not overtaken, and the brigade went into bivouac. On the morning of the 4th pursuit was resumed; and Jettersville station, on the Danville railroad, was reached in the afternoon, which was found occupied by Gen. Sheridan's cavalry, and the enemy in strong force just beyond. Here the brigade formed in line of battle, the men weary and footsore, having traveled all day, and labored all night, throwing up breastworks. Here they rested, waiting for an attack, until the 6th, when the enemy was found to have again taken flight. Following him during the 6th and 7th, on the west side of the Appomattox, they reached High Railroad Bridge, where the found the enemy had crossed, and set the bridge on fire. On the 8th, a long and tiresome forced march was made by the brigade, being much impeded by the wagon trains of the twenty-fourth corps. They encamped in line of battle that night. On the 9th, pursuit was again resumed; and the gallant "Iron Brigade" had the proud satisfaction of assisting in the capture of the famous army of Gen. Lee at Appomattox Court House.

In the short campaign from March 29 to April 9, the casualties in the 6th and 7th regiments were as follows Sixth regiment, killed, or died of wounds, sixteen; 7th regiment, killed, or died of wounds, eighteen; wounded, fifty-two. After the surrender of the rebel forces moved to Black and White's station, on the under Gen. Lee, the brigade, on the 11th of April, Petersburg & Lynchburg Railroad, and went into camp, where they remained until the corps commanders were ordered to march their respective commands to Washington. They arrived there, and participated in the grand review on the 23d of May, and went into camp till the 17th of June, when they left Washington to report to Major-Gen. Logan, at Louisville, Ky., where they arrived on the 22d of June. Here they were organized into the "Provincial Division" of Gen. Morrow,—the 7th regiment in the first and the 6th in the second brigade; the latter being placed under, the command of Col. Kellogg of the 6th, who, at the muster-out of Gen. Morrow, was assigned to the command of the division. The 7th was mustered out, and started for Wisconsin on the 2d of July, arriving on the 5th at Madison, where it was received by the State authorities, and was soon after paid off, and the regiment disbanded. The 6th was mustered out on the 14th, and arrived at Madison on the 16th, and were publicly received, paid, and the regiment disbanded. Col. Kellogg, the last brigade commander, issued a final order, dissolving the organization of the "Iron Brigade;" and the gallant corps, which had become the pride of our State, ceased to exist. Its history forms one of the brightest pages in our National records. Col. Kellogg of the 6th, was subsequently brevetted brigadier-general, and Lieut-Col. Richardson of the 7th, was brevetted colonel, and subsequently brigadier-general, for gallant and meritorious services in the final operations of the Army of the Potomac, particularly at the battle of Five Forks.

EIGHTH WISCONSIN REGIMENT.

The 8th regiment was called into camp from the 1st to the 16th of September, 1861, and placed under the command of Col. Robert C. Murphy, of St. Croix Falls. The other field and staff officers were, George W. Robinson, lieutenant-colonel; J. W. Jefferson, major; Ezra T. Sprague, adjutant; F. L. Billings, quartermaster; S. P. Thornhill, surgeon; W. Hobbins and J. S. Murta, assistants; and W. McKinley, chaplain. The companies were from the counties of Waupaca, Sheboygan, Eau Claire, Crawford, La Crosse, Racine and from Fox Lake, Fitchburg, Janesville and Belleville. The numerical strength of the regiment when it left Camp Randall was 966 men, and it was mustered into service by companies, by Major Brooks.

After being fully equipped (with the exception of arms), on the 30th of September, Col. Murphy received notice that he had been assigned, with his command, to Major-Gen. Fremont's division. On the 1st of October, orders were received to move forward to St. Louis, at which place they arrived October 13. The fine appearance of the regiment elicited universal praise. It was received at St. Louis by the Hon. S. Cameron, secretary of war, and Adjutant-Gen. L. Thomas, who paid it a high compliment. This was the first regiment that had passed in that direction from the State. The next day after their arrival, an order came for them to move forward to Pilot Knob with the certainty of meeting the enemy. They went forward, and on the 21st took part in the battle of Frederickstown. The regiment was held as a reserve.

The 8th regiment, from the time of their departure from the State, up to the middle of January, with the exception of the skirmish at Frederickstown, in the autumn of 1861, was principally engaged in guarding railroad bridges and other general duties in the southern portion of Missouri and in Arkansas. On the 16th of January they left Camp Curtis, arriving at Cairo the next day. From Cairo they were ordered to Point Pleasant, Mo., to participate in the attack on Island No. 10, whence they marched, on the 7th of April, to New Madrid.

Shortly after the reduction of this island, they were ordered to Corinth, and arrived at Pittsburg Landing on the 22d of April, when they at once took their place in the army destined for the reduction of Corinth. On the 9th of May, at the battle of Farmington, the 8th regiment, under the command of Lieut-Col. Robbins, lost in killed, three (of whom two were commissioned officers), and sixteen wounded, and one missing. On the 28th of May, leaving Farmington, the regiment, under the command of Lieut-Col. Robbins—Col. Murphy being in charge of the brigade—went into action before Corinth, and, by their steady courage and demeanor, demonstrated their bravery under a heavy fire, losing, in this action, two killed and five wounded. This was the last effort of the rebels to defend the city, which was entered by our troops two days afterwards.

Subsequently they were ordered to Iuka, where they remained until the approach of the rebels under Price and Van Dorn, when they were again ordered to Corinth, and took part in the second battle of Corinth, on the 3d and 4th of October. During this battle, while Col. Murphy was absent, Lieut-Col. Robbins and Major Jefferson were wounded, and carried from the field; and the command of the regiment devolved upon Capt. Britton, who nobly conducted the action. Their loss in this battle was fourteen killed, seventy-five wounded, and two missing. After joining in the pursuit of the rebels which followed this battle, they returned to Corinth on the 14th of October, after which time they were stationed in the vicinity of Waterford, Miss.

The 8th nobly earned the encomiums bestowed upon it. Its record is such that Wisconsin may feel proud of the "Eagle" regiment.

On the 8th of December, the regiment was at Waterford, Miss., in the left wing of the Army of the Tennessee, under the command of Major-Gen. U. S. Grant.

The 8th regiment, in January, 1863, moved from La Grange, by way of Corinth, to Germantown, Tenn., where they were employed in building fortifications, and guard duty, until March 11, when they marched to Memphis, and joined the forces intended by Gen. Grant to operate against Vicksburg, which were being concentrated near Helena. Lieut-Col. Robbins was commissioned as colonel in the place of Col. Murphy—dismissed. The regiment with other attacked the enemy, and, on the 14th of May, took possession of Jackson, the capital of Mississippi. They then proceeded to Walnut Hills, forming the extreme right of the investing force around Vicksburg. Here they took a part in the assault on the enemy's works. The regiment participated in many skirmishes with some loss, and on the 26th of September moved to Black River bridge, and went into camp, and remained until October 13. The 8th regiment, on the 27th of January, 1864, proceeded to Vicksburg, by way of Memphis, and encamped near Black River bridge on the 3d of February. They took part in Sherman's famous Meridian expedition, marching as far as Canton, Miss., and returning to Black River bridge, thence to Vicksburg, on the 5th of March. Here the regiment consented to remain and take part in Gen Smith's projected expedition up the river to co-operate with Gen. Banks. The regiment expected to be sent home on veteran furlough, but remained at the especial request of Gen. Sherman. Leaving Vicksburg March 10, they passed down the Mississippi and up the Red river, to Simmsport, and landed. The brigade advanced and charged upon the rebels at Fort Scurvy, capturing several prisoners, and some military stores. Continuing up the river, they attacked and captured Fort De Russy, after a short resistance. Here they were joined by the fleet, when they proceeded to Alexandria, and thence to Henderson Hill, where they found the rebels posted with artillery. A detour of fifteen miles was made in order to attack the enemy on the rear. About midnight, Gen. Mower succeeded in capturing the whole rebel force (350 strong), with four guns and 400 horses, and other munitions of war. After a number of marches with Gen. Smith's army and a part of Gen. Bank's force, they received the attack of the enemy, and, after four hours hard fighting, drove him from the field. Our forces subsequently retreated to Grand Encore, and thence to Alexandria.

The 8th participated in an action at Natchitoches, and also at Cloutersville, where the rebels were driven back in confusion. On the 4th of May, the 8th were deployed as skirmishers, and drove the enemy ten miles. At Bayou La Mourie, the enemy annoyed them by continuous artillery and musketry fire. They also took part in an action at Mansura, and also Calhan's Plantation, and Bayou De Glaise; after which Gen. Smith's army returned to the mouth of Red river, and, embarking, reached Vicksburg on the 24th, and went into camp. The rebels having attempted to blockade the Mississippi at Columbia, Ark., on the 6th of June, Gen. Smith sent forward a division of 1,500 infantry, and a battery in charge of Gen. Mower. The enemy were found, and an engagement ensued. The enemy were driven from their position, and pursued several miles. In this action, known as the "Battle of Chicot," the regiment had three killed, and sixteen wounded. The command proceeded up the river to Memphis, and went into camp. Here the veterans were allowed to proceed to Wisconsin on thirty days' furlough. The remainder of the regiment moved to La Grange, and in July took part in the expedition into Mississippi, and participated in the engagements near Tupelo. They returned to Memphis after a march of 260 miles. Here they were joined by the regiment from veteran furlough. Subsequently the 8th marched from Memphis to Mississippi with the forces of Gen. A. J. Smith. On the 2d of September, they proceeded to White river and to Duvall's Bluff, thence to Brownsville, in pursuit of Gen. Price, and reached Cape Girardeau, October 1. On the 5th, they left for St. Louis, where the regiment was newly clothed and equipped. Re-embarking on transports, they reached Jefferson City, and thence to Lamoine Bridge. From this place, they were assigned on the expeditionary army against Gen. Price through Kansas. Learning of the defeat and dispersion of Price's forces, they returned, reaching Benton Barracks November 15. On the 23d of November, they proceeded to Nashville to re-enforce Gen. Thomas, and took part in the battle on the 15th and 16th of December. In this action, the regiment captured a six-gun battery, about 400 prisoners, and two stands of colors. Their losses were, ten killed; fifty-two wounded.

The 8th regiment joined the pursuit of the enemy after the battle of Nashville, marched 150 miles and encamped at Clifton, Tenn. On the 22d of January, 1865, they moved to Eastport. Embarking on the 6th of February, they proceeded, with the sixteenth corps, down the Tennessee to Cairo, and thence to New Orleans, and went into camp five miles below that city. On the 5th of March they moved in transports to take part in the investment of the defenses of Mobile, landing at Dauphin Island, and from thence proceeded up Fish river, ten miles, and went into camp. On the 25th they moved, and took position in the lines before the Spanish fort. Here they were engaged in fortifying, and the performance of picket duty, until the evacuation of the fort, on the 9th of April, when they moved to a position before Fort Blakely, and took part in the charge on that place with a small loss. After the surrender, the regiment marched 180 miles to Montgomery, Ala., where they remained until the 10th of May, when they marched by way of Selma, and took cars for Uniontown, on the Alabama & Mississippi Railroad. Here they went into camp, and remained until orders were received for their muster out.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

This was done at Demopolis, Ala., on the 5th of September, and the regiment reached Madison on the 13th, where they received their pay, and were formally disbanded.

The 8th was known as the "Eagle Regiment," from the fact that a live eagle was carried through all its campaigns, up to the return of the non-veterans in 1864. This bird was taken from the parent nest in Chippewa Co., Wis., by an Indian, who disposed of it to a gentleman in Eau Claire county, from whom it was purchased by members of Capt. Perkin's company, Eau Claire Eagles, by whom it was presented to the regiment while, organizing in 1861. It is needless to say that it was instantly adopted as the regimental pet, and was christened "Old Abe." A perch was prepared and the royal bird was borne with the regiment on all its marches, and into every battle in which the gallant 8th was engaged, up to the muster-out of the non-veterans. Perched on his standard, above the heads of the men, the bird was more than once the mark for rebel bullets, but, luckily, escaped unharmed, with the exception of the loss of a few feathers shot away. He returned with the non-veterans in 1864, and was presented to the State, and placed in charge of the quartermaster's department, and every care necessary bestowed on him. At the great Chicago fair in 1863, "Old Abe" was exhibited, and his photographs disposed of, realizing the amount of about $16,000. He was also exhibited at the Milwaukee fair with profitable results. We are told that the sum netted to these charitable objects was about $20,000. He occasionally breaks from his fetters, and soars into his native element; but he has become so far domesticated, that he is easily recovered. Occasionally the music of a band, or the noise of a drum, will reach his ear, when he will instantly listen, and will respond with his characteristic scream, probably recognizing the strain as one with which the battlefield has made his ear familiar. "Old Abe" has become celebrated in our military annals; and his history is inextricably interwoven with that of the brave and gallant regiment who bore him triumphantly through the field of strife.

Reference has been made to the 8th Wisconsin as the "Eagle Regiment." Some account of this "eagle," from whom the regiment derived its name, will prove interesting.

"Old Abe" was captured in the spring of 1861, in Chippewa Co., Wis., by an Indian, by the name of A-ge-mah-me-ge-zhig, of the Lake Flambeau tribe of the Chippewa Indians. The Indian sold the eagle to D. McCann, for a bushel of corn. Mr. McCann concluded that his eagle should go the wars. He took him to Chippewa Falls, and from thence to Eau Claire. The eagle being then about two months old, he sold it for $2.50 to company C. 8th Wisconsin regiment. The eagle was soon sworn into service by putting around his neck red-white-and-blue-ribbons, and on his breast a rosette of the same colors. The company, commanded by Capt. J. E. Perkins, and James McGennis, the eagle-bearer, left for Madison on the 6th of September, 1861. They arrived at La Crosse in the evening of the next day. The fact that a company was coming with a live eagle brought a great crowd to the wharf. A salute from the 1st Wisconsin Battery was fired, followed by cheers from the crowd and soldiers, 'The eagle, the eagle! hurrah for the eagle!' Arriving at Madison on the 8th of September, the company marched direct to Camp Randall, the band playing Yankee Doodle, amidst great shouting from the 7th regiment and part of the 8th. The company entered the gate; and the eagle, as if by instinct, spread his wings, took hold of one of the small flags attached to his perch, in his beak, and carried it in that position to the colonel's quarters. The excitement knew no bounds; shout after shout was heard from the crowd. Deep and strong was the conviction that the eagle had a charmed life.

"In camp he was visited by thousands, among them the highest dignitaries of civil and military life. Capt. Perkins named him 'Old Abe,' in honor of Abraham Lincoln. By a vote of the company, the Eau Claire Badgers, its original name was changed to Eau Claire Eagles; and by general expression of the people, the 8th Wisconsin was called the 'Eagle Regiment.'

"On the 12th of October, 1861, the regiment left Camp Randall. At Chicago, St. Louis, and in fact everywhere, 'Old Abe' attracted great attention. Five hundred dollars were at one time offered for him, and at another, a farm worth $5,000 but, of course, in vain. His feathers are scattered all over the Union, so great the demand for them. 'Old Abe' was seen in all his glory, when the regiment was engaged in battle. At such times, he was always found in his place at the head of company C. In the midst of the roaring of cannon, the crack of the musket, and the roll of smoke, "Old Abe," with spread pinions, would jump up and down on his perch, uttering wild and fearful screams. The fiercer and louder the storm of battle, the fiercer, wilder and louder his screams. "Old Abe" was with the command in nearly every action,—about twenty-two battles, and sixty skirmishes. It is a remarkable fact that not a color bearer or eagle bearer, of the 8th, was shot down. The veterans were mustered out of the United States service, at Memphis, Sept. 16, 1864. It was there decided that "Old Abe" should be given to the State of Wisconsin. The regiment arrived in Madison on the 26th. The eagle was received by the governor from Capt. Wolf. The famous bird has since paid the debt of nature, and now reposes as an object of curiosity, in a glass case, on an elegant pedestal, in the rotunda of the capitol.

NINTH WISCONSIN REGIMENT.

The 9th regiment was organized under a general order dated Aug. 26, 1861, giving the supervision of the organization to Lieut. W. Finkler, of Milwaukee, who acted as quartermaster to the regiment. This regiment was gotten up on a somewhat different plan from the others of Wisconsin. The men were recruited and sent into Camp Sigel and organized, to a certain extent, into companies. It was made up of Germans exclusively, and was placed under the command of Col. Frederick Salomon. The different companies were formed, generally from the eastern counties of the State—Sheboygan, Manitowoc, Milwaukee, Kenosha, Racine and Fond du Lac, Calumet and Washington; but a portion were from Dane, Green and Sank counties. The regiment was full on the 28th of December, 1861, and awaited marching orders.

The regiment left Camp Sigel, Milwaukee, under command of Col. Frederick Salomon, on the 22d of January, 1862, numbering thirty-nine officers and 884 men.

Though this regiment was raised under the special promise of Gen. Fremont, that it should compose a part of the division of Gen. Sigel, the successor of the former did not feel under any obligations to carry out the promise; and the 9th left for another destination. None of the Wisconsin regiments embraced so large a number of officers and soldiers of military experience as this one. The eagerness of the regiment to encounter the enemy, was not gratified until the 30th of September, 1862, at Newtonia. In the first part of the battle, but four companies were engaged, and these against an enemy of far greater numbers, strongly intrenched. The balance of the regiment, with Gen. F. Salomon's brigade, arrived later and took part in the fight.

Four days after the battle of Newtonia, the 9th regiment, with the brigade, was again on the march for another attack on that place, which, however, had been evacuated by the enemy, who had experienced heavy losses and did not feel strong enough to resist another attack. The retreat of the rebels was so hasty that a part of their camp equipment and a rocket-battery fell into the hands of the Union forces. The official report of the regiment in this battle shows a loss of 188 in killed, wounded and missing, of which only eight were named as killed.

In the battle at Prairie Grove, the 9th was in the rear guard without taking part actively in the fight. The last report from the regiment in 1862 showed that it was encamped at Rhea's Mills, Ark.

The regiment, in December, 1862, was near Prairie Grove, Ark., but not in time to participate in the battle. On the 10th of December, they returned to Rhea's Mills. A raid was made from there on Van Buren; the regiment marching sixty miles in two days, but soon returning. From this time till Feb. 20, 1863, the regiment was engaged in marching to various points, performing a sort of patrol duty, when they went into winter quarters at Stahl's creek, thirty-six miles west of Springfield, Mo. The regiment was stationed at different points in Missouri, engaged in guard duty, and on foraging parties in the vicinity of Rolla and Springfield, until July 8. On that day they moved by railroad to St. Louis, where they were engaged in guard duty until the 12th of September, where they remained until the 10th of October. They then marched to Little Rock, Ark., and went into winter quarters about the 1st of November.

The 9th regiment was at Little Rock, Jan. 1, 1864, and 230 re-enlisted men returned to Wisconsin on furlough early in February. The regiment participated in the Red River Expedition and was assigned to the 1st brigade. They left Little Rock March 23, and nothing occurred of note until the 1st day of April. A number of engagements between that date and the 24th of the same month took place, when they camped at White Oak creek. On the 15th of May another engagement took place; the enemy were driven back, when the brigade entered Camden. Up to the 23d of that month the 9th was detailed to guard the bridge across the Washita river.

At Jenkin's ferry the brigade was re-enforced, as Gen. Kirby Smith, of the rebel army, was near with an army of 20,000. Here a battle was fought and the 9th fought bravely. The casualties were, killed forty-seven—wounded, fifty-two. After the battle the regiment returned to Little Rock. Two companies were absent on furlough during the Camden campaign. On their return two other companies were sent home on veteran furlough.

On the 17th of November, 1864, the non-veterans whose terms of service had expired were mustered out, together with a portion of the commissioned officers. The veterans were thereupon consolidated into an independent battalion of four companies, as veterans, under the command of Lieut-Col. Jacobi. The non-veterans returned to Milwaukee, where they were cordially received, paid off and disbanded.

The veterans of the 9th remained most of the time at Little Rock until the close of the war—the only operation being an expedition to the Saline river, in January, 1865. In June the command proceeded to Camden, 100 miles south, where they continued until August, when they returned overland, occupying their old quarters at Little Rock. The Independent Battalion (the 9th) remained on duty until February, 1865, when they returned to Wisconsin and were mustered out of the service.

ELEVENTH WISCONSIN REGIMENT.

The 11th regiment was called into Camp Randall during the month of October, 1861, and placed under the command of Col. Charles L. Harris, with the following field and staff officers: Charles A. Wood, lieutenant-colonel; Arthur Platt, major; Daniel Lincoln, adjutant; Charles G. Mayer, quartermaster; H. P. Strong, surgeon; E. Everett and C. C. Barnes, assistants; and Rev. J. B. Britton, chaplain. The numerical strength of the regiment when it left Camp Randall was 1,046 men. It was fully equipped (with the exception of arms) by the State, and was mustered into the service by Capt. Lamont, of the United States army. The regiment was unavoidably detained in camp some days after receiving orders to move forward. The delay gave an opportunity to perfect the drill. Col. Harris was a graduate of West Point, served with credit in the three-months' campaign as lieutenant-colonel under Col. Starkweather of the 1st regiment. The eleventh broke camp November 20, started for St. Louis, and went into quarters twenty miles below that city.

The regiment was stationed during the greater part of the winter at Camp Curtis, near Sulphur Springs, in Missouri, guarding and keeping in repair a line of railroad extending over sixty miles; thence to Pilot Knob, which they left on the 23d of March, arriving at Reeves Station, on the Black river, on the 27th. From Reeves Station they marched 185 miles, to Jacksonport, in Lawrence county. On the 19th of May they were at Batesville, in Arkansas, which place they left on the 22d of June, crossing the Black river at Jacksonport, where they left their sick, and pushed forward to Augusta. In this vicinity they remained until the 6th of July, when they marched fifteen miles, to "a place where the rebels had made another blockade," followed, the next day, by the battle of Bayou Cache, in which the eleventh lost four killed and fifteen wounded, the latter number including the colonel, one captain and one lieutenant. From Bayou Cache they marched to Helena, in Arkansas, arriving there on the 13th of July.

A glance at their route through Missouri and Arkansas will convey some idea of the privations they must have been called upon to undergo in a march through a comparative wilderness.

Their conduct at Bayou Cache was a sufficient indication as to what their conduct would be when called upon to assert Wisconsin valor on the battlefield.

From Helena they marched to Patterson, in Missouri, where they were at the close of 1862, in the first division of the Army of Southeast Missouri, under command of Brig-Gen. J. W. Davidson.

This regiment, which had been in camp at Middlebrook, Mo., during the winter of 1862—3 was ordered to join the forces of Gen. Grant, who was concentrating his forces at Helena, preliminary to the attack on Vicksburg. Marching to St. Genevieve, the regiment embarked with the rest of the brigade and proceeded to Memphis, thence to Helena, and, on 22d of March, landed at Milliken's Bend, a few miles above Vicksburg. Taking part with the thirteenth army corps, across the river, it arrived at Bruinsburg April 30 and proceeded onward to where the enemy were found in force, near Magnolia Church, four miles from Fort Gibson. In this engagement the brigade occupied the center and the fight became severe. They advanced close to the enemy's line, and opened fire with such rapidity and precision, that the rebels soon broke and fled. They soon, however, formed again, and another engagement took place; and the rebels were again driven from the field. The commander of the brigade complimented the 11th on their bravery on these occasions. The casualties reported were six killed and fifteen wounded. On the 2d of May, the enemy having evacuated Grand Gulf, the second brigade was sent to that place. At the battle of Black River Bridge the 11th took an active part, and alone took more than 1,000 prisoners. In this engagement three were killed and eight wounded. Among the former was Capt. D. E. Hough of company A.

Moving from the bridge the next day, the 11th and the brigade took its position in the trenches before Vicksburg. In the assault on May 22 thirty-eight were killed and sixty-nine wounded. The regiment was engaged on guard and fatigue duty until July 2, when they returned to Black River Bridge. On the 3d of July the city surrendered. The 11th, with Carr's division, took part in the March of Gen. Sherman on Jackson, after the surrender of Vicksburg. On July 13, the enemy was driven to his works, and on the 17th the city was entered by our troops. They were also sent south, performing a toilsome march of 215 miles. Taking a part in Gen. Bank's operations in Texas, the 11th, with Gen.

Washburn's division, embarked for Brazos, Santiago, on the 23d, and, after repeated marching, proceeded to Indianola, and took possession of that place.

The 11th remained on duty in the vicinity of Matagorda bay and Indianola until the 11th of February, 1864, when, upwards of three-fourths of their number having re-enlisted, the regiment was mustered as a veteran organization. The non-veterans were temporarily transferred to the 23d regiment, and the remainder embarked for New Orleans, on their way on veteran furlough. They reached Madison on the 21st of March, where they were welcomed by the State authorities, and received a new set of colors. On the 23d of April the men re-assembled at Camp Washburn, Milwaukee, and again left the State, reaching Memphis on the 29th. Here they took part in Gen. Sturgis's expedition into western Tennessee and northern Mississippi, also participated in that general's skirmish with Forrest's cavalry, and returned to Memphis on the abandonment of the expedition. From Memphis they moved down the river to Carrollton, whence they proceeded to Brashear city, where they arrived May 19. The regiment remained here until Feb. 26, 1865. During its occupation here, for nine months, the 11th regiment was employed in the usual guard and outpost duty, and in making reconnoissance's in the surrounding country. The non-veterans of the eleventh arrived at Madison on the 25th of October, 1864, and were mustered out of service.

So far as is now known, only two Green county men were in this regiment—Florentine E. Andrus, of Albany, and Alfred Allen, of Cadiz.

THIRTEENTH WISCONSIN REGIMENT.

The 13th regiment was organized under a general order dated Sept. 17, 1861, giving the counties of Rock and Green the authority to organize a regiment. The regiment rendezvoused in Janesville, and was placed under the command of Col. Maurice Maloney, with the following field and staff officers; James F. Chapman, lieutenant-colonel; Thomas O'Bigney, major; W. Ruger, adjutant; P. Eydesheimer, quartermaster; John Evans, surgeon; E. J. Horton and S. L. Lord, assistants, and Rev. H. C. Tilton, chaplain. This regiment, like all the others that preceded it, was fully equipped by the State, except arms. It was the design to make up the regiment from the two counties named (Rock and Green); but, it was found that these counties had already honored too many drafts upon their citizens to render it an easy thing to furnish one full regiment more; consequently some aid was extended from other counties, yet Rock county alone furnished 500 for this regiment. The 13th was ordered to Kansas.

From Weston, Mo., this regiment marched to Leavenworth City, where they staid three weeks; thence, they marched to Fort Scott, and afterward to Lawrence. They were subsequently ordered to Columbus, in Kentucky, where they arrived in the early part of June, 1862, and about the middle of August were transferred to Fort Henry, in Tennessee, where they remained in garrison during the year.

The 13th took part in pursuing the rebel general, Forrest, through western Tennessee, driving him towards Corinth, where his command was defeated and dispersed by Gen. Sullivan. In this expedition, the 13th marched 120 miles, and returned to Fort Henry, Jan. 1, 1863. During the month, they were employed on the river between Fort Henry and Hamburg Landing, Tenn., in guarding steamers laden with stores and supplies. On the 3d of February, in the afternoon, they learned that Fort Donelson was attacked, and that a severe fight was going on. In half an hour, the regiment was on the road to re-enforce the 83d Illinois at that important point. After driving the enemy's skirmishers five miles, they arrived in the vicinity of the fort at 10 in the evening, with the loss of one man on the march. Meanwhile the garrison, assisted by the gunboats, had repulsed the enemy with severe loss, and gained a victory at Fort Donelson on the 3d of March, holding the extreme right and front of the Army of the Cumberland.

During the spring and summer, they were in detachments, scouting and scouring the surrounding country, taking many prisoners. Participating in the forward movement of the Army of the Cumberland, they left Fort Donelson August 27, and by way of Columbia, Tenn., arrived at Stevenson, Ala., a distance of 260 miles, on September 14. Col. William P. Lyon was placed in command of the post and the whole body of troops stationed there. The regiment joined the brigade to which it belonged, at Nashville, in the latter part of October, and went into winter quarters at Edgefield, where it was employed in picket and guard duty until February, 1864, when, more than three-fourths of the men having re-enlisted, the regiment proceeded to Wisconsin on veteran furlough.

The 13th regiment arrived at Janesville, Wis., on the 18th of January, 1864, and was warmly welcomed and hospitably entertained by the people of the city, and from the adjacent country, who had assembled to greet them. The regiment re-assembled at Camp Utley, Racine, on the expiration of their furlough, and proceeded to Nashville on the 31st of March, encamping at Edgefield, engaged in guarding trains from Louisville to Chattanooga. Here they were assigned to 1st brigade, fourth division, and designed to operate against Atlanta; but their destination was changed, and the brigade assigned the duty of guarding the Tennessee river between Stevenson and Decatur. On the 4th of June, they marched to Claysville, Ala., and erected earthworks and, while; here, they made frequent excursions across the river, capturing prisoners and seizing confederate stores, with several skirmishes with guerillas and rebel outposts. From this place they proceeded to Woodville, and thence to Huntsville, where Col. Lyon was placed in command of all troops and railroad defenses from Huntsville to Stevenson, a distance of sixty miles.

During most of the summer, and into September, much sickness prevailed in the regiment; and, on October 1, the balance of the regiment proceeded to Martinsville, and returned to Huntsville, and thence to Decatur.

One hundred and sixty of the non-veterans, including the lieutenant-colonel and several officers, were mustered out on the expiration of their term of office. On the 23d of November they proceeded to New Market, where they dispersed the 4th Alabama Cavalry, destroying their camps and provisions, and killing and wounding thirteen. The 13th remained at Stevenson until Hood's defeat at Nashville, when they returned to Huntsville, resuming duty on the rail road, repairing and rebuilding defenses. On the 31st of December, company G, stationed at Paint Rock Bridge, was suddenly assailed by about 400 rebels; and Lieut. Wagoner and thirty-five men were captured, and two were severely wounded.

The 13th regiment, on the 20th of March, were assigned to the 2d brigade; and Col. Lyon resumed the command. They proceeded by rail to Knoxville, in east Tennessee, on their way to Virginia; thence they marched by way of New Market and Bull's Gap, to Jonesborough. On the 20th of April they received news of Lee's surrender, and President Lincoln's assassination. The corps were ordered back to Nashville; and on the 20th the regiment left Jonesborough, and proceeded to that city by way of Chattanooga, arriving on the 22d.

Here those men whose terms expired on the 5th of October were discharged; and a part of the 24th Wisconsin was assigned to the 13th to complete their term of service. On the 16th of June the 13th proceeded, by way of the Tennessee, Ohio and Mississippi rivers, to New Orleans and to Chalmette. In July the regiment embarked for Texas, and arrived at Indianola on the 14th, from which place they went to Green Lake. They remained in this camp until September 11, having suffered much from sickness produced by the heat of the climate and the lack of a vegetable diet. Many died here who had gone through the whole war without being sick. On the 11th the brigade started on a march of 145 miles to San Antonio, arriving on the 24th of September, and went into camp, where they remained until orders came, in November, to muster out the regiment, to proceed to Madison and to be discharged from service. Col. Lyon's term of service having expired, he left for Wisconsin on the 10th of September; and the command devolved on Major Noyes. On the 27th of November the regiment began its march to Indianola, 160 miles, and from there embarked for New Orleans, which place they reached on the 13th of December, steamed up the Mississippi, reached Madison on the 23d, and were discharged from service on the 26th of December, 1865.

FOURTEENTH AND FIFTEENTH
WISCONSIN REGIMENTS.

The 14th regiment was organized and called into Camp Wood at Fond du Lac, during November, 1861,—David E. Wood, colonel. The 15th regiment (Scandinavian) was, on the 15th of December of that year, in course of organization at Camp Randall,—Hans Heg, colonel. The 14th was in the battle of Shiloh, and suffered severely; the 15th were engaged in the conflict of Perryville. The former were afterward in the assault on Vicksburg. More than two-thirds of the regiment re-enlisted Dec. 11, 1863. The 15th fought in the battle of Stone River and took an active part in the Chickamauga campaign. They were assigned to the Army of the Cumberland in October, 1863.

The 14th came home on veteran furlough in January, 1864. They afterward participated in the Red river expedition, and fought in the engagements at Cloutersville, Marksville and Yellow Bayou; also in the battles of Tupelo and Nashville. In 1865, they took part in the operations against Mobile, and were mustered out of the service in October of that year. The 15th regiment took part in a severe engagement against Wheeler's cavalry at Charleston, Tenn., in January, 1864; they also fought at Resaca in May following, and did gallant work at Dallas soon after. On the 23d of June they participated in the assault on Kennesaw Mountain, engaging afterward in the siege of Atlanta. Their last engagement was at Jonesborough, Sept. 1, 1864. Three companies of the regiment were mustered out in December and the remainder in January and February, 1865.

SIXTEENTH WISCONSIN REGIMENT.

The 16th regiment was organized, and ordered into camp at Madison early in November; Benjamin Allen,—colonel. The field and staff officers were, Cassius Fairchild, lieutenant-colonel; Thomas Reynolds, major; George Sabin, adjutant; J. E. Jones, quartermaster; G. W. Eastman, surgeon; I. H. Rogers and Ira A. Torrey, assistants. The companies were filled up from the counties of Waukesha, Ozaukee, Waushara, Green Lake, Adams, Chippewa, Dodge, Dane and Lafayette.

The regiment was nearly full on the 26th of December, and was afterward fully equipped by the State, as were also the other regiments. The numerical strength of the 16th at the above date was about 900.

This regiment, one of the largest that left Wisconsin, had its organization completed about the middle of February, 1862, and left Camp Randall on the 13th day of March, under orders for St. Louis. Here they remained but one day, embarking on the 15th for Fort Henry, Tenn., to join Gen. Grant's command. Previous to their arrival, Gen. Grant had moved his command to Savannah, at which place the regiment joined him, on the 20th of March.

They took part in the battle of Shiloh, on the 6th and 7th of April. They were posted as the advance guard of the army, in which position they exchanged the first shot with the enemy, and afterwards nobly did their duty during that terrible first day's battle. Capt. Saxe was killed at the first fire; and Capt. Pease received a mortal wound, from the effects of which he died on the 22d of April. Col. Allen, Lieut-Col. Fairchild, and Captains Train and Wheeler were wounded. The total loss in killed and wounded at this battle was 245. In no action of Wisconsin regiments had more bravery and determined resistance been shown than in the action of this regiment in that memorable contest. The coolness and intrepidity of the field-officers—in connection with whom should be mentioned Adj. Sabin, and in which they were nobly supported by the whole regiment—has already become a prominent item in the history of this war. The many attempts of the enemy to entrap the regiment on the morning of the 6th instant were most gallantly repulsed, and, by the coolness of the colonel, most ingeniously thwarted.

They participated in the siege of Corinth under command of Gen. Halleck, and, after its occupation by our troops, were stationed in the vicinity during the summer, and took part in the battle of Corinth on the 3d and 4th of October, where their loss was thirty-five in killed and wounded.

After their return from the pursuit of the enemy which followed this battle, they were stationed for a short time at Grand Junction, from which place they marched, on the 28th of November, in the direction of Holly Springs. On the 30th they were engaged in the battle in front of the rebel stronghold on the Tallahatchie, which resulted in the surrender of the enemy's fortifications at that place, which were entered by our troops on the 1st of December. The regiment at this date numbered 499. Having become so reduced, it was deemed advisable by the commanding general to consolidate the ten companies into five, which was done. Col. Allen returned to Wisconsin, where, assisted by his surplus line officers, he recruited five additional companies from among the drafted men in camps of rendezvous. At the close of 1862, the regiment was near Grand Junction, Tenn.

The 16th regiment left Moscow, Tenn., on the 10th of January, 1863, and engaged on duty on the Memphis & Charleston Railroad; was subsequently transferred to Lake Providence, and took part in cutting a canal to the lake, where they remained until about August 1, at which time they moved down the river to Vicksburg, and, on the 28th of September, marched to Red Bone Church, twelve miles from Vicksburg. Here Lieut-Col. Fairchild was placed in command. They remained until February, 1864, when they moved into the fortifications at Vicksburg, and acted as a part of the garrison. On the 4th of March they were joined by three companies which had been recruited in Wisconsin.

The old companies re-enlisted and on the 6th left Vicksburg for Wisconsin, on veteran furlough, arriving at Madison on the 16th, where they were publicly welcomed by the State officers and members of the legislature. After their thirty days' respite from military matters, they rendezvoused at Camp Randall on April 18, and reached Cairo on the 22d.

A number of changes in the regiment now took place, Lieut-Col. Cassius Fairchild being promoted colonel. On the 4th of May, it being attached to the 1st brigade, 3d division, left Cairo and proceeded by transports to Clifton, Tenn. Taking up their line of march to join Sherman's army, they proceeded by way of Huntsville, Warrenton, Ala., and Rome, Ga., and reached Ackworth on the 8th of June, after a march of 320 miles. Here they took position and began their advance southward. The enemy were first encountered on the 15th, near Kenesaw Mountain. The regiment took part in the movements in that vicinity, including Bald Bill, driving the rebels out of and beyond their intrenchments. The 12th and 16th regiments were inseparably connected in the bloody fight of the 22d of July, both regiments exhibiting the greatest valor and bravery. Thence they proceeded towards Atlanta, and took part in destroying the railroad from that place to Jonesborough. They took part in the skirmish near that place, and also at Lovejoy. The casualties from June 9 to Sept. 9, 1864, of the 16th were killed, thirty-eight; wounded, seventy-two. The regiment remained at Atlanta until October 3, and participated in the Savannah campaign. From Savannah they went to Goldsborough, and thence to Raleigh, where the rebel general, Johnson, surrendered on the 26th of April, 1865.

The march homeward was by way of Richmond and Washington City, where the regiment took part in the grand reviews. Proceeding from thence on the 7th of June, they were ordered to Louisville, Ky., reaching there on the 12th of July, and going into camp, when they were mustered out, and on the 14th took the cars for Wisconsin, reaching Madison on July 16, where they were publicly received by the State officers. They were paid off on the 19th of August, and the regiment was disbanded. Col. Fairchild was brevetted brigadier-general for meritorious services in the war.

The regiment arrived at St. Louis on the evening of the 31st of March, 1862, and next day were ordered to proceed up the Tennessee river to Pittsburg Landing. Arriving at the landing about noon of Saturday, April 5, they were assigned to the command of Gen. Prentiss, which was then in the extreme advance, about four miles on the Corinth road.

No sooner had the 18th Wisconsin reached its position on the Corinth road, under Gen. Prentiss, than they found themselves confronted by the enemy. In brief, they had a position of extreme danger, as the enemy were marching in force against the Union army, and early on Sunday, the day after the arrival of the regiment, the battle of Pittsburg Landing began. The result is far more than a "twice told tale." Col. James A. Alban was shot through the body, and Major J. W. Crain was killed with eight wounds on his person. Lieut-Col. Samuel W. Beall and acting adjutant Colman were both severely wounded, and Capt. John H. Compton, company G, was killed.

Capt. Gabriel Bouck, of the 2d Wisconsin, succeeded to the colonelcy of the 18th Wisconsin, and the regiment was assigned to the second brigade, commanded by Col. Oliver. In the vicinity of Corinth, Col. Bouck, early in October, 1862, was attacked by an overwhelming force of the enemy, but the 18th escaped, though with some loss. Company C had privates Robert E. Graham and William Downie wounded. The 18th left Corinth on the 2d of November.

In May, 1863, the 18th regiment had been assigned to the first brigade, commanded by Col. Sanborn, in Gen. Crocker's division, of the 17th army corps. At the battle of Champion Hills, private Bent Markison was wounded. The regiment acted as sharpshooters in the assault of the 22d of May, at Vicksburg, to hold a position in front of a rebel fort, and cover the advance of the assaulting column. In this movement company C met with no casualty.

On the 4th of January, 1864, Col. Bouck resigned. Lieut-Col. Beall had resigned the previous August. The regiment was mustered out of service at Louisville, July 18, 1865, and reached Madison on the 29th, where they were publicly received and disbanded,

TWENTIETH AND TWENTY-FIRST WISCONSIN REGIMENTS.

The 20th regiment was recruited during the months of June and July, 1862. On the 30th of August, they left Camp Randall for St. Louis, under command of Col. Bertie Pinkney. They fought bravely at Prairie Grove, Ark., in December following. They were at Vicksburg at the time of its capitulation. Afterwards, they proceeded to Brownsville and were on duty at Fort Brown until it was evacuated July 28, 1864. They marched with the land forces attached to the expedition against Mobile, landing on the 10th of August, 1864, at Mobile Point. They took part in the stirring events which followed in the vicinity. Mobile surrendered April 12, 1865. They arrived at Madison, July 30, and were paid off and disbanded on the 9th of August.

The 21st regiment—Col. Benjamin J. Sweet—was organized during the months of July and August, 1862. They left Camp Bragg for Cincinnati, on the 11th of September following,—taking part in the battle of Perryville on the 8th of October. At the close of 1862, they were near Nashville, Tenn., in the third division of the Army of the Cumberland.

The regiment, on the 26th of June, 1863, drove the enemy from a strong position at Hoover's Gap, and in September were in the battle of Chickamauga,—suffering severely. They remained upon Lookout Mountain until May 2, 1864, when they marched to join the advance on Atlanta. They were in the battles of Resaca, Dallas and Kenesaw Mountain and in other engagements during that campaign, and finally marched with Sherman "to the sea." They were discharged at Milwaukee, June 17, 1865.

TWENTY-SECOND WISCONSIN REGIMENT.

The 22d regiment (Col. William L. Utley) was made up almost exclusively of men from the counties of Racine, Rock, Green and Walworth. Col. Utley had been for many years prominent in military matters of the State, and twice occupied the position of adjutant-general. The task of organizing the first volunteer regiments of the State, in the year 1861, devolved upon him. In this work, new to Wisconsin, and without precedent or experience, his military knowledge and energy contributed largely to the efficiency and fame of Wisconsin soldiers.

The regiment was ordered to Cincinnati, and left Racine on the 16th of September, arriving at Cincinnati on the 18th. They were encamped in Kentucky, about five miles southwest of the city, until the last of November, when they removed to Nicholasville, below Lexington. On the 12th of December, 1862, they were at Danville, Ky., from which place they proceeded in various directions through the surrounding country, to meet and foil the movements of the enemy. The order for the return of such fugitives from labor, as came into the camp, was repugnant to the feelings and principles of Col. Utley, and his men. In response to such an order, he utterly refused to be instrumental in returning a colored man to the man claiming to be his master. At one time, the colonel was indicted by a Kentucky court, and the sheriff was ordered to arrest him. The attempt was not made, however; and the regiment was allowed to depart from Kentucky without any disturbance. They left Danville on January 26, 1863, arrived at Louisville on the 30th; and reached Nashville February 7; from thence to Franklin, and on the 3d of March, were ordered to make a reconnaissance toward Spring Hill, where an engagement took place at a place known as Thompson's Station, in which the regiment was badly defeated. Three hundred and sixty-three men went out with this expedition, of which about 150 escaped, and the rest were killed, wounded or taken prisoners; Col. Utley and eleven commissioned officers among them.

On the 8th of March, the remainder of the regiment (about 500 men), under Lieut-Col. Bloodgood, was ordered to Brentwood Station. On the 25th, while on the way to assist a Union force two miles south, they were attacked by overpowering numbers, and completely surrounded by the enemy, under Gen. Forrest. Finding that resistance was useless, Lieut-Col. Bloodgood surrendered his whole command.

The officers and men captured in these two engagements were sent to southern prisons. The enlisted men were soon exchanged; and the officers who had been sent to Libby prison were exchanged on the 5th of May. It has since been ascertained that the rebels had a force of over 12,000 at Thompson's Station, who surrounded and captured Coburn's forces.

After the release of the 22d, a rendezvous was established at St. Louis, where the regiment was re-organized, and newly equipped, and on the 12th of June returned to the field. Proceeding to Nashville, arriving thereon the 15th, they were sent to Franklin, from whence, on the 3d of July, they proceeded to Murfreesboro, and went into camp within the fortifications. A detachment was sent in December to near Tullahoma. Here they remained in the performance of provost and guard duty until February, 1864.

The regiment moved from Nashville in April, 1864, camping for a time in Lookout valley and proceeded to Dalton, through Snake Creek Gap, and arrived in front of Resaca on the 13th, forming in line of battle; in which battle the 3d; 26th and 22d Wisconsin regiments took an active and conspicuous part. The 22d lost heavily, many of the men being killed in the enemy's works. This was their first battle, and they covered themselves with honor. The casualties were, twenty-four killed and forty-nine wounded. Following up the enemy, on the 25th of May he was found near Dallas, where an engagement took place; the regiment losing six killed and thirteen wounded. The position was fortified and held until June 1, when the brigade accompanied the movement of the twentieth corps to the left, and took position in front of the enemy's lines at Pine Knob and Lost Mountain. Here they took in the operations of the corps, and had ten killed and twenty-three wounded. On the 2d of July the enemy left their works. Col. Utley resigned, and was succeeded by Lieut.-Col. Bloodgood. The regiment also took part in the battle of Peach Tree Creek, and had eleven killed and thirty-three wounded. They then took position before Atlanta; and the movements of Gen. Sherman caused Gen Hood to abandon that city, destroying property to the value of $2,000,000. The 22d and 26th Wisconsin were among the first to enter the city and take possession.

The regiment encamped near Atlanta, and were employed as train guard most of the way to Savannah. They entered that city with the rest of the army, and continued their march to Bentonville, where the enemy was driven before them. They were also at Averysboro on the 19th, and assisted in driving the enemy from that point, and proceeded on their way to Raleigh. The subsequent history of the closing services of Sherman's grand army has been given in the narratives of other regiments. After the surrender of Gen. Johnston, the corps proceeded to Richmond, thence to Washington, until June 12, when they were mustered out and left for home, arriving at Milwaukee, where they were paid off and disbanded.

Willis, Thomas Woodle and Levi S. Woodling.

TWENTY-THIRD WISCONSIN REGIMENT.

The 23d regiment (Col. Joshua J. Guppy) was composed principally of Dane and Columbia county men. Col. Guppy is a well-known resident of Portage City. He was lieutenant colonel of the 10th regiment, and had the advantage of a military education and of one year's service in the field. Lieut.-Col. Jussen was a member of the State legislature of 1861 and 1862. The regiment was, for the time it had been in camp, the best drilled of any from the State.

They left Camp Randall, en route for Cincinnati, on the 18th of September, and established their headquarters at Camp Bates, in Kentucky, about five miles above the city, on the Ohio river. They were subsequently moved near Paris, in Kentucky. Here they remained until the last of October, when they marched to Nicholasville. Thence they marched to Louisville, arriving on the 15th of November; having accomplished the march of eighty-five miles in four days. At Louisville they embarked, on the 18th of November, under orders for Memphis, at which place they arrived on the 27th, where they were at the close of 1862, in the 1st brigade, first division, Brig.-Gen. A. J. Smith commanding, and were unattached to any army.

Capt. Frost, company K, died on December 18, in hospital at Memphis. The regiment was at Milliken's Bend Jan. 1, 1863. On the 10th of the month they disembarked within three miles of Arkansas Post, on the Arkansas river. While moving forward to obtain position they were assailed by a destructive enfilading fire from the enemy's rifle-pits and artillery, rendering necessary a change of front. This having been effected, three companies were employed as skirmishers, and captured several blockhouses; while the balance of the regiment attacked and carried the rifle pits. After an engagement of about three hours, the post, with its garrison, unconditionally surrendered. In this engagement the 23d sustained a loss of six killed and thirty one wounded. January 15, the regiment again embarked, and arrived at Young's Point, La., where they encamped. In this unhealthy location the regiments suffered severely from the effects of malaria and exposure, and it was until the middle of February before the regiment could muster 250 men fit for duty. From the middle of February to the 8th of March, they were engaged in several minor excursions against the enemy at Greenville, Miss., and at Cypress Bend, Ark., where they had a severe fight, in which the 23d succeeded in capturing several prisoners and pieces of artillery. After a foraging expedition to Princeton, Miss., they ascended the river to Milliken's Bend, where the health of the regiment greatly improved. Following the thirteenth army corps in its march to the rear of Vicksburg, they proceeded to Hard Times landing, below Grand Gulf. Crossing the river to Bruinsburg, the division commenced the march toward Vicksburg, reaching the battle ground of Port Gibson May 1. In the action at this place the regiment, with the brigade, captured twenty prisoners, and on the day following took the advance, and pushing forward, was the first of our army to enter the village of Port Gibson. After several days' skirmishing, the regiment joined the movement on Raymond, and on the 16th took part in the battle of Champion Hills. It took the advance, and forced back the enemy's skirmish line to the main body, a distance of two miles; and in the battles of the 20th and 22d the regiment and brigade did excellent service. The 22d lost, in these engagements, seventeen killed and thirty-six wounded.

The regiment was subsequently occupied in siege duty until the final surrender of Vicksburg, July 4. Up to the 5th of June the regiment had been commanded by Col. Guppy, when continued ill health compelled him to turn over his command to Lieut.-Col. Vilas, who had the charge of the regiment during the subsequent progress of the siege of Vicksburg, and for nearly two months after the surrender. On the 10th of July the regiment took position before Jackson, Miss., and were there until after the capture of that place. They returned to Vicksburg July 21, and encamped until August 24, when the regiment proceeded down the river to New Orleans, and from thence to Berwick City. On the 25th of August Col. Vilas resigned, and Major Hill was appointed lieutenant-colonel. On the 7th of October the regiment took part in the expedition to southwestern Louisiana, passing through Centreville, New Iberia and Vermillion, at which place they remained until the 21st. Passing through Opelousas to Barr's landing, they moved, November 1, to Bayou Borbeaux, where, on the 3d, the enemy made a fierce assault. In this engagement they lost seven killed and thirty-eight wounded, and eighty-six taken prisoners. After the battle, the regiment, on the 3d of November, retired to Carrion Crow Bayou, and thence proceeded to New Iberia, which it reached on the 8th, and the regiment was assigned provost duty; Col. Hill being placed in command of the post of New Iberia. The regiment subsequently went to Texas, and embarked at Algiers for Matagorda, arriving on the 29th off De Crow's Point, where they landed and went into camp, Jan. 1, 1864.

The regiment were at Matagorda in January, 1864, from which place they returned to Louisiana, and to Berwick City. They took a part in Banks' Red River expedition, of which we have given an account in our record of other regiments. The 23d participated in all the movements and engagements of the expedition. Making long marches, and descending the Mississippi, they landed, on the 24th of April, at Baton Rouge, where they encamped. From the 8th to 26th of July, the regiment was encamped at Algiers, opposite New Orleans. Here they engaged in skirmish work, making reconnoissance's of the surrounding country, also making an expedition, on the 3d of October, to Bayou Sara, and marching sixteen miles, to Jackson, La., and returning the next day in transports. On the 5th of October, they entered camp at Morganzia, and reached Helena, November 8, and went into camp there.

The regiment remained at Helena, Ark., until the 23d of February, 1865, at which date they were placed on transports, and proceeded south, reaching New Orleans on the 27th, and encamped at Algiers. On the 1st of March they moved to Hickox's Landing, on Lake Pontchartrain, to unite with the forces designed for the reduction of Mobile. They reached

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

Spanish Fort on the 27th of March, and took position with the brigade, and on the 30th were ordered on an expedition toward Blakely. In the final assault, they acted as support to the attacking column. After the capture of that place, they crossed the bay, and encamped five miles below Mobile. On the 4th of July the 23d was mustered out of service, and the next day set out for Wisconsin, arriving at Madison on the 16th. On the 24th they were paid, and formally disbanded.

The only representative Green county had in the 23d regiment, was an honored one—Rev. Christian E. Weinch, chaplain. He was from Monroe. He joined the regiment in October, 1862, and died at Young's Point, La., Feb. 15, 1863.

TWENTY-FIFTH WISCONSIN REGIMENT.

This regiment was organized at Camp Solomon, La Crosse, in September, 1862, and mustered into the United States service on the 14th of that month, and was ordered to report to Gen. Pope, at St. Paul, to aid in suppressing the Indian difficulties in the State of Minnesota. They left the State on the 15th, with the following roster:

Colonel—Milton Montgomery.

Arriving at St. Paul on the 20th of September, 1862, the regiment was divided, five companies under Lieut.-Col. Nasmith, being sent to Sauk Center, Painesville and Acton; the remainder, under the command of Col. Montgomery, was sent to Leavenworth, Fairmount, Winnebago City and New Ulm, where regimental headquarters were established.

After service in Minnesota, the regiment returned to Wisconsin, reaching Camp Randall on the 18th of December, 1862. On the 17th of February, 1863, the regiment left, under orders to report at Cairo, Ill., where they arrived on the 19th, and moved next day to Columbus, Ky., and encamped. Here the regiment was attached to the sixteenth army corps. From this time until August, which month found the regiment at Helena, they were variously employed. Lieut.-Col. Samuel J. Nasmith died of disease contracted in the service on the 17th of August, and Major Rusk was appointed lieutenant-colonel in his place. The regiment remained at Helena until the 1st of February, 1864, when they moved down the river to Vicksburg.

The regiment reached Chattanooga May 5, and immediately proceeded to join the forces of Gen. Sherman. The sixteenth corps formed part of the "Army of the Tennessee" under Gen. McPherson. On the 9th of the month they took part in a movement against Resaca, which was renewed on the 14th. In attacking the enemy at Peach Orchard on the 15th of June, Lieut.-Col. Rusk was wounded in the right arm.

On the 19th of July the sixteenth army corps was at Decatur. About noon on the 22d three regiments commanded by Col. Sprague were attacked by two divisions of Wheeler's dismounted cavalry. Col. Montgomery, with a force composed of companies B, E, F and I, of the 25th Wisconsin, and four companies of the 63d Ohio, was ordered out to ascertain the position of the enemy. They advanced about three-fourths of a mile up a road, on the west of which was a narrow, but impassable swamp, and on the other a deep, miry ditch. The enemy were met about half a mile from the swamp, by the skirmishers, consisting of company F and an Ohio company, under command of Lieut.-Col. Rusk. The enemy opened a severe fire and the skirmishers were driven down the road back to the reserve, which, under Col. Montgomery, was in position to the left of the road.

The enemy advancing in strong force, Col. Montgomery moved the reserve by the left flank, and in attempting to cross the ditch to reach the battery in the rear, his horse sank in the miry ground, and he was shot by the enemy and captured. Lieut.-Col. Rusk, with the skirmishers, held the enemy in check for a short time on the road, but were soon obliged to retire. In attempting to do this Lieut.-Col. Rusk was surrounded by six or eight rebels, who came at him with bayonets at a charge. One of them made a dash at him and caught his sword, which hung in its scabbard by his side, the squad crying out for the "Yankee" to surrender. The lieutenant-colonel made a characteristic reply and very coolly pressed his revolver to the side of the head of the rebel and gave him its contents. In falling, the fellow still held to the sword, which broke from its fastening. Putting spurs to his horse, the lieutenant-colonel dashed down the road, under the fire of the rebels, to which he replied with his revolver and succeeded in rejoining his regiment near the battery in the rear, not, however, until he had his horse shot from under him.

On November 15th, 1864, the seventeenth army corps left Atlanta on the grand march to the sea, the 21st acting as a train guard, as far as Monticello, when they rejoined their brigade. At Beaufort, Col. Montgomery, who had been exchanged, returned to the army and was placed in command of the brigade.

On the Salkahatchie river, on the 20th of January, 1865, the 25th encountered the enemy, drove in his pickets and dislodged a small force behind temporary breastworks. A shell from the enemy grazed the head of the horse of Lieut.-Col. Rusk, knocking the animal down, and the colonel was dismounted, the orderly in the rear having his head carried away by the missile. The regiment was mustered out of the service on the 7th of June and set out for home, arriving at Madison on the 11th of that month, where they were soon paid off and disbanded.

The only person from Green county known to have been in the 25th regiment, was David G. Gilliss, of Albany.

TWENTY-SEVENTH AND THIRTIETH WISCONSIN REGIMENTS.

The 27th regiment was composed of six companies and was commanded by Col. Conrad Krez. The organization was completed in 1862, but the regiment was not mustered into the service until April 7, 1863. After leaving the State, it did garrison duty for a while at Columbus, Ky. They subsequently moved to Memphis and then to Vicksburg. After the latter place capitulated, they moved to Helena, Ark.; and were present at the capture of Little Rock. On the 23d of March, 1864, they accompanied the march of Gen. Steele to co-operate with Gen. Banks in the Red River expedition. After a number of marches and doing duty in a number of places, the regiment was detailed to guard duty on the Little Rock & Memphis Railroad and was thus engaged until Feb. 7, 1865.

On the 20th of February, 1865, the regiment arrived in Mobile bay. They were engaged in the vicinity in various duties until the termination of the siege. After being employed in the State actively until the 1st of June, they proceeded to Texas. They were mustered out of the service at Brownsville and set out on their return home on the 29th of that month. They arrived in Madison on the 17th of September, where the regiment was shortly after paid off and disbanded.

The 13th regiment—Col. Daniel J. Dill—was composed of six companies from St. Croix and Chippewa valleys, two from Waushara county and two from the county of Iowa. During 1862, the regiment was retained in the State helping on the draft. It was subsequently broken up into detachments, and these were engaged in various duties outside the State. The regiment was finally mustered out of the service on the 20th of September, 1865, arriving at Madison on the 25th, where they were disbanded.

AND THIRTIETH REGIMENTS FROM GREEN COUNTY.

Twenty-seventh.—Kittle N. Jorde and Joseph Carter.

Thirtieth.—Francis R. Drake, Emerson C. Drake, John Smith and Thomas Cunningham.

THIRTY-FIRST WISCONSIN REGIMENT.

This regiment (Col. Isaac E. Messmore) was left in 1862, by the order of the war department prohibiting recruiting, with less than the minimum. Six companies from Iowa, Lafayette and Crawford counties, were ordered into camp at Prairie Du Chien; and special permission, before alluded to, was obtained to continue recruiting for this regiment. At the close of the year, it was much above the minimum strength, and of good material. On the 14th of November, it was removed from Prairie Du Chien, in charge of the camp of rendezvous for drafted men at Racine, where it remained, awaiting orders to join the army in the field.

The regiment left the State for service in the field on the 1st of March, 1863, under orders to report at Columbus, Ky. Proceeding by way of Cairo, Ill., they arrived at Columbus on the 3d, and went into camp at Fort Halleck. Here the regiment was stationed, and was engaged in the performance of garrison duty, until September 24, when it left Columbus, with orders to report at Louisville, Ky., which place it reached on the 27th. On the 5th of October, it marched to La Vergue, Tenn., and guarded the road until the 25th, when it marched to Murfreesboro. Three companies were detached and stationed at a point where the railroad passed Stone River. Here they threw up fortifications, and guarded this important bridge during the winter.

Three companies of the 31st regiment were engaged in the winter of 1863—64 guarding the bridge at Stone River. On the 2d of April, they rejoined the regiment at Murfreesboro, and were engaged during the month along the road between that place and Normandy, Tenn., doing outpost duty. On the 6th of July, they were ordered to Nashville, and on their arrival had quarters assigned them west of the Nashville & Chattanooga Railroad. From Nashville, they proceeded by rail for Marietta, Ga., which they reached on the 19th. While on the road, near Kingston, one of the trains ran off the track, wounding two officers, killing one man and severely wounding ten others. On the 22d of July, the regiment moved with the army upon Atlanta, and were placed in the front line; and here they lay under fire until August 25, when they took part in the movement of the corps. They then returned to the railroad bridge across the Chattahoochee, while the rest of the army swung around to Jonesboro.

On the 4th of September, the skirmishers of the 31st were among the first to enter the city. The next day, the regiment moved within the fortifications, and was assigned quarters in the city. In addition to other duties devolving upon troops in an enemy's country, the regiment were engaged in protecting forage-trains, and were very successful furnishing grain for the famishing horses and mules of the army. The twentieth army corps broke camp on the 15th of November, and filed out of the burning city, which prove to be the march to the sea. The fatigues and dangers to which all were exposed were endured by the 31st during the march through Georgia. They took part in an engagement ten miles from Savannah, capturing the works and the camp of the enemy; having one man killed, and three wounded. The regiment took part in the siege of Savannah, and after its capture was assigned quarters within the fortifications. Here they remained until the 18th of January, 1865.

On that day the regiment crossed the Savannah river, and rejoined its division at Parisburg, S. C., twenty-five miles distant from Savannah. Owing to rains, they were water-bound until the 28th. The regiment marched with the army through South Carolina, doing its share in burning and destroying, tearing up railroads, and similar duties, to drive back the enemy's rear guard. On the 16th of March they took position in the front, at the battle of Averysboro, and were under fire until night. They lost two men killed, and ten wounded. On the 19th, the 31st was at the battle of Bentonville, in which ten were killed, and forty-two wounded. The regiment reached Goldsboro on the 24th of March, having been on the tramp sixty-five days, twenty-three of which the rain fell without cessation, many of them barefoot, and often hungry for twenty-four hours. On the 10th of April the army was again in motion, in the direction of Raleigh, when they heard of Johnston's surrender to Gen. Sherman. The regiment went into camp at Raleigh. On the 30th of April the twentieth army corps started for Washington, passing through Richmond, Va., on the 11th, and arrived at Alexandria, May 20. On the 24th they took part in the grand review at Washington. On the 2d of June they were ordered to Louisville, where quarters were assigned to them. Six companies were mustered out, to date from June 20, and left for Madison June 21. They were paid off, and went to their homes July 8, 1865. The remaining companies remained in camp until July 8, and were mustered out, reaching Madison on the 12th, and were paid off and discharged July 20, 1865.

THIRTY-THIRD, THIRTY-FOURTH AND THIRTY-FIFTH WISCONSIN REGIMENTS.

The 33d regiment.—Col. Jonathan B. Moore—was mustered into the service in the beginning of October, 1862, and left Camp Utley, Racine, for Cairo, on the 11th of November following. In December they were in Tallahatchie. They were afterward at Vicksburg, where they remained until the city surrendered. They took part in the second attack on Jackson. On the 9th of March, 1863, they joined the Red River expedition. After a varied experience in different sections, they finally reached Nashville, on the 30th of October, 1864, taking part in the battle, when the enemy were driven across the Tennessee. They were afterwards at Mobile and remained there until the city fell into the hands of the Union forces. They were mustered out at Vicksburg, July 8, 1865; reached Madison, August 15 and were soon after paid off and disbanded.

The 34th regiment was made up of drafted militia, under Col. Fritz Anneke, and a company of sharp-shooters. The regiment was mustered into service, by companies, for nine months. They left the State Jan. 31, 1863, proceeded to Columbus, Ky., and in August, returned to Camp Washburn, Milwaukee, and were mustered out in September.

The 35th regiment did not complete its muster-in until Feb. 27, 1864. Afterwards, they left the State for Alexandria, La. Failing to procure transportation to their original destination, they proceeded to New Orleans, and received orders to report to Gen. Ullman, at Port Hudson, at which place they disembarked on the 7th of May. At this place they remained until June 26, being engaged in guard and fatigue duty. At that date, they moved up to Morganzia, La., where the regiment was assigned to the 1st brigade, third division, nineteenth army corps. From Morganzia, the regiment proceeded to Port Hudson and St. Charles, Ark., arriving July 24. Here they remained until the 7th of August, engaged in guard-duty and scouting, when they returned to Morganzia. On the 1st of October, they took part in an excursion to Simmsport, in which several skirmishes with the enemy were had. They subsequently returned to Duvall's Bluff, where they remained until the 7th of February, 1865.

From Duvall's Bluff, they moved to Algiers, La. They were afterward near Mobile. Subsequently, they were ordered to Texas. They returned to Wisconsin in the spring of 1866.

THIRTY-SIXTH AND THIRTY-SEVENTH WISCONSIN REGIMENTS.

The 36th regiment—Frank A. Haskell, colonel—was organized at Camp Randall and mustered into the service on the 10th of May, 1864. They reached Washington four days after, and then proceeded down the Potomac to Belle Plaine Landing, and from there proceeded to Spottsylvania by way of Fredericksburg. On the 18th they acted as a reserve in the engagement of that day, and on the 19th joined in the 1st brigade and second division. On the 20th they accompanied Gen. Hancock in his march to North Anna, crossing the Matapony and North Anna. On the 23d they were assigned to the support of a battery. They crossed the stream, and threw up a line of works. Accompanying the movement across the Pamunkey, on May 30, they found the rebels drawn up in line of battle near Totspotomy Creek. At the battle at that place, the 36th suffered severely. During the night, the regiment marched to Cold Harbor; and, on the morning of the 3d, the whole line marched on the enemy's position by brigades, when the regiment again lost severely, and Col. Haskell was killed.

The regiment reached Petersburg on the 15th of June, 1864, and were in the general charge on the enemy's works, where they formed in line of battle and fought nobly. On the 24th, the regiment marched to the enemy's position at Hatcher's Run, and, in the engagement which took place captured a large number of prisoners. They afterward participated in the movement before Petersburg. They joined in the pursuit of Lee, and were present on the 9th of April, 1865, at the surrender of the entire army of that general. The regiment was mustered out on the 12th of July following. They arrived at Madison on the 14th, where they were paid and finally discharged.

The 37th regiment was organized in March, 1864, with only six companies mustered in. They reported at Washington May 1. On the evening of the 12th of June they took part in the general movement of Grant's army across the James river to Petersburg. They took an active part in two engagements, one on the 17th and one on the 18th of that month. They remained in the vicinity actively engaged until the spring campaign (1865) opened.

They, with the 1st brigade, on the 2d of April, marched and formed in front of Fort Sedgwick, from which place they moved for Fort Mahone, one of the enemy's strongest positions, driving them out on the other side, and turning the guns of the fort upon them. Remaining in the neighborhood of Petersburg until the 20th of April, they then started for Washington, where they arrived on the 26th. They reached Madison on the 31st of July, and in August were paid off and disbanded.

THIRTY-EIGHTH WISCONSIN REGIMENT.

The 38th regiment began to organize March, 1864, under the supervision of Col. James Bintliff. Before the regiment could be filled, the government discontinued the payment of bounties, when recruiting fell off, and almost entirely ceased. In consequence of this, only four companies could be organized, which, having been mustered into service, left Camp Randall, Madison, on the 3d of May, 1864, for Washington. Another company was sent forward in July, and other companies in September. Col. Bintliff took command on their arrival before Petersburg, on the 1st of October, thus completing the regiment. On their arrival at Washington, they encamped on Arlington Heights. On the 30th they marched to Alexandria, and embarked for White House, at that time the base of supplies of Gen. Grant's army. On their arrival, they were temporarily consolidated with the 1st Minnesota, and assigned to the provisional brigade of Gen. Abercrombie, and were engaged in escorting supply trains to Cold Harbor. On the 12th they moved to the front line of the works; in the evening commenced Gen. Grant's grand flank movement to the rear of Richmond, arriving on the 16th of June, in front of Petersburg, and moving out under fire to the battlefield. They took an active part in the engagement on the 17th and 18th, in which the regiment had fifteen killed and thirty-five wounded.

They remained in the front lines till the 4th of July, fighting by day and working by night. On that day they returned to the second lines, the battalion being reduced to forty men fit for duty. Here they encamped until the 19th, when they moved to the front, and assisted in repulsing an attack of the enemy. On the 30th of July, when the order was given to advance, after the explosion of the mine, the regiment which was selected to lead the charge faltered. Gen. Hartruff ordered the 38th, scarcely numbering 100, to take the lead. Here they had nine killed, and ten wounded. Subsequently, the battalion was relieved from the front lines, and encamped behind the second line, where it remained until August 6, when they returned to the first line, and were engaged in siege and picket duty until August 19, when they moved towards the Weldon Railroad, and took part with the fifth corps to obtain possession of the medium of supplies to the enemy. In the engagements that followed, the enemy were driven back, and, in the attempt to regain possession of their works, were repulsed with great slaughter. The battalion proceeded to Reams Station, to re-enforce the second corps, and on the 26th fell back to near Yellow Tavern, where they were engaged in ordinary duties until September 26, when they moved toward Poplar Springs Church. in the engagement at that place, they took part, and also near Hatcher's Run. In the latter part of November, they moved opposite to Petersburg, and remained in their rifle-pits, under the heavy fire of the enemy, until the spring campaign opened.

The regiment was in the rifle pits before Richmond in the month of January, 1865. In the assault on Fort Mahone, or "Fort Damnation" as it was nicknamed, they had eight companies engaged. The fort was taken, but the regiment suffered severely. The regiment went in pursuit of the rebel army, capturing many prisoners. On the 6th of June a part of the regiment (one year men) was mustered out, and returned to Wisconsin. The remainder was on duty at the arsenal during the trial and execution of the assassination conspirators. They were mustered out on the 26th of July; and were paid off at Madison and discharged, Aug. 11, 1865.

FORTY-SECOND, FORTY-THIRD, FORTY-FOURTH AND FORTY-FIFTH
WISCONSIN REGIMENTS.

The 42d regiment was organized under the superintendence of Col. Ezra T. Sprague, formerly adjutant of the 8th Infantry, under the call of July 18, 1864, were finally mustered into the United States service on the 7th of September, 1864. From Camp Randall, they proceeded by rail to Cairo, Ill., at which place they arrived on the 22d of September, and engaged in the discharge of post and garrison duty. On the 24th Col. Sprague was assigned to the command of the post, and Lieut-Col. Botkin put in command of the regiment. They were engaged in southern Illinois mainly, though a portion of them were employed at Springfield, in provost duty.

The remainder were detached to points in that part of the State where military surveillance was necessary. The regiment returned on the expiration of their term of service, to Madison, which city they reached June 20, 1865, and were soon after mustered out and disbanded.

The 43d regiment was organized in the latter part of 1864. They left Nashville on the 1st of January, 1865, and moved to Decherd, Tenn., where six companies went into camp and four were detached to guard Elk river bridge. The regiment was mustered out of the service at Nashville, on the 24th of June, and soon after returned to Milwaukee and was disbanded.

The 44th regiment was also organized in the latter part of 1864. They arrived at Nashville, in February, 1865, and were employed in post and guard duty. They afterward went to East-port, Miss., from which place they returned to Nashville. Thence they proceeded to Paducah, Ky., where, on the 28th of August, the regiment were mustered out of the service. They reached Madison on the 2d of September, where they were paid and disbanded.

The 45th, like the two regiments last mentioned, was organized in the latter portion of the year 1864. They proceeded to Nashville, but were mustered out of the service July 17, 1865. They reached Wisconsin on their return, on the 23d of that month, and were shortly after disbanded.

FORTY-NINTH, FIFTIETH, FIFTY-FIRST AND FIFTY-SECOND WISCONSIN REGIMENTS.

The 49th regiment left the State on the 8th of March, 1865, proceeded to St. Louis, were sent to Rolla on the 13th, and were engaged in guard duty and as escort to trains. Here they remained until Aug. 17, 1865, when they returned to St. Louis. Three companies were mustered out November 1, and the balance of the regiment on the 8th, when they returned to Madison, where they were paid and disbanded.

The 50th regiment left Madison by companies in the latter part of March, for St. Louis. From St. Louis they proceeded to Fort Leavenworth, and were ordered to Fort Rice, in Dakota Territory, arriving October 10, where they were stationed up to Feb. 15, 1866. They shortly afterwards were mustered out, and returned to Wisconsin.

The 51st regiment was organized at Milwaukee in the early part of 1865. It proceeded to Warrensburg, Mo., and was employed in guarding the construction of a part of the Pacific Railroad. On the 11th of June the 53d regiment (four companies) was consolidated with the 51st. The regiment returned to Madison on the 5th of August, 1865, where they were mustered out by companies, completing the same on the 30th.

The 52d regiment never was fully recruited. Five companies were mustered into service, and were sent forward by companies to St. Louis, in April, 1865. The battalion was sent to Holden, on the Pacific Railroad, and was employed in guarding workmen on the railroad. It moved to Leavenworth, Kan., in June, where it was assigned to duty. The battalion was mustered out of service on the 28th of July, arrived at Madison on the 2d of August, and was paid and disbanded.

FIRST WISCONSIN CAVALRY REGIMENT.

The 1st cavalry regiment—Col. Edward Daniels—completed its organization in February, 1862, leaving Camp Harvey under orders for St. Louis. They were equipped at Benton barracks. Afterward they moved to Cape Girardeau. At the close of 1862 (after doing duty in various directions), they were at Patterson, Mo. In the early part of 1863, they were stationed at West Plain, Pilot Knob, St. Genevieve and Cape Girardeau. During the summer they were located at various places in Tennessee, marching subsequently into Alabama. On the 14th of January, 1864, they marched to and encamped near Dandridge, and on the 17th they participated in the battle fought there, suffering severely.

During the night they fell back toward Knoxville, through which they passed on the 19th, encamping on the road to Sevierville. On the 21st, camp was moved sixteen miles beyond the latter place, on the Fair Garden road, from which point, having effected a reconnaissance of the surrounding country, they returned on the 25th, with a number of prisoners, to Sevierville. In the engagement near this place, on the 27th, the regiment occupied the extreme left of our line, and sustained but trifling loss.

During the next three days, they marched to various points in the vicinity, going into camp on the 31st at Marysville, where the regiment was stationed as guard until the 9th of February, at which date they moved to Motley's Ford, on the Little Tennessee river. On the 24th they marched to Madisonville, and moving thence on the 10th of March, by way of Calhoun and Athens, encamped on the 12th at Cleveland, where they were joined on the 26th by Lieut.-Col. Torrey, with a large number of recruits from Wisconsin.

The regiment spent the winter of 1864—5 at Waterloo, Ala., where they remained until March 10, when they moved to Chickasaw and took up their line of march for the interior of Alabama. They were at Montgomery April 12, and at West Point, Ga., on the 16th. They were engaged at the capture of Fort Tyler. The last active duties of the regiment were those connected with the capture of Jefferson Davis. From Macon, Ga., the regiment marched to Edgefield Tenn., and were mustered out on the 19th of July, 1865.

SECOND WISCONSIN CAVALRY REGIMENT.

The 2d Wisconsin Cavalry regiment was organized under a special permit from the general government, granted to Hon. C. C. Washburn. Col. Washburn received his commission from Gov. Randall, indorsing the action of the general government, Oct. 10, 1861, and immediately commenced recruiting for his regiment. He formed a camp for rendezvous on the fair grounds at Milwaukee.

This regiment was familiarly known as Washburn's Cavalry. It was engaged in Tennessee, Mississippi, Missouri and Arkansas. The regiment was mustered out of the service on the 15th of November, 1865. They arrived at Madison December 11 of that year—were paid off and disbanded.

THIRD AND FOURTH WISCONSIN CAVALRY REGIMENTS.

The 3d Cavalry—Col. William A. Barstow—left Camp Barstow March 26, 1862—a railroad accident the same night resulting in the instant death of ten men, mortally wounding two and slightly injuring twenty-eight. The regiment was scattered over Kansas until September, when it was concentrated at Fort Scott. Afterwards it participated in the battles of the army of the frontier. On the 13th of October, 1864, the regiment was at Little Rock, Ark. On the 19th of April, 1865, the regiment was re-organized. By the end of September the whole were mustered out of the service. The 4th Cavalry was formed out of the 4th Wisconsin regiment of Infantry—Frederick A. Boardman, colonel. This regiment saw service in Alabama, Mississippi and Texas. They were at Ringgold, in the State last named, in March, 1866, and were not long after mustered out of the service.

FIRST BATTERY—LIGHT ARTILLERY.

The 1st battery of Light Artillery was organized at La Crosse, under the superintendence of Jacob T. Foster. Its organization was perfected at Camp Utley in October, 1861. It left Wisconsin Jan. 23, 1862. During the war this battery saw very active service. They were mustered out at Camp Washburn, Milwaukee, on the 18th of July, 1865. There was but one man in this battery from Green county—Henry Bucher.

FIFTH BATTERY—LIGHT ARTILLERY.

The 5th battery left Camp Utley, Racine, March 15, 1862, for St. Louis. They were afterward employed at New Madrid, and then moved to Hamburg, Tenn. They fought in the battle of Farmington, on the 9th of May. They subsequently were in northern Mississippi and Alabama. The battery left Louisville October 1, with Buell's army. At the end of 1862, they were near Nashville. During the residue of their term of service, they performed much active duty.

FIRST HEAVY ARTILLERY.

In the summer of 1861 company K, Capt. Langworthy, of the 2d Wisconsin regiment, was detached and placed on duty as heavy artillery. The 1st Heavy Artillery regiment was finally fully organized by the combination of twelve companies, numbered from A to M inclusive. These batteries have all interesting, but not all the same, histories, and they were not all mustered out at the same time. Battery A was mustered out on the 18th of August, 1865; battery B on the 30th of the same month; battery C on the 21st of September of that year; and battery D on the same day as battery A. The other eight batteries were mustered out in the previous June.

Battery A did duty in the Washington defenses; battery B did service in Fort Terrill, Murfreesboro and in Fort Clay at Lexington; battery C saw service in Fort Creighton and in Fort Sherman and other places; battery D defended Fort Jackson and Fort Berwick; and the other batteries had positions in the defenses around Washington.

WAR EXTRACTS FROM COUNTY PAPERS.

From the bombardment of Fort Sumter to the death of Abraham Lincoln, there were published in the county papers, many items of interest, relating to the war. These, of course, are in their nature, transitory, but of importance as reflecting the feeling of the people at home, and of the soldiers in the army. They form an every-day record of the hardships and trials of the times that should not be forgotten.

EXTRACTS FROM THE MONROE SENTINEL.

1861—May 22.—Rev. I. A. Swetland delivered a sound and able discourse to the volunteers, on Thursday evening of last week.

He encouraged and sought to inspire that thoughtful courage which can know and weigh the hardships to be endured in camp, in the march, in the field, in exposure to heat, to wet and cold and then resolutely to meet them with an unflinching nerve without murmur or regret. His remarks were listened to with much interest.

Under the plan of organization of the volunteers, the companies, are allowed more men than was first announced. Capt. Flood's company is accepted and is to go with the 3d regiment. They will soon be called into camp. The captain wishes to increase his company to the maximum, or highest aggregate of rank and file. Twenty or twenty-five more able-bodied men can enlist into his company by immediately applying. As the time is short, the applications, we repeat, must be without delay. A good fifer is needed in the company, to complete the band. Any one skilled upon the fife, will be gladly received. We trust the brave young men of Green county will respond to this call. By being a large company, the company will have a greater influence in the regiment. Little Green is eager to send all the men she can.

August 21.—We regret to state that Mr. Bryant is sick and in the hospital at the camp of the 3d regiment. That is undoubtedly the reason why we have had no communication from him during the past two weeks.

August 28.—We learn that Mr. Bryant has received a commission. Our readers will be pleased to read the following announcement which was made in the State Journal at Madison a few days ago: Commission issued to Edwin E. Bryant as 2d Lieutenant of company A, of 3d regiment, Wisconsin Volunteers vice L. H. D. Crane, promoted.

August 28.—O. T. Pinney, of this place, who was in the United States Army for five years, and who was in the Florida and Mexican Wars, has been commissioned by the government of this State, captain of artillery, to raise a company of 150 men for three years or during the war, being the number required to constitute an artillery company as called for by the secretary of war, and by the governor of this State in his proclamation, which we published on the first page of our present issue. We hope that patriotic men in every part of the county will take hold of this matter, and assist in procuring volunteers for the company. We owe it to ourselves to furnish the number of men required for it from this county. We are behind many parts of the State in furnishing volunteers, and there is no good reason why 150 first class men cannot be raised in this county in ten days.

Albany has had an artillery company formed there for two years or more, and we hope that members of that company who have had some experience, will unite with this. Our friends at Brodhead also can assist in obtaining volunteers. Let us have a united effort! Some of our best citizens have already enrolled their names. As soon as forty men are enrolled, they will be sworn into the United States service, and their pay will commence, so that there will be no such vexatious delaying as was experienced when the company of infantry was enlisted here.

There was a large gathering of the citizens of Clarno and Monroe, at Shueyville, on Saturday last, for the purpose of raising a liberty pole and throwing to the breeze the Star Spangled Banner. There was some delay occasioned by the lack of proper tackles to raise so long a pole; but Edmund Hill, of this place and others, by their energy, soon manufactured the necessary appliances and in due time the pole was raised, and amid the cheers from the crowd the emblem of our Nation's liberties was run up. Thomas H. Eaton addressed the meeting at considerable length, and with good effect, upon the duty of the American citizens during the existing crisis, urging a Union of all patriotic men in support of the government. The meeting adjourned in the best possible spirits. Previous to this meeting, all sorts of silly rumors had been circulated in regard to an opposition which it was alleged would be made to raising the flag; and some few, the feeblest of our brethren, believed it. We cannot believe that any man within the bounds of the loyal States, especially in this State, would object to raising the American flag. If there be such a one let him take the consequences of his stupidity, and folly.

From present appearances the ranks of Capt. Pinney's company of artillery will be filled today or tomorrow, and they expected to be ordered to camp the last of this week. We hope now that our friends on the Sugar river valley will unite and raise a company of infantry for the war, and cease dividing themselves into little squads, which can amount to nothing; and we will guarantee that another company will be raised here and be ready for camp as soon as theirs. We challenge them to beat us. Rock county has already raised more than 500 men for the regiment, and if we expect to have any interest in the regiment it is high time we were at work.

September 25.—To-morrow being the day recommended by President Lincoln to be kept as a day of public humiliation, prayer and fasting, to be observed by the people of the United States with religious solemnities and the offering of fervent supplications to Almighty God, for the safety and welfare of the States, His blessing on their arms, and a speedy restoration of peace, there will be religious services in the morning at 10:30 o'clock at the M. E. Church in this place, sermon by Rev. E. Morris, and in the evening at 7 o'clock in the Congregational chapel, sermon by Rev. M. Wierick. All the people are invited to attend.

October 23.—The honored dead—A letter from Mr. Bryant, received too late for publication in this issue, states that at the battle of Harper's Ferry of our Green county men Stewart Mosher and Henry Raymond were killed and William Foster and George Gay were wounded. From another source we understand that Edgar Ross was wounded in the foot and taken prisoner. Mr. Bryant was in the engagement and will furnish for our next issue a full and circumstantial account of it. He says that Lieut. O'Brien has proved himself to be a hero of the first water.

On Friday last the company of Switzers which is organizing at New Glarus for the war, came to town and were escorted through the streets by the German brass band. They have enlisted near fifty men, and expect to fill up within ten days. If they get their maximum number in time, they will be assigned to the 9th regiment in Milwaukee; if not in time for the 9th they will be assigned to the 13th at Janesville.

October 30.—The German company from New Glarus expects to be ordered into camp at Milwaukee, to join the German regiment this week. It will probably have about sixty-five men, and will have to unite with a part of a company from another part of the State in order to reach the maximum number.

November 6.—The portion of a company of infantry raised at New Glarus, consisting of between forty and fifty men, came into town on Friday last, preparatory to going into camp. They expect to increase their number here. Their fine soldierly appearance, and martial bearing excited the admiration of all who saw them.

A letter from Lieut. O'Brien to E. Mosher, Esq., of this place, the father of Stewart Mosher, who was killed at the battle of Harper's Ferry, says: I was standing near your son when he fell, and had just been speaking to him but a moment before. He remarked to me "Lieutenant I want to fetch my man this time" and asked "where is the best place." I advised him to go into the house and fire through the window, but he went around the corner of the house and about ten feet from it and was in the act of raising his gun to his shoulder when he fell. He is the first man from Green county that died on the battle field in defense of his country's flag, and she may well be proud of him. He was a brave man. Peace to his ashes.

November 20.—A private note from Mr. Bryant verifies the rumor of the death of Edgar Ross a member of Capt. Flood's company. It will be remembered that he was wounded at Bolivar and taken prisoner by the enemy. He died of lock-jaw at Charlestown, Va., on the 26th ult. Thus our brave men attest their devotion to the principles of free government.

A letter to Judge Dunwiddie from Frederick, Md., brings the sorrowful intelligence of the death of Clark Austin of this place, a member of Capt. Flood's company, who, after a very short illness, died of fever in the hospital in that city On the 15th inst. Private Austin had been taking care of the sick of our company in the hospital, and was highly valued by them as a superior nurse.

November 27.—On Saturday last, William Foster and George Gay, members of Capt. Flood's company, who were wounded in the battle of Bolivar, arrived here on a furlough. Their wounds are doing well, and they hope soon to be able to join the regiment. Gay was wounded during a retreat from a position held by the enemy, and he attributes his escape from capture to the noble conduct of Silas Gardner, who at a great risk to himself assisted him off the field.

The ladies of the village meet this Wednesday afternoon at 2 o'clock, at the residence of J. B. Treat, for the purpose of organizing a society for furnishing relief to our soldiers in the hospital and in the field, by providing such things as socks, mittens, etc., for them, which will conduce very much to their health and comfort; and which they would not have if they are not furnished by the women of the loyal States. This is a noble work, and we hope that the example of this society will be followed in every neighborhood throughout the country. Every household can contribute something. While we are enjoying the comforts and pleasures of home, let us not forget those who are offering their lives for our protection.

December 11.—Our readers will be glad to learn that for gallant conduct in the action at Bolivar, and for general efficiency in the discharge of duty, Mr. Bryant has been again recommended by the colonel of his regiment for promotion. He entered the service last spring as a private; shortly after the regiment went into camp at Fond du Lac, he received the appointment of sergeant-major, he has since been twice promoted upon merit alone; once upon the recommendation of the colonel, now brigadier-general Hamilton, he was commissioned as 2d lieutenant in the Watertown Rifles, company A, recently he has been recommended by Capt. Bertram and Col. Ruger and has received his commission as 1st lieutenant in the same company. We congratulate our friend more upon the fact that he has proved himself worthy of success, than that he has acquired it, and hope that the responsibilities of his new position will not prevent him from appearing regularly, in his own proper person before the readers of the Sentinel.

December 18.—Last week at Milwaukee, the Hon. B. Dunwiddie presented to Lieut-Col. Wrisberg, of the 9th regiment, in behalf of the citizens of Monroe, a fine horse. We hear that Mr. Wrisberg is winning golden opinions from all connected with the regiment by his superior military knowledge, and his gentlemanly conduct. We wish him abundant success.

December 25.—The ladies in the vicinity of Juda, in this county, have forwarded to the care the agents of the United States sanitary commission, at Chicago, Ill., a box containing the following articles: Twelve comforts for single beds; 13 feather pillows, and 15 slips; 1 woolen blanket; 5 sheets; 11 pairs of cotton flannel drawers; 11 undershirts; 3 bed-gowns; 7 pairs of woolen socks; 3 rolls of bandages for the wounded; buttons, thread, pins and needles.

Many a prayer for a blessing on these benevolent ladies, will ascend from the couch of the sick and wounded.

The ladies of Brodhead are to present a flag to Capt. Jackson's company at McKey's Hall on Thursday evening next, after which there will be a soldiers' ball, refreshments to be furnished by the ladies. On Friday morning the company leaves for camp. It will be company A, of the 18th regiment. Let the ladies of Monroe contribute to the occasion.

1862—January 1.—The Ladies' Aid Society of Monroe has forwarded to the care of the United States sanitary commission at Chicago a box containing the following list of articles: Nineteen shirts, 5 towels, 2 quilts, 16 sheets, 2 comforts, 2 blankets, 3 bed gowns, 5 double gowns, 37 pillow cases, 10 pairs of drawers, 5 pairs woolen socks, 1 pair of mittens, 5 feather pillows, 1 cotton pillow, 3 rolls of bandages, 11 sponges, 7 packages of envelopes, 5 quires of paper, 1 box of pens, 7 pounds dried peaches, 4 pounds of blackberries, 2 pounds of raspberries, 3 pounds of prunes, 1 cake of chocolate, 1 can of blackberries, 3 papers corn starch, pins and needles. The society is very grateful to those ladies of Monroe and Sylvester, who are not members of the society, who have so generously aided in making up this gift to the sick and wounded in our armies.

The three commissioners, Ezra Wescott, of Clarno, E. B. Allen, of Spring Grove, and Henry Adams, of Mount Pleasant, who under the new law constitute the 'county board', assembled in this place on Monday last and elected Henry Adams chairman of the board. We are informed that under the present mode of disposing of the fund provided by the county for the relief of the families of volunteers, the whole will be exhausted by the 1st of April next, and in view of the enormous amount of taxes—more than $1,500,000, besides county, town, school and highway taxes—which must be raised in this State during the coming year, the commissioners are contemplating whether some change in the administration of this fund is not desirable.

March 19.—Henry Combs, of this place, who is a member of the 7th Illinois Cavalry, and who was at the battle of Fort Donelson, arrived at home on Saturday evening last on a furlough. He escaped injury at Donelson, but has since been wounded while on a scouting expedition.

April 30.—In accordance with the recommendation of Gov. Salomon, divine service will be held in the M. E. Church tomorrow, at the usual hour of morning service, when a sermon will be preached by the Rev. C. E. Weirich in commemoration of the death of the late governor, the Hon. Louis P. Harvey. We hope that our merchants will all close their places of business for a few hours, and unite with the people in commemorating the untimely end of one of the purest and best public men of our times.

June 25.—Mr. Ly Brand, who is favorably known to all the old residents of our county, and who still has interests here, is one of the faithful few who saw the cloud arising when it was no larger than a man's hand; and who has not failed to warn the country against the fearful storm of God's vengeance which is now sweeping over us on account of our participation in the great crime of human slavery.

July 9.—At a meeting of the citizens of Monroe, held at the court house, July 8, 1862, D. W. Ball, Esq., was called to the chair, and W. W. Wright chosen secretary. The meeting was called to order and was addressed in a spirited manner by T. H. Eaton, E. Bartlett, F. Q. Ball, L. Davenport; each taking a 'clatter' at the rebels and traitors in particular, and secession sympathizers generally.

On motion of F. Q. Ball, a committee of five persons was appointed by the chair to draft resolutions expressive of the sense and object of the meeting. Messrs F. Q. Ball, L. Davenport, Dr. S. Porter, Joseph Peters and Allen Woodle were appointed said committee.

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

The following preamble and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted, were reported by said committee

WHEREAS, Morris Rosa, having served six months in the rebel army, having contributed a large sum from his private funds for the purpose of buying Sharpe's rifles, with which to arm rebels; and also, having come north under the protection of the stars and stripes, has here expressed treason able sentiments, and manifested his sympathy for the present rebellion, by saying that he would rather lose his right arm than fight his southern friends:—therefore,

Resolved, That the said Morris Rosa be allowed twenty-four hours in which to leave the county, failing to do which, he remains at his peril

Resolved, That any other man uttering like sentiments, shall not be tolerated in our midst.

Ordered, That the Monroe Sentinel be requested to publish the proceedings of this meeting.

The meeting then adjourned to meet at the call of the chairman.

D.W. BALL, Chairman.
W.W. WRIGHT, Secretary.

July 23.—William Van Horn, of Cadiz, in this county, aged sixty-six years, came to town yesterday to offer himself a recruit in the service of his country. There is also, in this place, a man who is sixty-five years of age, who declares his determination to pass the examination of the United States mustering officer.

COURT HOUSE, MONROE, JULY 28.

A traitor, having been sentenced this afternoon, to five weeks imprisonment for kicking and otherwise abusing a sick and discharged soldier for the expression of Union sentiments, his secession friends said he should not go to jail, and if he did 100 men from the county would liberate him. Whereupon a general fight ensued in which "secesh" got much the worst of it—a meeting was called of the loyal citizens to be held at the court house, which was organized by calling the Hon. F. H. West to the chair and appointing A. W. Potter, secretary.

The object of the meeting was said to be the suppression of home rebels. Speeches were made by F. H. West, James Bintliff, E. Bartlett, Dr. Hull and others. A committee, consisting of J. V. Richardson, E. Bartlett and F.Q. Ball, to draft and present resolutions, reported the following:

WHEREAS, the hydra-headed demon of secession is again moving in our midst and exerting a paralyzing influence upon the cause of our country; and,

WHEREAS, a person calling himself a Union man, assaulted a disabled soldier for expressing himself in favor of the present administration, and an active prosecution of the war, and having been justly imprisoned by due legal process, in our county jail for the term of five weeks, certain individuals threaten to resist the execution of the sentence of the law, or liberate him when incarcerated; therefore,

Resolved, That in view of the threats that have been uttered by the traitorous miscreants, who sympathize with the wretch who has been justly incarcerated this evening in our county jail, we challenge them to an attempt at their nefarious purposes; and we also deem it an act of prudence to organize a vigilance committee whose duty it shall be to look well after those who may be guilty of uttering disloyal sentiments in the future, and bring them to the punishment which the magnitude of their offenses seem to merit.

Resolved, That in this hour of our Nation's trial, it is the duty of every loyal citizen to discountenance in every possible manner, all exhibitions of treason, come from whatever source they may, that our country is above every other consideration, and the existence and perpetuity of our Union is too dear to permit any individual with traitorous cowboy instincts to strike directly or indirectly, by word or action at the effectual and vigorous prosecution of the present war and the efforts of the administration to suppress the Rebellion.

A.W. Potter offered the following resolution which was unanimously adopted by the meeting:

Resolved, That, in order to carry out the purposes this meeting; for self protection, and to be prepared to mete out to traitors the punishment they so justly deserve, we do now organize a military company that shall meet regularly for drill. The following gentlemen put down their names, and the meeting adjourned. The members of the military company to meet again on Tuesday evening to elect officers, and otherwise perfect their organization:

Samuel Chandler, A. J. Sutherland, B. Dunwiddie, Edmund Bartlett, Edmund Hill, Charles A. Booth, D. W. Ball, B. Cheneweth, J. S. Smock, J.A. Payne, George Churchill, L. Rote, C.Witter, P. H. Coon, William Bowers, Albert Witter, Charles Usher, S. A. Mackres, William Fillebrown, Jesse Bunting, J. R. Davis, N. B. Treat, Edward Hassinger, J. S. Bloom, Allen Woodle, W. O. Carpenter, E. S. Sackett, Israel Brewer, James Bintliff, E. Bentley, Dr. S. Porter, Thomas Eaton, Edward Scoville, G. E. Thrall, W. P. Woodworth, Rudolph Shroeder, John Graham, John Darrell, John Erfert, George W. Hoffman, Marvin Rhines, J. B. Scoville, E. T. Phelps, G. S. Van Wagenen, Joseph Pool, E. A. West, G. W. Crane, I. W. Hall, A. W. Patter, E. C. Stepheson, James Norris, W. W. Wright, Harris Pool, Alvin Humphrey, F. Q. Ball, D. F. Corson, J. K. Eilert, Morris Roth, Charles D. Corson, H. W. Whitney, William H. Halleck, William Sandoe, Jacob Stevick, S. W. Wilcox, C. Payne, D. S. Mullen, F. H. West, J. R. Lafferty, John Sherman, A. C. Dodge, Amos Lindly, A. Horn, F. S.Parlin, L. B. Johnson, G. A. Mosher, A. A. Bennett, George Miller, A. White, George P. Hedge and R. S. Norman.

August 6.—On the evening of the 29th ult., pursuant to adjournment, the citizens of Monroe met at the court house, for the purpose of perfecting the organization of the Home Guards and to hear and act upon the report of the committee previously appointed with regard to the course to be pursued with disloyal men in our midst. L. Rood was called to the chair and Thomas H. Eaton appointed secretary of the meeting. The report of the committee was then called for and read as follows:

WHEREAS, the dangerous condition of our government requires the earnest and united efforts of all its loyal citizens, during this the most critical hour of her trial, the hour that is to decide whether we are to maintain the proud position of one of the first Nations of the earth, or sink into anarchy and confusion, a scorn and a reproach to the civilized world and

WHEREAS, it is feared and believed that there are persons in our midst who are not of us, or with us in this our terrible struggle in behalf of what is the dearest thing on earth, to all true patriots—our country. And in order that we may know who are against us because they are not for us; therefore,

Resolved, that all the citizens of this community be requested to take and subscribe to the annexed oath:

"I, _____ of the town of _____ in the county of Green and State of Wisconsin, do solemnly swear that I am a loyal citizen of the United States of America, that I will bear true allegiance to the same, that I will to the utmost of my ability support the government in its efforts to suppress the rebellion; that in rendering such support I will discountenance in every possible manner by word or action every sentiment or expression the tendency of which may be to encourage disloyalty to the government, and that I will not, by word or deed, countenance any disloyal, secret organization, and for a violation of this oath may I suffer the just penalty of the crime of treason."

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

Resolved, That any person refusing to subscribe to said oath shall be considered and is our enemy, whom it is our first duty, as good and loyal citizens, to expel from our midst.

Resolved, That in all summary proceedings under the authority of this meeting, the course indicated and ordered in Gen. Pope's order No. 3, (which we annex) be adhered to and carried out, so far as applicable to the case, the same as though we were acting in his department and under his authority.

Resolved, That a judicial committee of fifteen of our best citizens be appointed to investigate and take judicial cognizance of all refusals to take, and subscribe to, and violations of said oath, and that the Home Guards being organized here tonight be authorized and ordered to faithfully execute the decrees of said judicial committee.

On motion the following named gentlemen were appointed such judicial committee:

B. Chenoweth, N. R. Usher, C. S. Foster, M. Reitler, John A. Bingham, Edmund Hill, J. V. Richardson, L. Davenport, A. Ludlow, D. W. Ball, W. W. Wright, B. Dunwiddie, George King, William Brown and J. S. Bloom.

Messrs. E. Bartlett, A. J. Sutherland, Harris Pool, S. E. Cole, Dr. S. Porter and C. Godfrey, were appointed a committee to invite citizens to take the oath.

POPE'S ORDER NO. 3.

"HEADQUARTERS, ARMY OF VIRGINIA,

"JULY 23D, 1862.

"Commanders of army corps, divisions, brigades, and detached commands will proceed immediately to arrest disloyal male citizens, within their lines or within their reach, and within their respective stations. Such as are willing to take the oath of allegiance to the United States and will furnish sufficient security for its observance, shall be permitted to remain at their homes and pursue in good faith their accustomed avocations. Those who refuse shall be conducted to the south beyond the extreme pickets of this army, and be notified that if found again anywhere within our lines; or at any point in the rear, they will be considered as spies, and subjected to the extreme rigor of military law. If any person having taken the oath of allegiance as above specified shall be found to have violated it, he shall be shot, and his property seized and confiscated.*

August 20.—We see by the Madison Journal, of a late date, that Silas Gardner, son of E. T. Gardner, Esq., of this village, has received a 2d lieutenant's commission in the 3d regiment. It gives us pleasure to record the promotion of men who have earned it by their good behavior.

August 27.—We learn that there will be funeral services at the Catholic Church, in this village, Monday next, at 10 o'clock A. M., in commemoration of the death of Capt. Moses O'Brien. All citizens are invited to attend.

Early on Monday morning an immense multitude of people assembled in the public square to take leave of their friends in Capt. Bintliff's company, which was to leave for camp at 8 o'clock A. M. The company formed in front of McKey's Hall at quarter past 7, and after answering to their names, they were marched to the depot where a special train was in waiting for them. Their friends accompanied them to the cars, unwilling to leave them till compelled by stern necessity. The parting scenes were very affecting; not that many tears were shed, but the firmly compressed lips and the quivering nerves of the face showed emotion too deep and too sacred for utterance at such a time and place. The Monroe Brass Band was present and played a solemn farewell air as the cars moved slowly off. The company goes into camp at Racine, by the way of Milwaukee.

September 3.—It gives us pleasure to record that our townsman, F. H. West, Esq., has been commissioned Lieutenant-colonel of the 31st

*The oath, before mentioned, was given into the possession of L. Rote, an attorney and justice of the peace. A large number of citizens made haste to subscribe their names to it; indeed, there were but few that refused to sign. Of the latter, one was a resident of the town of Sylvester, an old-time citizen; he was marched to the limits of the village of Monroe, and ordered to keep outside. A resident of Clarno was treated to a free ride on a rail part of the way to his home.—ED.

regiment, which is made up of companies from Crawford, Grant, Iowa, Lafayette and Green counties, and goes into camp at Prairie du Chien. Mr. West will fill the place, given him with credit to himself and honor to his county; and, notwithstanding the slurs of the Madison Patriot, at the "leader of the Green county mob," we will hazard something that not only his immediate friends, but his political enemies will freely admit that a more fit appointment could not have been made.

October 1.—The Soldiers' Aid Society will meet at the court house Saturday, at 2 o'clock P. to make bandages, lint, etc. Let every one come, whether they belong to the society or not. The needs of the sick and wounded are very pressing just now, and we wish to send a box as soon as possible.

MRS. J. B. TREAT, Secretary.

We have seen a letter from William H. Booth, one of Capt. Flood's company, in which he confirms Lieut. Gardner's statement that only six of company C's men came out of the battle of Antietam unhurt. They went into the fight thirty-one strong. Three were killed and the rest (the six of one mentioned excepted) wounded: The killed are G. Gay, I. Thurlow and Leonard Sheffield. Kimberly, Foster and William Booth were among the wounded, but their wounds are slight. The regiment had only sixty-three left fit for duty. They are now located near Harper's Ferry.

December 3.—Green County Finances. The financial statement which we publish to day, showing the expenditures of Green county for the past year, and the amount of taxes to be raised to meet the expenses of the present year, are full of interest to every tax-payer, and will unquestionably receive the attention they merit

They show that, notwithstanding the heavy expenses created by the war, the county is financially sound; and though $9,000 is to be raised to support the families of volunteers and drafted men, we believe that double that amount would be cheerfully given by a vote of more than three fourths of our people, were so much necessary to keep our brave soldiers' families from want and suffering. Our county commissioners are entitled to much credit for the energy and assiduity with which they have transacted all business which has come before them, and have fully demonstrated that, although "in a multitude of counselors there is wisdom," it does not require a multitude to transact the business of a county board, and do it in a manner satisfactory to their constituents.

1863—January 11.—The ladies of this village will meet at the house of Mrs. Jesse Robison tomorrow (Thursday) afternoon, for the purpose of sewing for the soldiers. This is a truly praiseworthy object, and we hope there will be a large gathering. Our brothers and friends are far from home engaged in fighting the enemies of the Republic, that we and our posterity may enjoy the rich blessings of peace and National prosperity, and surely we should rejoice at the privilege of laboring a half day to promote their comfort in return.

February 25.—Death of Rev. Mr. Weirich.—Our citizens were startled last evening by the announcement that the Rev. C. E. Weirich, late pastor of the M. E. Church in this village, and for the last four months chaplain of the 23d regiment, Wisconsin Volunteers, was dead, and that his body had arrived on the cars in charge of his son-in-law, who was also a member of the 23d regiment. At first the statement seemed incredible; his family reside in this village, and they had not even heard of his illness. Soon, too soon, the sad tidings were confirmed. He died at Vicksburg several days since. We have heard no particulars of his death nor of the character of his disease. His unexpected fate has overwhelmed his family with the deepest grief, and all our citizens, by whom he was known and beloved, sympathize with them in their sad bereavement.

MONROE, FEB. 28, 1863.

March -11.—The citizens of Monroe held a meeting at the court house, on Monday evening the 9th inst., for the purpose of aiding our sick and wounded soldiers, now in the field. A committee of ten were appointed to adopt the quickest and best method of bringing this about.

They propose to circulate subscriptions, which is now being done, to raise funds to send an agent along with any boxes of goods that may be sent, so that each box may be applied where it was intended.

If the citizens of Clarno, Juda and other portions of this county will send in their boxes of stores for the same purpose, together with money to pay expenses, this committee will take charge of them, and send by the same agent, to any company that went from this county. By order of committee.

September 2. The provost marshal of this district, publishes a notice in our paper today, offering a reward of $10, and payment of all reasonable expenses, for the arrest and delivery of any deserter.

We advise men knowing themselves to be deserters, to save this money to the government by reporting to the marshal, of their own accord, as they will be quite likely to meet with better treatment.

October 7.—The ladies of Monroe will hold a festival at McKey's Hall on Thursday evening, October 8, for the benefit of our soldiers wounded in the recent battles. A supper will be served from 8 o'clock to 10 o'clock, at fifty cents each. All ladies, whether in the village or country, who are desirous of aiding in this laudable work, are invited to contribute something for the table.

on purpose to bring it. They arrived here about 10:30 A. M., and the remainder of the day, till late in the evening, was spent by our citizens in the wildest rejoicing. Bells were rung, drums beat, flags waved, patriotism, whisky and lager flowed profusely, and "all went merry as a marriage bell."

April 19.—In accordance with the notice of the acting Secretary of State, that the funeral services of President Lincoln will take place in Washington at noon today, services will be held in every considerable town throughout the country. The governors of the several States have issued proclamations recommending this, and the feelings of the people prompt a ready response. Services will be held at the Universalist church in this village, and addresses will be delivered by the pastors of the several congregations. The heavens are weeping floods of tears this morning over the untimely fate of Abraham Lincoln, and all the people of our village feel like following the example.

Under the call of October, 1863, for 300,000 more, the quota of Green county was 223. Under the four calls of 1864, dated February 1, March 14, July 18 and December 19, her quota was 1,326. HOW GREEN COUNTY TREATED HER SOLDIERS.

At a special meeting of the board of supervisors of Green county, in May, 1861, it was:

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of this board, the county will be willing to pay all the necessary expenses of maintaining the families of all those who may volunteer (that may need such assistance) during the war." The aid thus early promised was continued to the end of the war. The towns were severally as prompt and persevering as the county at large. The following statement of the amounts raised to pay bounties to volunteers, and to aid the families of the same, is from the Sentinel of July 26, 1865:

IN MEMORIAM.

When Pericles was called upon to deliver the oration over those who had fallen in the first campaign of the Peloponnesian war, he began by extolling Athens; and, having expatiated upon her glories, her institutions and her sciences, he concluded by exclaiming: "For such a Republic, for such a Nation, the people whom we this day mourn fell and died." It is for such a Republic, for such a Nation" as the United States of America, that the people of the North, by thousands, "fell and died" during the War for the Union; and, to those thousands, Green county contributed her share.

Green county's war record is of such a character that her people may ever refer to it with pride and satisfaction. One of the early counties in the State, as we have seen, to respond with volunteers in the hour of gravest peril, she never faltered during the entire struggle, weary and disheartening as it oft-times was. Her old men were not wanting in counsel, nor her young men nor middle-aged in true martial spirit. With a firm, unswerving faith in the righteousness of the Union cause, her citizens, with scarce a distinction in age or sex, were imbued with a determination to conquer or die rather than survive defeat. It was this kind of patriotism that bore the Union cause through defeat as well as victory, whenever the oft-repeated news was brought home of depleted and scattered ranks. Green county valor is attested upon every street of our hospitable villages; upon her broad sections of fertile land; and last, but not least, within the silent enclosures of her dead. It is here that, with each recurring anniversary, the graves of her heroes are moistened with the tears of sorrow, as loving anthers bedeck them with beautiful flowers.

Although there are in the preceding pages some facts which may remind the citizens of Green county of the deeds of those who fought the good fight until the end, yet without these records, those days of peril, of suffering, and of victory at last, would not be forgotten by the present generation; they are too deeply engraved in the hearts of all. Each of the citizen-soldiers from this county who stood loyally by the country's standard through the war, has wrought his name in characters that live as monuments to the memories of men. Many gallant sons of Green, who went out from home to battle for the Union, with only the benediction of a mothers' tears and prayers, came back to those mothers' arms with a glorious record. Many returned having left a limb in the swamps of Chickahominy, on the banks of the Rapidan, at Fredricksburg, Gettysburg, Vicksburg, or in the Wilderness. Many still bear the marks of that strife which raged at Stone River, Iuka, Chickamauga, or on the heights of Lookout Mountain, whence they thundered down the defiance of the skies, or of that strife which was waged before Atlanta, Savannah and in the Carolinas.

But there were many who came not back. They fell by the wayside, in the prison, on the battlefield, or in the hospital. Their memory, however, is held in the most sacred keeping. Some sleep beside their ancestors in the village churchyard, where the violets on their graves speak not alone of womanly sweetness, but in tender accents of the devotion of those beneath the mounds of earth. All, all, whether buried in the distant South or at home, are remembered as they slumber on in a peaceful, glorified rest.

"Winds of Summer, Oh whisper low,
Over the graves where the violets grow.
Blossoming flowers and songs of bees,
Sweet ferns tossed in the summer's breeze,
Floating shadows and golden lights,
Dewy mornings and radiant nights,
All the bright and beautiful things
That gracious and bountiful summer brings,
Fairest and sweetest that earth can bestow,
Brighten the graves where the violets grow."

Many of the brave soldiers who battled for the Union, many, very many, have gone before, and they now wait upon the threshold of Paradise for the coming of those loved ones left behind, when they, too, shall have exchanged the feeble pulses of a transitory existence for the ceaseless throbbing of eternal life. Faithful and fearless, on the march, in the strife, at victory or defeat, they at last laid down at the mysterious frontier, leaving the exalted hope behind that, though the world was lost forever, there would be unfurled another realm of unimaginable glory, where they, and all whom they loved on earth, might realize the promise which the great Ruler of the universe has, made to the just.

Wisconsin may well feel proud of her record made in defense of the national existence. Shoulder to shoulder with the other loyal States of the Union, she stood in the front ranks. From her workshops and her farms she poured forth the stalwart men who tilled up the organizations which she sent to the field. The blood of those brave men drenched almost every battlefield of the Rebellion, from Gettysburg to the valley of the Rio Grande. Establishing at an early day a reputation for gallantry and endurance, Wisconsin regiments always occupied positions where hard fighting was to be done; and those who placed them there never were disappointed in their not performing their whole duty; and no county in the State has reason to be more proud than the county of Green for the part born by her sons in this terrible war to save the Union.

CHAPTER XXI.

COUNTY OFFICERS—PAST AND PRESENT.

In a previous chapter, "Green County Formed and Organized," mention is made of the first elections in Green for county officers. These elections were held in 1838. Of the officers elected during that year and succeeding ones, down to the present time (1884), the following is a list, excluding there from county commissioners and supervisors, judges of the county court, and county superintendents of schools,—these, with the dates of their election, being found in the chapters on the "The County Board," on "The Courts of Green County," and on the "Common Schools of the County."

The subject of this chapter is, of necessity, wholly statistical, confined, as the reader has seen, to a simple recital of those who have (with a few exceptions) been entrusted with the management of the affairs of Green county since its organization to the present time. This management has been carried on to the present time, with a single exception, honestly and faithfully. "The exception," says Miss Bingham, in her valuable history of the county, "is Horace B. Poyer, county clerk from the year 1849 to 1855, and forger of county orders. Probably no man in the county was ever more generally popular, more implicitly trusted, than Mr. Poyer at the time he was engaged in his forgeries. An investigating committee appointed by the supervisors reported Dec. 27, 1855, as follows: "The matter is involved in much obscurity, owing to the destruction and mutilation of records and papers. We are therefore unable to make so full and perfect a report as we could desire. We have, however, detected frauds committed from the year 1848 to 1854, inclusive. The aggregate amount of which the county has been defrauded (so far as we are able to state from our imperfect means of ascertaining), including orders altered, orders wholly fraudulent, and the same raised for weights and measures, and exclusive of $895.17 of orders, for the issuing of which no bills or resolutions can be found, is $2,541.28; from which deduct $696.80, the amount canceled by Poyer, and there remains a balance now due the county of $1,844.48. The value of the orders which the report refers to as canceled, was saved for the county by the fact that a year before the forgeries were generally known, A. Ludlow and Asa Richardson be. came convinced that a large number of orders which they had bought were fraudulent. Their efforts to ascertain the truth were discovered by Mr. Poyer, who engaged two attorneys, to whom he made a confession, expressing at the same time a great desire to repair the wrong he had done. All the fraudulent orders which had been discovered were immediately canceled, and Mr. Poyer expressed great pleasure in his own reformation. He won the confidence and the deepest sympathy of all who knew his secret.. They believed he had been the victim of circumstances which could never mislead him again. After some time, however, it was discovered that the confession was less full than it had been represented to be. Other forgeries, even forged certificates of wolf scalps, were discovered, and, after paying his attorneys with a forged land warrant, Mr. Poyer fled to a distant State, where, under an assumed name, he is said to be leading an honorable life."

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.CAPT. EDWARD RUEGGER, sheriff of Green county, was born in Switzerland, Oct. 18, 1836. In 1854 he came to America with his parents, who settled in Green county. After coming to Monroe, he learned the trade of wagon maker, which he followed until 1861, when he enlisted in the 9th Wisconsin Infantry, as private. Their first rendezvous was at Camp Siegel, at Milwaukee, where at an election of officers, he was chosen 2d lieutenant of his company, and was soon after promoted by the governor, to 1st lieutenant. Dec. 30, 1861, the regiment was sent to Fort Scott, Kan. In June, 1862, he was promoted to captain. His company was on provost guard duty, of the seventh army corps, under Gen. Steele for about eight months. He was in the Camden expedition in April, 1864, and took part in all the skirmishes and battles his army corps was engaged in. He was mustered out at Milwaukee, in December, 1864, since which time he has been engaged in various occupations. In 1861 he was married to Sophia Shober. By this union there are eight children, four sons and four daughters. Capt. Ruegger is a member of the Masonic order, also of the I.O.O.F, the G.A.R., the Turner society and "Sharp Shooters."

C. E. TANBERG,

register of deeds, was born in Norway, Jan. 14, 1830. In 1853 he came to this country with his parents, who located in Racine Co., Wis., where C. E. took up his trade as painter. In 1857 he moved to Oconomowoc, Waukesha county, and continued in the same business. In 1861 he enlisted in the 15th Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and was first camped at Madison, Wis. He was elected by the company, 2d lieutenant, and received his commission Jan. 14, 1862, and was mustered in during the month of February of the same year. Mr. Tanberg participated in the following engagements:

Island No. 10, Union City, Tenn., Perryville, Knob Gap, Stone River, Missionary Ridge, Orchard Knob, Charleston, East Tennessee, (Atlanta Campaign) Rocky Face Ridge, Resaca, Dallas, Pine Mountain, Lost Mountain, Kenesaw Mountain, Atlanta and Jonesboro, Ga.. At the battle of Stone River, he was wounded in the forehead by a minnie ball, was left on the field. and taken prisoner. He was then sent to Atlanta and subsequently to Libby prison, and was exchanged in April, 1863. He immediately returned to his regiment, and was soon after promoted to the rank of 1st lieutenant, commanding company D. He participated in the battle of Chickamauga, and was wounded in the fleshy part of the left thigh and lost a portion of his little finger. He remained with the regiment until they arrived at Atlanta, when, on account of poor health he resigned. In 1864 he came to Monroe, and in the fall of 1865 continued his business of painting. In the fall of 1872 he was a successful candidate for register of deeds, and was re-elected for six consecutive terms. In May, 1857, he was married to Miss A. H. Anderson, by whom he has had twelve children, eleven now living—Emma M., George E., Albert E., Eva M., Charles A., Willis M., Frank M., H. May, Ernest J., Charlotte B. and Orville Clayton. Mr. Tanberg is a member of the Masonic fraternity and of the G. A. R.

county clerk, was born at Schoenwerder, in Pomerania, Prussia, Nov. 24, 1840, where he received a common school education. When fifteen years old he was appointed clerk of the magistrate of the city of Arnswalde, where he spent one year. When sixteen years old, he, with the consent of his parents, emigrated to the United States, leaving his father's home in Germany on the 12th day of April, 1857, and arriving at Oconomowoc, Waukesha Co., Wis., June 16, thence in July he went to Janesville, Rock county, and thence in the same month to the town of Sylvester, in Green county, thence late in the fall to the town of Jefferson, where he remained one year. In the fall of 1858 he removed to Warren Co., Miss., but returned to Green county in the spring of 1859. In the spring of 1860 his parents also emigrated to the United States, with whom he located on section 25, in the town of Clarno. During the war he enlisted, on the 15th day of August 1862, in company B, 31st regiment, Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and participated in the siege and capture of Atlanta, Ga., march to the sea, siege and capture of Savannah, Ga., and also in the following engagements: Chesterfield, S. C., Averysboro, N. C., and Bentonville, N. C., and was also in the grand review at Washington, D. C., on May 24, 1865. While in the service he was detailed in May, 1863, as clerk of the general court martial at Columbus, Ky., remaining in that position four months. From September, 1863, to the close of the war in 1865 he acted as company clerk of his company. He was mustered out on the 20th day of June, 1865, at Louisville, Ky., and finally paid and discharged at Madison, Wis., July 6, 1865. On March 30, 1866, he was married to Sophia Bast, by whom he had eight children—Edward F., Clara L., Oscar H. (dead), Henry W., Martha M., Ida S., Emil H. and Minna L. In the fall of 1866 he came to Monroe and engaged in mercantile business for a short time. In the spring of 1867 he again located on a farm on section 25, in the town of Clarno, where he remained until the fall of 1880, when he was elected to the office of county clerk, and was re-elected in the fall of 1882. Mr. and Mrs. Gloege are members of the Evangelical Church of Monroe. The parents of the subject of this sketch, Frederick and Louisa Gloege, resided in the town of Clarno, where they first located, twenty-three years, but removed to Santa Anna, Los Angeles Co., Cal., in the month of March, 1883, where they now reside.

THEODORE W. GOLDIN, clerk of the circuit court, was born in Rock Co., Wis., July 25, 1857. His parents were Reuben W. and Elizabeth E. (Bradfield) Goldin. The former was a native of New York, the latter of Ohio. In 1846 Reuben W. Goldin, the father of the subject of this sketch, came to Rock county. In 1860 they removed to Brodhead, Green county, where Reuben W. Goldin died in 1883. Theodore was educated in the high schools and received a liberal education. After leaving school he learned the harness-maker's trade, which he followed a short time. He was married in February, 1881, to Laura Dunwiddie, a daughter of David Dunwiddie, of Brodhead. He was elected to his present office in 1882, which he is filling with honor to himself and credit to his constituency. He is a Master Mason and a Knight of Pythias. In April, 1876, Mr. Goldin enlisted in the 7th Cavalry regiment of the regular army, and participated in the memorable engagement at Little Big Horn, at the massacre of Gen. Custer and his noble command. After serving two years he was mustered out at Fort Buford, Dak., Nov. 27, 1877. While in the service his command was, for sixty days, on half rations, and for fifteen days had nothing except the game that they killed.

A. C. STUNTZ,

county surveyor of Green county, is a native of Erie Co., Penn., born Aug. 24, 1825, and came to this county in 1866. He is a son of Rev. George Stuntz, a native of Frederick Co., Va., born July 4, 1789, and Mary (Randall) Stuntz, a native of Rhode Island, born in 1790. They were married in Erie Co., Penn., where a family of ten children were born, five of whom are living. Mrs. Stuntz died in 1836. She was a member of the M. E. Church, and highly respected by all who knew her. Mr. Stuntz was again married in 1837, to Mrs. Sarah Davis, a widow of Samuel Davis, by whom he had one child. Mr. Stuntz was a local preacher and supplied the pulpit for more than fifty years. He was a man of commanding stature, and more than ordinary ability and sterling worth. For many years he married all the couples, and preached all the funeral sermons of the county. His whole life was spent in the service of his Maker. He died at the age of seventy-six years. He had two sons who followed him in the ministry, and a number of relatives who were preachers. The subject of this sketch, A. C. Stuntz, grew to manhood in his native county, and obtained his education in the pioneer schools. In 1847 he left Erie county and went to Grant Co., Wis. On his way there, passing through what is now the city of Monroe, and thence to the pineries, where he remained one year. He then commenced studying in the office of his brother, who was a civil engineer and government contractor, with whom he continued until 1854. In 1855 he removed to Lake Superior, where he was engaged as government contractor, and remained until 1864. There were plenty of Indians in that country, and he became familiar with their language. In 1863 he was appointed government agent to look after lands, which position he held until 1868. In 1864 he was elected to the assembly from the northwestern district of the State, comprising six counties. He came to Monroe in 1866, and in 1874 was elected to the office of county surveyor, which position he has since occupied. In 1849 he was married to Nancy C. Bradt, by whom he had four children, three daughters and one son—Samuel E., Isadore M., Sylvia and Mary E. Mrs. Stuntz died March 28, 1862. He was again married July 14, 1864 to Lydia A. Sturdevant, a native of New York. By this union there were four children—Nettie, James A., Hattie E. and Stephen C. Mr. and Mrs. Stuntz are members of the M. E. Church, and he is a member of Royal Arcanum.

CHAPTER XXII.

MISCELLANEOUS EVENTS.

There are many incidents transpiring in every county, as the years go by, which cause considerable excitement at the time, and are of much importance, frequently, in shaping the destiny of people, but which, by the large majority, are either entirely forgotten or remembered only as circumstances bring them to mind. The following are some such events appertaining to Green county.

FIRST ENUMERATION OF GREEN COUNTY PEOPLE.

When nearly all the territory now constituting this county, ceased to be a part of the county of Crawford, it did not contain over a dozen inhabitants, all told; but when it no longer formed a portion of Iowa county, but was erected into the county of Green, its population had largely increased; but the exact number of its inhabitants is unknown. As there was no census taken in Crawford county between the time of the arrival of the first settlers in this county and the date of the erection of Iowa county, it follows that no enumeration of those who had taken up their residence herein was made during that period. But the census of Iowa county was taken by the United States in 1830, which of course, took in all the residents in that part of its territory now constituting Green county. This may be said to have been the first enumeration of Green county residents, though they, in fact, lived in Iowa county.

THE EARLY SETTLERS.

The Early Settlers—where are they?
They are falling one by one;
A few more years will pass away,
And leave but few or none.
My memory often carries me
O'er a lapse of years,
And in my dreams I often see
Those happy pioneers.
But they are gone, those sturdy men,
And few are left to tell
The hardships they encountered when They first came here to dwell.

A few gray-headed ones still link
The present to the past,
And sad it is for me to think
That I'm almost the last.

Oft in my wanderings to and fro,
Through prairie, field and wood,
I pass the spot where, long ago,
Their rude log cabins stood.
I see them not as once they were—
Scarce one of them remains,
Perhaps a stable here and there,
Bleached by a thousand rains.

Quite rude those habitations were,
And few and far between,
That stood upon the prairie fair,
And some in groves of green.
But now a mound of stone and earth,
That mound so rude, so small,
Tells where was once the happy hearth,
And this, and this is all.

The Early Settlers—where are they?
I miss them more and more;
Each year, when it has passed away,
Leaves fewer than before,
Like leaves of autumn from the trees,
One after one there flown,
And soon will Death's cold wintry breeze
Remove the last, last one.

When I to church now sometimes go,
Their seats are vacant there;
I miss them, they are gone, I know,
But where, O, tell me where'
Some in the East, some in the West
Are buffeting Life's wave;
But far the greater number rest
Low in the silent grave.

Ye settlers in the Western world,
Though few may now remain,
Ye have not labored here and toiled
And spent your life in vain.
Another race of men may fill
The places you have filled,
And other hands these fields may till
Which yours have cleared and tilled.

And when ye all have passed away—
 The last old settler gone.
 Your deeds will yet survive, for they
 In living lines are drawn.
 These lines upon the prairies fair
 Can never be effaced,
 You leave the country smiling where
 You found it wild and waste.

THOMAS WOODLE.

[From the Monroe Sentinel, June 7, 1854.]

The West Union Iowa Pioneer of the 17th inst. [ult.] contains an obituary notice of the Hon. Thomas Woodle, judge of Fayette Co., Iowa He died at West Union, on the 12th inst.

Mr. Woodle was formerly a resident of this county; he came here in 1836, and removed to West Union some four years ago. As a citizen, and in the several social relations in life he was highly esteemed, and many of the old settlers will regret to learn that he has fallen in the prime of manhood and in the midst of usefulness. His relatives, among whom is an aged mother, reside among us, and we truly sympathize with them in this sudden and deeply afflictive bereavement. He had for some time held an important and responsible public trust with honor to himself, and much to the satisfaction of the people among whom he has resided. And now that he has gone from earthly responsibilities and dangers, his consistent Christian life leaves to the surviving friends the consoling assurance of his acceptance with Him who rewards true excellence with his divine approval.

JOHN G. PERCIVAL.

[From the Monroe Sentinel, Nov. 11, 1855.]

We spent a brief time with the State geologist, on Monday morning in examining the formations of magnesium limestone in this vicinity. Mr. Percival is now something over sixty years of age. His appearance is that of a man bent with years, but his mind is clear, and habits industrious. To see him at a distance no one would take him for that poetical genius who used to thrill us with his exquisite verse in our young days. But talk with him and you discover that quiet tone and varied expression of eye that indicates the fine and shrinking organization of the man of genius and the devoted lover of nature. Our mind was carried back to the time when we knew John G. Percival only as the poet whose muse went far into the human soul and laid it open to weeping or worship.

MARRIED.

“In Brodhead, Green county, on the 30th ult., by Rev. O. Curtis, George W. Tenney, editor of the Monroe Sentinel, to Mattie E. Love.

“The above notice escaped our attention last week, but not from any design. We congratulate George upon his success in Love-matters, and trust that each little Tenny-elfin may prove as Love-ly as Mattie-rimonial felicity could wish.—Monroe Sentinel Oct. 29, 1856.”

SHOCKING MURDER.

[From the Monroe Sentinel, July 8, 1857.]

We were informed on Monday, by J. B. Perry, Esq., of Albany, before whom an investigation was made, that about sunset on the 4th inst., Nehemiah Root, an old man of seventy-five years, residing in the town of Mount Pleasant, shot Eben C. Foster, a son-in-law, killing him instantly. The circumstances are briefly these:

There had been a personal difficulty between the parties for a long time, and about sunset of the day mentioned, Root approached within a short distance of Foster and leveled his gun at him, which he perceiving, turned to flee, and immediately received the contents of one barrel loaded with a slug or slugs in his left shoulder breaking that, also the collar-bone and burying itself in the lung. He took two or three steps and fell upon his face in the sand, a corpse. His wife hearing the gun and cries of a child, hurried to him, turned him upon one side, saw one gasp, and all was finished. The murderer went into the house, barricaded the doors and windows and declared he would shoot the first man who attempted to enter. One Gideon Gillett, by a ruse, having succeeded in entering, grappled and secured him after a violent resistance. He was tried before Esquire Perry, of Albany and in default of bail committed to the county jail.

A coroner's jury having been summoned to sit upon the body of Foster, rendered a verdict in accordance with the facts.

It is thought by some that the murderer was insane at the time of the commission of the deed, but as far as we can learn, it is generally conceded to have been one of the coolest, most wanton and unprovoked murders that ever have been recorded.

BOLD AND SUCCESSFUL THEFT.

"Our citizens were startled on Saturday morning last, by the announcement that James Hawthorne, who resides about a mile south of this village, had been relieved of between $1,200 and $1,500 in gold the night before.

"It appears that the thieves (there were two of them, as the tracks indicated) entered the house sometime between 12 o'clock and daylight and proceeded to the bedroom where slept Mr. and Mrs. Hawthorne, removed a cradle containing a child, drew out a heavy trunk from under the head of the bed, picked up Mr. Hawthorne's pantaloons and left, rifling the pantaloons and leaving them upon the door-step. They then took the trunk to the barn, broke it open, took out the gold, dropping a couple of twenties in their haste, and decamped, their tracks leading up towards this village. When the almost impossibility of entering a house in the dark without making a noise, the danger of wakening the child, who was almost always restless, the necessary noise that would be caused by drawing out a heavy trunk, and carrying it off, are all taken into consideration, the boldness of the theft is wonderful.

"On Saturday morning suspicion having rested upon two young men stopping at the Monroe house, named Samuel Jackson and William Garrington, they were put under arrest, and their personal property examined by Sheriff Sutherland. No case, however, having been made out against them, they were discharged. Mr. Hawthorne offers $500 for the arrest of the thieves and return of the money, or half the contents of either wallet for the return of the same.—Monroe Sentinel July 29, 1857.

ANOTHER CASE.

The State of Wisconsin vs. George Davis. On Friday of last week, upon complaint of Benjamin Chenoweth, for passing counterfeit money, George Davis was arrested and brought before Justice Hill for examination. Hiram Stevens for the State and A. J. Brundage for defense.

Defense submitted a motion to dismiss on grounds of informality of warrant, which motion was argued, and decided for the defense, and prisoner acquitted, whereupon a new warrant was served upon defendant. On Saturday, upon examination, the prisoner was held to bail in the sum of $1,000 for his appearance at the next term of the circuit court, which bail was immediately paid by a man who announced himself as a stranger to Davis. Monday morning Davis commenced a suit against the complainant, the justice and the sheriff, laying his damages at $2,000. This is the last shape affairs have assumed."—Monroe Sentinel, Aug. 19, 1857.

THE HAWTHORNE BURGLARY.

"We in common with numbers of our citizens, were most splendidly sold in that counterfeit three dollar bill case which we mentioned last week. That trial was all a sham, as will be seen.

Word reaching a pretty sharp detective officer, whose name has now escaped us, that there had been light-fingered work going on at this point, he appeared, and per an understood arrangement passed a counterfeit bill and was put in the same cell with Garrington—one of the supposed burglars—to await his examination. Here he elicited from Garrington, a full account of the Hawthorne affair, as also some other serious affairs of a like nature. He managed the thing very adroitly. Garrington and Jackson now confess the whole matter. The former says that he entered the house about 2 o'clock in the morning, alone, Jackson remaining on guard. Carefully he entered the room—crept under the bed—found a cradle in the way and removed it—carefully worked the trunk out from under the bed—picked it up (together with the pantaloons) and went to the barn and broke it open, as has been previously stated. They deposited the funds in a bank near 'Smith's Mill Pond.'

"Their card was very adroitly managed. They could prove, by the clerk of the Monroe House, that they were in the house at 1 o'clock of that same morning, and appeared as usual at the breakfast table the same morning.

"We called on the prisoners, Friday morning, and found Garrington evidently under deep conviction for his sins. He has no further hope of freedom, and no surety but that a violent death may soon be his fate. Jackson is very much younger in crime and has become quite sobered of late. He thinks he has learned a life lesson, and that he will profit by it.

"The money is nearly all accounted for."—Monroe Sentinel, Aug. 26, 1857.

REMOVAL OF GARRINGTON.

of last week, G. U. Davis appeared in town with a requisition from Gov. Chase, of Ohio, and also a warrant for the person of William Garrington alias William Jones, alias William Macy, alias Nebraska Bill, who has been for some time occupying rooms in our county jail. The documents charge upon the prisoner the murder of Cyrus Beebe, a city marshal of Columbus, Ohio, a murder committed in open daylight and in the streets of the city.

"In accordance with the summons, on Friday morning Sheriff Sutherland delivered the prisoner to Mr. Davis, who immediately left with him for Ohio. By politeness of the sheriff, we had a short interview with the prisoner prior to his departure. His manner was calm, and not materially changed from his former appearance, though there was, however, a more anxious and perturbed look upon his face than we had previously noticed. He had evidently passed a restless night, for the summons to leave was considered almost equivalent to a sentence of execution. After taking his seat in the carriage he appeared to be overwhelmed with emotion, and bade some acquaintances 'good-bye, boys, forever.' May God have mercy on him.

"The sheriff retains a memento of his prisoner in the shape of a complete and ingenious set of burglar's tools which had recently been made for use in this locality. They betoken an amount of skill, that should have been exercised in a legitimate business.—Monroe Sentinel, Sept. 2, 1857.

CIRCUIT COURT.

His Honor, Judge J. M. Keep, is now holding the September term of court, in this village. he is disposing of the docket rapidly. Yesterday afternoon, Samuel Jackson was brought into court and plead guilty to the indictment of theft—he having previously pleaded guilty to the indictment for burglary—and received his sentence. After a few preliminary remarks, the court sentenced him for the first indictment, six years confinement in the State prison, the first ten days of each January being solitary confinement; for the second indictment, three years confinement in the State prison at hard labor, the first ten days of July in each year being solitary confinement; the sentence to take effect from Tuesday noon, Sept. 8, 1857.—Monroe Sentinel, Sept. 9, 1857.

ESCAPE OF JACKSON.

"Samuel Jackson whom we mentioned last week as having been sentenced to nine years hard labor in the State prison, for burglary and theft, on Friday morning of last week, made good his escape.

"The escape was made about the hour of 7 A.M., and in manner as follows: By aid of a small strip of wood torn off from the cell partition, he succeeded in picking the key to his cell door out of a lock in the cell opposite, and turning the look up to the grating, unlocked it — as any person can readily do—passed through the open doors into the street and southerly through the village into the woods.

“The officers—sheriff and jailor—came in for a large amount of censure from the public, and naturally enough, since the prisoner could not have escaped without remissness somewhere. The sheriff is principally blamed for not fettering the prisoner’s feet, and the jailor, because he left both doors in the hall opening to the cells unlocked, and in that condition himself left the jail. Our columns are open to these officers to make any explanation or defense they may choose.

“Active efforts have been made since the escape of Jackson, to retake him, but up to the present writing—12 P.M. Tuesday—without success. See reward offered in another column.”—Monroe Sentinel, Sept. 16, 1857.

THE MURDER OF BEEBE.

“Jones, who murdered Cyrus Beebe, in this city, on the 27th of April, 1854, we understand, has two or three aliases. He was sometimes known as William Jones, then as William Mason, and again as Nebraska Bill. The last title is doubtless a fitting one, for there is not much doubt but that he is as bad a Bill as the Nebraska Bill, of Douglas. He is said to take his arrest very calmly, and that he acknowledges that he shot Beebe, but did not know that he killed him He is committed to jail to answer the charge of murder in the first degree. His trial will take place in October next.”—Ohio State Journal, Sept. 1 857.

SAD CASUALTY.

[From the Monroe Sentinel, Sept. 16, 1837.]

On the 9th inst., in the town of Albany, Green Co., Wis., Mrs. Juda Crook, wife of John Crook, while drawing a pail of water at the well by the house, by some means lost her balance and was precipitated to the bottom of the well and instantly killed. The well was eighteen feet in depth, and it is supposed that she had lain there some nine hours before discovered.

MONROE IN 1858.

[From the Monroe Sentinel, Jan. 27, 1858.]

Monroe is the capital and center of Green county, one of the finest counties in the State. It contains about 3,000 inhabitants. It is more substantially built than most of the interior towns, and contains several most elegant brick blocks. Monroe is built upon a gently rolling prairie, skirted on three sides by a belt of heavy timber. Green county is one of the richest and most varied and beautiful, in sources of wealth in the whole State. Its surface is rich, rolling prairie and woodland, interspersed with beautiful streams, and gemmed with thousands upon thousands of springs of sparkling water, which bubble from the base of every hillock. The earth is filled with the richest of lead deposits, and many thousands of pounds are annually raised.

From Mr. Tenney, of the Sentinel, we derive the following information

“The nearest important town on the north is Madison, distant forty miles; on the east, Janesville and Beloit, thirty-five miles; (we have not mentioned Brodhead, which, as a railroad town, will be the principal business point for the four eastern towns of the county;) on the south, Freeport, twenty-six miles; on the west and northwest, Shullsburg and Mineral Point, forty miles each. This allows Monroe for business, twelve towns in Green county, to which add three towns in Stephenson county—Oneco, Winslow and one other—the town of Wayne, Wiota and Argyle in Lafayette county and the town of Waldwick, in Iowa county—the trade of which towns will center to this railroad point—and we have as a result:

TOWNS	SQUARE MILES.
Green County.....	12432
Stephenson County	3108
Iowa County	136
Lafayette County	3108
Total area	684

All of this area is well settled and is the finest portion of all Wisconsin and Illinois for agricultural resources. Some of the towns have been settled twenty-five years.

The trade of 684 square miles, well settled, then, is one reason why Monroe will flourish.

All this region of country has heretofore principally been accommodated at Freeport on the Galena & Chicago Railroad. But few firms in Monroe have done any considerable trade at Milwaukee. They understand the importance of this market for their produce, and will avail themselves of it. Not one quarter of the wheat crop of last year has yet been marketed—all of which will come forward before another harvest. Even with the present low price for wheat, thirty-eight to forty-two cents, at Monroe, they ship enough to pay the expenses of running the branch to that place. About 20,000 bushels of wheat are now in store awaiting shipment.

DEATH OF JOHN B. PERSONS.

[From the Albany Times, June, 1858]

Drowned in Dayton, on Tuesday, the 22d inst., William Persons, aged thirty-seven years, son of John B. Persons. The deceased leaves a wife and five small children, as well as an aged father, to mourn his loss—he being the last of twelve sons and daughters that this aged veteran has been called upon to follow to the grave. The funeral, on the 24th, was attended by a large concourse of people to pay the last sad rites to the departed.

MAN KILLED.

[From the Monroe Sentinel Feb. 2, 1859.]

We are informed that Charles McLane of this village [Monroe], was suddenly killed on Monday evening of the present week, by the overturning of a load of hay upon which he was riding. The accident occurred about eight miles northwest of Monroe, on the Mineral Point road. Our informant says the unfortunate man fell upon a stump, the binding pole at the same time falling upon him, crushing him so badly that he died in five minutes after being carried to the nearest house. He leaves a wife and child to mourn his loss.

TWO VANDERBILT'S.

[From the Brodhead Reporter. Nov. 1859.]

NOTICE.—WHEREAS, my wife, Sarah Vanderbilt, has left my bed and board without just cause or provocation, therefore all persons are forbidden to harbor or trust her on my account as I will pay no debts of her contracting after this date.

D. VANDERBILT.

CLARENCE, OCT 14, 1859.

REPLY TO THE ABOVE.—In reply to the above I would say that so far as my leaving is concerned, it is strictly true; but when he states that I did so without just cause or provocation, he states what not only he and I, but all our neighbors and this community generally, know to be a bare-faced falsehood. Mr. Vanderbilt has been unremitting in his efforts, ever since our marriage, to swindle me out of my property which I held in my own right when I married him, and has succeeded to quite an extent. In regard to board, he knows as well as many others that my money has bought what we have lived upon for the last two years. I therefore forbid any one harboring or trusting him on my account after this date; and I furthermore forbid all persons from purchasing any more of my property from Mr. Vanderbilt, as I shall hold them strictly responsible for the same.

“SARAH VANDERBILT.”

SHOCKING ACCIDENT.

[From the Brodhead Reporter, April 26, 1861.]

We have never been called upon to chronicle an accident in this country more shocking than that which happened at Monroe during the general gathering last Monday evening.

Judd Hurlbut, son of Col. L. Hurlbut, and Edward Morris, son of the Rev. Edward Morris, and other young men of Monroe, were firing a cannon, and, as is often the case, while loading, the gun was discharged prematurely by the heat caused by the rapid firing. The two young men were working at the ramrod.

The right hand of young Morris was completely blown off at the wrist and shivered to atoms—his face frightfully burned and torn by the slivers of the rod. Mr. Hurlbut's left arm was also blown off, his right hand burned and mutilated shockingly, so that half of it has since been amputated.

The shattered arms of both have since been amputated.

Both of them were young men of generous and noble impulses, and men of good habits and bright prospects for the future. They were highly esteemed by all who knew them.

Charles Humphrey, who was thumbing the cannon, had his thumb torn and his face badly burned.

Such accidents as the above are common. Young men are too careless in times of excitement.

STRUCK BY LIGHTNING.

[From the Monroe Sentinel, May 21, 1862.]

On Friday last, near Twin Grove, in the town of Jefferson, Horace Hunt was struck by lightning and instantly killed. Mr. Hunt was at work in the field near a straw stack. He had a team, hired man and two boys with him at the time. The hired man was stunned so severely that he did not recover his consciousness until the team had gone some distance. The boys were also affected so that they were blind for a short time. The electric current struck Mr. Hunt upon the neck and passed down the body and both limbs to his heels. Only about one week ago while Mr. Hunt was taking shelter from a rain storm in a horse stable covered with straw, the stable was struck by lightning and he was stunned; from the effects of which he had not fully recovered.

AN OLD CITIZEN OF MONROE GONE.

[From the Monroe Sentinel, Nov. 26, 1862.]

The following letter from Norman Eastman, our Washington correspondent, brings the sad tidings that one of our old citizens,

D. S. Jones, Esq., is dead. Mr. Jones was a brother-in-law of Mr. Hill, the landlord of the United States Hotel, and we believe well known to most old residents:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Nov. 16, 1862.

EDITORS SENTINEL:—It is with feelings of sorrow that I have to announce to the citizens of Monroe, the death of D. S. Jones, formerly of that place, but latterly a resident of this city. Mr. Jones died on Friday evening, the 14th inst. He has been sick for about six weeks. He has been for several years an invalid, at times suffering from hemorrhoids or piles. Since his residence in this city he has been acting as night watchman in the interior department. His position afforded him a great deal of leisure time, and since the organization of the Soldiers' Aid Society he has devoted that leisure time to the work of looking after and caring for the sick and wounded soldiers. His special field of work was in the hospital of Alexandria. He was faithful, assiduous and untiring in his labors, and by his unremitting kindness and attention he had gained the good will of the hospital officials and attendants, and particularly of the Wisconsin soldiers with whom he came in contact. Many of them will miss him, and with us will have cause to regret his death.

By his unremitting exertions in behalf of the soldiers he aggravated his old disease, which soon prostrated him, and has carried him to his final resting place, a sacrifice upon the altar of his country. Those of us who were daily brought in contact with him, and knew him will deeply mourn his loss, for a faithful co-laborer has left us forever.

Mr. Jones was thirty-eight years of age, and has left a wife and one child to mourn his early departure to the spirit-land, and well may they mourn, for as a husband and father, he was kind and faithful.

His remains will be taken to Baltimore to-day, and buried there by the side of his father and other members of his family.

I remain, yours, truly.

NORMAN EASTMAN, Sec'y.

SUDDEN DEATH.

[February 10, 1864.]

On Wednesday evening of last week, John Ellis, of the town of York, died suddenly, as follows:

He had been in our village with a load of grain and was driving out to the house of Samuel Truax (some three miles from town) to stop for the night. When about half a mile this side of Mr. Truax's he suddenly dropped the lines and tumbled out of the sleigh. A young man named Thurston was riding with him, and immediately seizing the lines and heading the horses for the fence, he hitched them, and hastened back to where Mr. Ellis was lying in the road. Raising him up he discovered a little foam on his lips, but very little sign of life. He called for help, and Mr. Shrake, whose house they had just passed, hastened out. With Mr. Shrake's assistance the body of Mr. Ellis was placed in the sleigh, and Thurston drove rapidly to the house of Mr. Truax, but when he arrived there life was extinct. Justice Rote, of this town, next morning impaneled a coroner's jury, before which evidence was adduced showing that deceased had for some time been subject to occasional fainting spells, originating in heart disease, and they accordingly returned a verdict that he died a natural death of that disease. We learn that Mr. Ellis leaves a wife and three children, in comfortable circumstances, so far as property is concerned.

HORRIBLE AFFAIR.

[Feb. 8, 1865.]

A terrible tragedy was enacted in the southern part of the town of New Glarus on the night of the 5th instant. A German named Joseph Trogner, a farmer in good circumstances, who had been accustomed to loan out money from time to time, had just received some $800 or more from a person who took up a mortgage. The money was paid either Saturday or Sunday, and was kept in Trogner's house. On Sunday night Trogner's daughter, a girl some twelve years old, was aroused by seeing a man enter her bedroom, in the upper part of the house. Instinctively she feigned sleep, and the burglar went to a corner of the room and took from an old almanac the money which Trogner had lately received, and retreated down the stairs.

As he passed Trogner's door, (who, with his wife, was sleeping in a room below) Trogner came out to arrest him. As he opened the door the burglar struck him on the head with an ax, which seemed to stun him for a moment, but he quickly recovered and made at the burglar again. The latter struck him another fearful blow with the edge of the ax, cutting the whole side of his face and head open, and leaving him on the floor apparently in a dying state. Mrs. Trogner then came toward the door, but before she had reached it the miscreant met her inside the room and attacked her with the ax, (the girl looking through a stove-pipe hole from the room above and witnessing the assault,) and struck her three or four blows. With great presence of mind she feigned death, and the burglar left her, after having inflicted several severe wounds. The girl looked from her window, and in the bright moonlight saw the man, dressed as a soldier, stand by the side of the house for some minutes (apparently listening for sounds from within), but after satisfying himself that all was quiet he walked leisurely away up the road.

The girl immediately descended and hastened to the neighbor's in the opposite direction, who, on hearing her story, sent for medical assistance and proceeded as soon as possible to the scene of the double crime. Mrs. Trogner was soon restored so as to be able to make a statement of the facts, but her husband, up to the time our informant left there on Monday was insensible, though still alive. It is thought that Mrs. Trogner may recover, though severely injured, but we believe there is no hope for her husband.

Up to this time no one has been arrested for the crime, though strong suspicions are entertained of his identity. Whoever it was, it is evident that he was no stranger to Trogner's house and the place where he kept his money, as he went as directly to it as if he had himself placed it there. We do not deem it expedient at present to state on whom suspicion rests, but we may learn something further in relation to the matter before we go to press. Meanwhile, we can only hope that the perpetrator of the crime will speedily obtain his just deserts, for society is indeed unsafe if such criminals can long go unwhipt of justice.

NEW GLARUS TRAGEDY.

In the account which we published last week, of the burglary in New Glarus, with its horrid accompaniment, there were some inaccuracies which we will correct today. We stated that the burglar entered a room upstairs, in which a young girl was sleeping, and took the money there from, and that he made no assault on any one until Mr. Trogner attempted to stop him, as he came down stairs. Later information shows that this was incorrect—that the burglar first entered the room where the old people were sleeping, on the first floor, and the girl was a spectator of what took place, (so far as she could be in the dim light) by looking through a stovepipe hole in the floor, from the room above. On the first sound made by the old people, the burglar struck them with an ax, which he had brought in with him, and did not cease until he had silenced them. Mr. Trogner's skull and face are even worse mangled than we stated last week, and we presume there is no probability of his recovery, though he was still alive last Saturday. Mrs. Trogner's arm was broken in several places, and she was otherwise severely injured.

A young man named Friedolin Blum, a returned soldier of the 9th Wisconsin regiment, who had served three years in that organization, has been arrested for the crime, and on examination was held to bail for his appearance at the next term of court, in the sum of $1,500, but failing to give the required security, he was committed to the county jail, where he now is.

We understand that Blum's character, while in the service, was good, and that many who were acquainted with him before enlisting speak well of him. Of course, we are not prepared to say whether he is or is not guilty of the crime attributed to him, and therefore do not wish to manufacture any public opinion on the subject. If he is not guilty, we hope he will be acquitted; if he is guilty, we shall more than ever deprecate the mawkish sentimentality which abolished capital punishment in the State of Wisconsin.

Judge Dunwiddie, who was present at the examination, has furnished us with the following abstract of the testimony given by Mrs. Trogner and her daughter, which will make the case plainer to our readers than anything we can say:

Mrs. Trogner swears that on Sunday night of the 5th of February, after they had all been in bed sometime, and asleep, some person entered the house. She and her husband were sleeping in the room on the ground floor. The person who entered the room made a noise in opening the door, which awakened both her and her husband, and they called out "Who is there?" Immediately the person commenced striking her husband on the head; struck him four or five times. She was making some noise, and then the person commenced striking her; struck her four or five times on right arm and hip. She then feigned that she was dead. Her husband was still, and she supposed him dead. She was now lying on her left side, with her face to the wall. The person who had done the deed then took up her husband's pants, took out a key, went to the bureau and unlocked it, took out a drawer, carried it to the table, and commenced working among the papers. By this time, her husband had come to, and commenced stirring and moving in bed. The person who then was at the table, took up the ax, went back to the bed and again struck him four or five times. Her husband then became still again. The person then returned to the table and stood between her and the window, and she then knew who it was—she saw that it was Friedolin Blum; she knew him by his cap and clothes, and the way he stood. She did not see his face, and only saw him for a moment. She had before thought it was him by the sound of his footsteps in the room, but now she knew him. She was at the time, in the northwest corner of the room, in bed, and when she first knew Blum by his clothes, he was standing at the window—close by the window—on the east side of the house; the moon was shining in the window,—Blum's cap was part fur and part cloth. This was a little before 12 o'clock. There was about $4,000 in money taken.

The young lady testified that she was up stairs in bed, and heard the noise below; was much alarmed; kept quiet until she heard the man below go out of the house, then she got up and looked out of the west window; saw the man down at the spring; he turned and looked up towards the house, and she knew it was Blum; he had on soldier's clothes, blue pants, and had black whiskers.

On the part of the defense, it was proved that Blum had on, that day and evening, citizens dress, and that the spring was four and a half rods west of the house.

DEATH OF DAVID S. ANDRICK.

[From Monroe Sentinel, Feb. 14, 1866.]

We copy the following from the Fort Scott Press, as many our readers were well acquainted with the deceased, and no doubt will feel a deep sympathy for the bereaved ones who mourn the loss of one so favorably known to the citizens of Green county. The Press states that the deceased was buried with Masonic honors, and that the occasion was one of deep interest and emotion:

Died.—At his residence in Fort Scott, Kansas, on Tuesday, the 30th ult., of consumption, David S. Andrick, aged twenty-eight years and fifteen days.

Mr. Andrick came to this county with his parents in 1857, from his former home in Monroe, Wis., and located with them at their residence about a mile west of this town. A few years later he engaged in the drug business in Fort Scott, in which he continued up to the time of his death. During his residence here he has been a member of the city council, and has taken an active and prominent part in all questions of public interest. He married a daughter of our late townsman, A. Walker, who, with one child, is left to share the sympathies as well as the grief of this whole community.

DEATH OF AN OLD CITIZEN.,

[Aug. 29, 1866.]

John Chadwick, for many years a resident of this county, died in this village on the 19th inst., in the seventy-seventh year of his age. Mr. Chadwick came to Green county from Pennsylvania in the year 1837, and was a resident of the county ever since that time, and for the past ten or twelve years lived in Monroe. He was a member of the Baptist Church, and was much respected by his fellow-citizens as a man of sterling integrity and consistent Christian deportment. His remains were followed to the cemetery by a large concourse of our citizens. Mr. Chadwick was a constant patron and reader of this paper from its first issue to the time of his death.

DEATH OF FARLIN BALL.

[Dec. 18, 1867.]

In the village of Juda, Green Co., Wis., on the 4th day of December, 1867, Farlin Ball died, aged seventy-nine years, seven months and one day. This venerable man, whose sudden death has caused much sensation in the two villages where he was well known, was born in the State of Virginia, on the 3d day of May, 1788. When a young man he emigrated with his parents to the now new northwest territory, and settled in what subsequently became Jefferson Co., Ohio. There he married, raised a large family, and spent the greater part of his life. In 1849 he moved to this State, and in 1850 settled in the town of Jefferson, where he remained until his death. His ancestors were English Quakers, from whom he inherited the equanimity, firmness and stability of character peculiar to that class of Christians. Nearly sixty years ago he united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and for that long period maintained an unblemished Christian character.

DIED.

[Aug. 5, 1868.]

Died, at his residence in this village, on the 28th ult., Stephen G. Lombard, M. D., aged forty-seven years.

Dr. Lombard came here from Cayuga Co., N. Y., in the spring of 1851, and from that time until his death has been engaged in the practice of his profession in our town and county. The doctor was extensively known throughout this portion of the State as a man of sterling character, of superior ability in his profession, and as a valuable citizen. He will be missed from among us—his place will not be readily filled—and for many, many years to come he will live in the affection of his friends and in the kindly regard of those who have been blessed by the beneficence of his professional ministrations.

DEATH OF CROTTY.

[Jan. 20, 1869.]

Last Wednesday afternoon, about 3 o'clock, the Monroe House was the scene of a fatal unpleasantness between an Irishman by the name of Patrick Crotty, a well-to-do farmer of this county, and a servant girl, employed in the above mentioned hotel, by the name of Angeline Shroyer, whom Crotty had seduced about two years ago. From various parties we learn the following particulars concerning this terrible affair, and vouch for the truth of the reports only so far as they appear to be the versions of many persons condensed and corroborated:

It seems that Crotty was a gay deceiver, and, among several young and inexperienced girls, Angeline was but one frail creature whom he had wronged, after gaining their affections and promising to marry them. She had obtained a judgment against him for $700, and afterwards consented to a compromise for half the judgment. The Crottys proposed a less sum ($300), but the terms were not accepted.

Some time after these transactions, on the day mentioned, Crotty, his wife (lately married) and mother-in-law came to town, and, after getting well "set up" with courageous whisky, went to beard the lioness in the Monroe House. The proposition to settle was again broached. Angeline would accept the money, but would not sign any papers releasing Crotty from further demands; whereupon the negotiations were broken off. A few minutes thereafter Pat returned, after being warned that Angeline could put up with no more of his abuse, and again commenced calling her names, and very indecent ones, too; where-upon the enraged girl drew a pistol and shot her seducer through the breast, near the heart, and sent the leaden messenger through his body, the same lodging near his back bone. Crotty rushed from the house bare headed, got into his sleigh, and the man who was with him drove off; but, on reaching a distance but a few rods from the hotel, Patrick Crotty expired.

THE OLD SETTLERS' MEETING.

The pioneer settlers of Green county had a very pleasant social reunion in Monroe last Wednesday, the 27th ult. The attendance from all parts of the county was unexpectedly large, considering the brief time the notice had been published.

The meeting was organized in the court house in the afternoon, by the election of O. H. P. Clarno (the oldest resident of Green county now living,) as president, and Hiram Rust as secretary. J. W. Stewart stated the object of the meeting, and entertained the audience with some amusing and interesting incidents of pioneer life in this county. After remarks of a similar character by B. Dunwiddie, Hiram Brown, Hiram Rust and others, and the transaction of some business, the meeting adjourned till 6 o'clock at Turner Hall.

At Turner Hall in the evening, the real festivities of the occasion commenced. Mr. Gleissner, of the American House, had a splendid supper prepared for more than 100 guests, and the cornet band took a position in the gallery, from whence they discoursed good music during the evening. Many of the pioneers brought their wives and daughters with them, and tickets were issued to a limited number of outsiders, so that the hall was comfortably filled with genial gentlemen and ladies, all intent upon having a good time; and so far as we could judge, they were not disappointed.

After partaking of the excellent supper, the house was called to order, and, by request, S. W. Stewart read a lengthy and highly interesting paper, pertaining to the early settlement and history of Green county. (We will say, in this connection, that Mr. Stewart, who is now absent from home, has collected many of the most important facts connected with the early settlement of this county, and has promised to prepare them for publication as soon as he returns.) After brief and amusing speeches and anecdotes by several others, the roll was called, and the following persons reported themselves as having been voters in the county for twenty-five years:

1829—Ezra Gillett.
 1831—James Slater.
 1832—O. H. P. Clarno.
 1833—Noah Phelps, Levi Starr.
 1834—Hiram Rust, Nicholas Cornelius.
 1835—William Beard, Peter Wells, John H. Bridge, O. J. White.
 1836—D. S. Sutherland, Thomas S. Bowen, Asa Richardson, T. J. Bragg, Allen Woodle, Hiram Brown.
 1837—Franklin Pierce, Alexander Morton, John Chadwick, Jotham Chadwick, Joshua Whitcomb, Addi Whitcomb, A. H. Woodle, A. J. Sutherland, Mordecai Kelly.
 1838—David Davis, Sol. Sutherland.
 1839—John Woods, Samuel Truax, J. T. Sutherland, A. W. Sutherland.
 1840—Elijah Evins, J. R. Pace, Ashford Trickle, John Thorp.

1841—John Morrison, Christopher Minert, W. D. Boice, Jesse Robinson, George Michaels, A. Conkey, J. V. Richardson.

1842—J. W. Stewart, B. Dunwiddie, Sylvester Stephens, George Adams, Samuel D. Ball, F. F. West, William McDowell, J. V. Roberts, Thomas Stewart.

1843—Jesse Gist, W. S. Wescott.

DIED.

[July 7, 1869.]

In Albany, Wis., Dr. S Fayette, after an illness of fifteen days, on Friday, July 2, 1869, of apoplexy, aged fifty-seven years, two months and twenty-four days.

Dr. Fayette was born in New Durham, Green Co., N. Y., April 8, 1812, and has resided in Albany, Green Co., Wis., since June 10, 1848.

The remains were interred with Masonic honors in Albany, Sunday, July 4, and a large number of acquaintances followed to the last resting place of earth, a form familiar and beloved. Thus, still another old settler has passed to the "bourne from whence no traveler returns."

ANOTHER OLD SETTLER GONE.

[July 7, 1869.]

We publish in another column the obituary of Hiram Dunwiddie, who died at his residence in the town of Jefferson, in this county, on the 17th of June, 1869.

A friend of the deceased has furnished us with the following brief notice of his history:

In 1843, at the age of twenty-one, he emigrated to Wisconsin and settled on a farm, where he remained till the time of his death. He was a very successful farmer until his health failed him. He left his bereaved family sufficient property to make them comfortable. He was identified with the public officers of the county, from soon after the settlement in the county until within a few years of his death, as a member of the county board of supervisors.

Among his friends and neighbors he always manifested a deep and lively interest in their welfare. In politics he was an earnest and devoted member of the republican party from its organization. In religion he was a Baptist, and had, for many years been a member of the Juda Baptist Church. About six days before his death, he felt that his disease was culminating, and sent for his old friend and family physician, Dr. Hall, who, in company with Dr. Monroe, called to see him. He desired them to state to him, candidly, what they thought of his case.

They informed him that he could live but a short time. He received the information with calmness and composure. He gave his family instructions how to manage when he was gone, made his will, called his family and friends around him, and advised them to make every suitable preparation to follow him. One of the deacons of the Church being present, he said:

"Deacon Davis, tell Elder Patton to request the Juda Baptist Church to prepare to meet me in heaven." Elder Patton preached the funeral sermon, and made an eloquent appeal to the church to heed the admonition.

THE SHROYER CASE.

[Sept. 29, 1869.]

Angeline Shroyer, who was tried last week for the murder of Patrick Crotty, was acquitted by the jury after a trial of nearly four days, ending on Thursday afternoon. The court house was crowded most of the time during the trial, but the room was as quiet as a Quaker meeting, and the trial throughout was conducted in a manner which reflects credit upon this age and generation. District Attorney Douglas, was assisted by Messrs. Conger, of Janesville, and Gardner, of Monroe; and Hon's. B. Dunwiddie and Charles G. Williams, ably conducted the defense.

The court house was filled to suffocation when the announcement went forth on the tones of the bell, that the jury were ready to give their verdict. When the "Not Guilty" was pronounced by the foreman, the accused was immediately released from custody, and left the court house, while a smile of satisfaction was visible upon the faces of all present. Every one in attendance had "predicted" and "told just how it would be." The verdict surprised no one, and the people are content. A purse of money was made up by our citizens last Friday and Saturday, and we are informed that Angeline will immediately go to her friends in Iowa.

THE OLD SETTLERS.

[Feb. 2, 1870.]

The second annual re-union of the old settlers of Green county, held in this village at the court house and Turner Hall, was, everything considered, a very successful and pleasant affair. Several names were added to the roll of members, and such other business as naturally comes before gatherings of this nature was transacted in the afternoon at the court house, when the meeting adjourned to Turner Hall, at 6 o'clock, P. M. Supper was served for the members and invited guests at about 8 o'clock, by J. A. Gleissner, of the American House. The three tables, reaching the entire length of the hall, were liberally patronized by the pioneers of the county, who, with their wives, gave ample proof of the quality of the repast and the healthfulness of the parents of our present civilization. The American cornet band, enlivened the occasion with good music; and, with short speeches by a few who felt like talking, general greetings and talk of old times, the evening was pleasantly and profitably spent by all who attended.

These reunions can, and will, doubtless, be made a permanent institution; and there can be no reason why they might not be so conducted as to be a source of much pleasure and profit to those who came in advance

To hew the forests
And break the way,
For greater things
In a future day.

Let the records be made perfect, and the last days on earth of those who braved the wilds of the unsettled wilderness, to make their circumstances and open up to future generations happy homes, fertile farms, and the general prosperity which we younger citizens now enjoy, be a continued reign of happiness. Let us honor the "old settlers," for their numbers are few and they are passing away, while their children go forth to be hereafter called "old settlers" of other States, and, as yet, unheard of counties.

THE ROLL OF PIONEERS.

The roll as now made up by the secretary, S. V. Richardson, is as follows:

- 1827—E. T. Gardner.
- 1829—Ezra Gillett.
- 1831—James Slater.
- 1832—O. H. P. Clarno.
- 1883—Noah Phelps, Levi Starr.
- 1834—Hiram Rust, Nicholas Conelius.
- 1835—William Beard, Peter Wells, John H. Bridge, O. J. White, John Douglas.
- 1836—D. L. Sutherland, Thomas S. Bowen, Asa Richardson, T. J. Bragg, A. DeHaven, John Cameron, Allen Woodle, Hiram Brown.
- 1837—Franklin Pierce, Alexander Morton, John Chadwick, Jotham Chadwick, Joshua Whitcomb, A. H. Woodle, A. J. Sutherland, Mordecai Kelly, Jonas Shook.
- 1838—David Davis, Sol Sutherland, A. R. Sylvester.
- 1839—John Woods, Samuel Truax, J. T. Sutherland, A. W. Southerland, William C. Green, Justus Sutherland, Melzer Colton.
- 1840—Elizah Evins, J. R. Pace, Ashford Trickle, John Thorpe, Charles Reed.
- 1841—John Morrison, Christopher Minert, W. D. Boise, Jesse Robertson, George Michael, A. Conkey, J. V. Richardson, F. H. Derrick.
- 1842—J. W. Stewart, B. Dunwiddie, Sylvester Stephens, George Adams, Samuel D. Ball, F. F. West, William McDowell, J. V. Roberts, Thomas Stewart, A. L. Cleveland, Donald Johnson.
- 1843—Jesse Gist, W. L. Wescott, J. B. Chase, Daniel Dunwiddie.

TELEGRAPH COMPLETED.

[Aug. 10, 1870.]

The first message over the wire from Milwaukee to Monroe, was sent last Thursday afternoon, and received, in a remarkably short time, at this office. The following is the message and our reply, which was published in the Evening Wisconsin, the same evening.

Milwaukee, August 4.
To the Monroe Press:

Milwaukee to Monroe sends greeting. 'Our lines have gone out through all the earth and our words to the end of the world. Answer.

DEATH OF LIEUTENANT G. D. JENNINGS.

[Nov. 15, 1871.]

Jennings.—In Omaha, on the 5th day of November, 1871, Lieut. G. D. Jennings, aged thirty years, formerly of this place, recently of the V. R. C. U. S. A.

The funeral of Lieut. Jennings was largely attended by the citizens of this place who deeply sympathize with the bereaved family in their great loss. Dud. had been a faithful brother and a dutiful son. Even the vicissitudes and estrangements of a soldier's life could not break the ties which bound him to kindred, nor wean him from those whom he had loved in childhood. He was attended in his last hours by his sister Jennie, who left her duties as clerk in the treasury department at Washington, to go across the continent on her mission of love, and devoted herself to the task of bringing her dying brother to his home. By a series of journeying from San Diego by way of San Rafael, Cal., they reached Omaha, where poor Dud. gave up his sword to the Conqueror of the Universe, and left his faithful sister to journey home with his mortal remains. What peace must she now feel, and enjoy hereafter, to know that her dear soldier brother wanted not a sister's loving hand to soothe his dying pillow. And what comfort and bliss to a faithful soldier—used to the vicissitudes of camp and field—when he wraps the mantle of death about him, to feel the parting kiss of the purest friendship known on earth.

The journey from Omaha, though a sad one, was not so tedious. A sergeant and a file of soldiers were detailed to guard the corpse to this place. The party arrived on the evening train Friday last, and remained at the United States House until Saturday afternoon, when the corpse was taken to the home, from whence he had gone, when he was a mere lad, as a volunteer in the old 3d Wisconsin Infantry.

Lieut. G. D. Jennings was wounded at the battle of Chancellorsville, May 3, 1863, in the side and hip, the ball passing through the body. His wound was a severe one, and was the cause of his early death, as it sapped his vitality, and caused him continual pain. He had hoped to outgrow his injury, and live to a good old age, but when on his last visit to Monroe, he told the writer that he should come back only once more to the old town, and should not go away again.

The record of his deeds, when the country need brave men and true, will ever remain to bless his name, and will be a fitting epitaph. Every soldier of old company C,—there never was such another company "C" in the hearts of Green county—the first which took the flag to defend and lay down their lives to honor, will drop a tear, and in their hearts fire three volleys over the resting place of a brave comrade, gone to "headquarters," "discharged to receive promotion."

The bugle note and rattling drum,
 Shall from dreams ne'er wake him more;
 The lights are out, and ceased the hum
 In the camp by the dark river's shore.

C. _____

DEATH OF AN OLD CITIZEN.

[Sept. 25, 1872.]

Charles S. Foster, well known by the people of Green county as one of the first settlers and public spirited gentleman, died at his residence in this village Sunday morning last, after a short illness. This community will miss Mr. Foster very much, his enterprise and activity in public matters, his many good qualities as a neighbor, friend and husband and father, made him prominent in the community. During his life, for nearly thirty years, he had often been elected to official positions, which he filled with credit to himself and advantage to his constituents. He at different times aided with his influence and money, public enterprises, and was a liberal subscriber to the new manufacturing establishments now being built, He was also a member of the board of education of this place; the subject of common schools having always received a large share of attention from him. His family have the sympathy of many friends who are called to mourn with them in their great loss.

ANOTHER OLD SETTLER GONE.

Jere Chandler, one of the pioneers and a highly esteemed and valued citizen of Monroe passed peacefully from earth, last Thursday, at his residence, where he had lived for many years. "Uncle Jere" as he was called by all who knew him, came to Monroe in 1845, and established his family here, for many years carrying on the wagon making business. He had acquired a good property during his working days, and provided with the aid of her who survives him, a beautiful home of comfort and plenty. "Uncle Jere" was not a noisy man, though his convictions were strong, and he adhered to them constantly. He had been quite feeble for the past two or three years, and prior to his death had been confined to the house for nearly a year. He was seventy-one years of age when he died, and he leaves a host of relatives and friends who will long remember his life of industry and true worth. The funeral took place from the residence, last Sunday, at 9 o'clock A. M. Rev. E. Powell assisted by Rev. Mr. Palmer and Z. H. Howe conducted the exercises and a large concourse of people followed the remains to the last resting place on earth.

Our old men are passing away, one by one, but more rapidly now than hitherto. Those who came before the multitude, to break the way to a prosperous estate for the generations of the future, are growing old, and each year sees the clods heaped above the faithful, manly forms of our old men and women, the grandparents of this prosperous people. Let us cherish them while they stay with us; for it has taken many storms to bleach their locks, and many days of sunshine to tune their smiles, and when they are gone we shall never see their like again.

DEATH OF WILLIAM C. GREEN.

[Aug. 5, 1874.]

In the death of William C. Green, of this village, Green county has lost one of its oldest and best citizens, a man who had filled the measure of life nearly full to its brim, and that, too, with consistent, straightforward works. Mr. Green had been in poor health for more than a year, and he repeatedly told his friends that he expected to leave this country soon and go toward the setting sun.

The deceased came to Green county in 1839, from New York State, and had lived here ever since, rearing a large family; seven children of whom are now living, the oldest being over fifty years old. He was a farmer during the better time of life, and his two sons are now carrying on the farm at "Green's Prairie"—named by the deceased. Besides being a good farmer, Mr. Green was possessed of a good education, and in his younger and older years taught school. He served several years acceptably as school superintendent of Green county, to which position he was elected by the republican party, of which he was a faithful and steadfast member.

William C. Green was born in 1802, and was seventy-two when he died, at 2 o'clock Monday morning, Aug. 3, 1874. The funeral takes place today, Wednesday, August 5, at 11 o'clock.

HONORS TO THE DEAD SOLDIERS.

[June 4, 1873.]

The first upon the list is that of Capt. Oscar F. Pinney, of the 5th Wisconsin Battery, who fell mortally wounded, on the 31st day of December, 1862, at the fearful "battle of Stone River, the horrors of which cannot be exaggerated.

"For three long days the battle raged
In front of Murfreesboro,
And cannon balls tore up the earth
As plows turn up the furrow."

Capt. Pinney lingered in hospital until the 17th day of February, 1863, when he died and his remains were brought home by his brother and buried here.

The testimony of all the members of the gallant 5th Battery, who were with him in that terrific contest, and some of whom I recognize here today, is, that he was a brave man.

Joseph Hall, a member of the 5th Battery, returned home with consumption, contracted or aggravated by the hardships and exposures incident to military duty, and died in the village of Monroe.

Chaplain, C. E. Weirich, 23d Infantry, died at Vicksburg from over exertion on the battle field in behalf of the wounded.

Lieut. Charles Ruf, of the 45th Wisconsin Infantry, died in Madison, Wis., and his remains were brought here for interment.

Sergt. James McQuillan and Plinny D. Muzzy, both of the 31st Wisconsin Infantry, are buried here, but the circumstances and place of their death I have been unable to ascertain.

Thomas Virtue, of the 31st Wisconsin Infantry, died at his home in Monroe, of disease, contracted in the army.

Jacob Ruegger, also of the 31st Infantry, is buried here, but I have learned nothing of his history.

Samuel Hopkins, of the 16th Wisconsin Infantry, died of disease in Monroe.

Oliver Hancock, of the 18th and Edwin Gardner, of the 22d Wisconsin Infantry, died of disease in Monroe.

G. W. Holmes, of the 18th Wisconsin Infantry, was brought home sick from Pittsburg Landing, and died in Monroe.

Hans Gulbrandson, died in Monroe, since the war, of disease contracted in the army.

Elijah McGinlay, of the 23d Wisconsin Infantry, was wounded in battle, returned to Monroe where he died from the effects of his wound.

George McLain, of the 36th Wisconsin Infantry, died in Madison, Wis., and his body was brought here for interment.

Joseph Snyder, of the 38th Wisconsin Infantry, is buried here, but the history of his military service, and the place and cause of his death, are unknown to me.

Francis C. Glascott, of the 30th Missouri Mounted Infantry, died in camp at Memphis, Tenn., of disease, induced by the hardships of military service. His remains were brought here for burial.

The remains of Lucius A. Belden, of the 4th Kansas Cavalry and of William Daggett, of the 6th Kansas Cavalry, rest in this cemetery, but I am unable to give any of the incidents of their history.

Capt. G. D. Jennings, of the United States Army, formerly of the 3d Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers, was seriously wounded at the battle of Chancellorsville. He was distinguished for his gallantry, fought his way to a captaincy in the regular army, went under orders to the Pacific coast, where his failing health, the effect of wounds received in his country's battles, admonished him that his time on earth was brief, and he sought to reach his home that he might die among kindred and friends, but his vitality was not sufficient for the undertaking, and, at Omaha, his brave spirit passed to the better land, and yonder shaft of white marble marks its last resting place. Col. E. M. Bartlett and Col. Ezekiel Clapp, soldiers of the War of 1812, were also buried here.

Of those whose remains are not here, I have the following names:

James McLain, of the 4th Wisconsin Cavalry, died at Baton Rouge, his remains, I believe, are buried there.

John Wyatt was killed at Fort Mahone, in front of Petersburg. I understand his remains are buried somewhere in this county.

Charles Miner fell at the battle of Gettysburg.

Oscar Haley, of the 5th Battery, died at Jacksonville, Tenn., Nov. 5, 1872, of sickness.

John F. Smith, of the 5th Battery, who was well known in Monroe, was killed in the battle of Perryville, Oct. 8, 1862.

Jefferson Feathers was killed in front of Petersburg, June 17, 1864.

Lieut. Almond Smith, of the 5th Battery, died at Iuka, Miss.

Capt. Moses O'Brien, of the 3d Wisconsin Infantry, one of the bravest of the brave, died of repeated wounds received in the fearful conflict of Cedar Mountain.

Stewart Mosher, of the 3d Wisconsin Infantry, whom all the old residents of Monroe well remember, was the first hero who fell a martyr to liberty, from Green county. He was killed at the battle of Bolivar Heights, and was buried near the spot where he gallantly fell, upon the banks of the classic Potomac, whose waters, as they roll through the mountain gorges, on their way to the sea, shall ceaselessly chant his solemn requiem through all the ages to come, till time shall be no more.

DEATH OF JUSTUS SUTHERLAND.

[December 17, 1873.]

“The circle is broken—one seat is forsaken,
One bud from the tree of our friendship is shaken,
One heart from among us no longer shall thrill
With joy in our gladness, or grief in our ill.”

Justus Sutherland died at his residence in the town of Sylvester, in this county, December 6, of pneumonia, after a brief illness. He was born at Rutland, in the State of Vermont, on the 27th day of September, 1797. He lived for a long time in Madison Co., N. Y.; subsequently resided in Illinois, and, in 1836 he moved to Green Co., Wis., where he reared a large and highly respectable family, and by industry and good judgment he acquired considerable wealth, and where, at the end of a long and active life, he has been cut down like a shock of corn fully ripe in its season, and consigned to the “narrow house appointed for all the living.” Mr. Sutherland lived in this county thirty-four years, and was one of its earliest settlers. The brave, enterprising and adventurous spirits who constitute the vanguard of civilization, who carry the implements of husbandry, and the habits of industry into the wilderness, or those of them whose rude cabins usurped the places where stood the red man's wigwam in southern Wisconsin, knew him well, and called him to many positions of honor and trust; and the few who remain of the companions of his manhood's prime, say that he never betrayed the confidence which they reposed in him, and that at all times, and under all circumstances he stood a grand specimen of God's noblest work, an honest man. He was a person of most exemplary habits, and his loss will be deeply felt beyond the circle of his immediate relatives, beyond the neighborhood in which he lived, by all who knew him, but by none more keenly than by those who shared with him the dangers, hardships and privations of pioneer life. Ten sons and daughters of mature years stood around his coffin and listened to the falling clods whose resonance spoke to all of man's mortality. His neighbors and friends came from far and near to perform the last sad rites, and pay the last melancholy tribute of respect, until the funeral cortege assumed proportions greater than ever before witnessed in this county. It is a consolation to his friends, that his last hours were tranquil, and that he passed quietly and painlessly to the other, and happier shore.

“As a cloud of the sunset slow melting in heaven,
 As a star that is lost when the daylight is given,
 As a glad dream of slumber, which wakens in bliss
 He hath passed to the world of the holy from this.
 He has gone but a little before us,
 We can only say, now, in the words of the poet:
 Farewell a little time, and we
 Who knew thee well, and loved thee here,
 One after one shall follow thee
 As pilgrims through the gate of fear
 Which opens on eternity.”

A SENSATION FOR WINSLOW.

[Aug. 19, 1874.]

About eleven years ago a man by the name of Alvy Gaylord left the neighborhood for California, leaving a wife and children. For some years he had been given up as lost to his family, and his wife was declared a widow. A few days since a man claiming to be the husband of Mrs. Gaylord came to Winslow and succeeded in making the widow and her son believe that he was the identical Gaylord, and he was taken to the bosom of his family. He immediately set about disposing of property belonging to the estate preparatory to returning back to California. Here a brother of Gaylord comes forward and declares the would be “Alvy” an imposter and that he is not the true husband of the widow. But the son of his mother declares that the stranger is his own father. Now, it is not every boy that knows his own father—especially after he has been gone eleven years, and when he left home the boy was quite young. But so determined was the brother to expose the imposter that the whole affair was noised about, and parties who had known Gaylord in days of yore came forward to identify him. It seems that Gaylord had a finger torn off by a threshing machine before he went away, he also had one foot split open on top in an early day. This man had no such marks. Then comes one certain Mr. Burbridge, who walks up to the stranger and offers him $2 to show his arm. There was a mark on it he would like to see. The stranger scouted the idea of showing his arm but he finally was induced to do so. There in deep blue were the initials “J. T.,” John Traverse, well known by all the neighbors. John Traverse, of California, who evidently knew Gaylord and his family, as he spoke familiarly, calling them all by name. He knew his neighbors too, and they knew him now. He had married a daughter of Burbridge fifteen years ago, and had gone off to California. An old woman had recognized him a few days before this singular denouement, when he was making inquiries about the Burbridge family. “Did they know of a man who had married a daughter of Burbridge, year ago and run away to California.” They knew such a man, and “Thou art the man,” said an elderly woman. So, on Monday the brother of Alvy Gaylord demanded the arrest of Traverse. A warrant was made and a posse undertook to capture him in the street at about 3 o’clock P. M. He drew two revolvers, and retreated to the house of widow Gaylord, where he barricaded himself in a room up stairs. Four men, braver than the rest, John Gordon, Lou Blair, Peters, and Lloyd, volunteered to go in and take him for the sum of $20, well knowing that that amount might possibly be necessary, to bury some one or more of them, for they were bearding a lion in his den. The door was burst open, and a rapid firing of pistols ensued, but without hurting anybody seriously. Traverse alias Gaylord, was wounded, a ball had traversed the arm that bore the tell tale, “J. T.” and it was strongly suspected that the stranger had tried to wipe out the “dammed spot,” but it wouldn’t out. The alias is now in custody, and parties have gone to Winslow to identify him, and there can be little doubt that he will be put "where he can do the most good." Where that place shall be is not for us to say, at present.

DEATH OF JOHN BRIDGE.

[June 11, 1884.]

On Thursday evening last a telegram was received by George B. McLean informing friends in this city [Monroe] of the death of John H. Bridge, who left this place in excellent health, with his son, Joseph, to visit in Iowa, Kansas and take a trip west through Colorado, and California, to see the lands beyond the Mississippi. A letter received by relatives Monday last, which was written from some place in Colorado, stated Mr. Bridge had had an attack of cholera morbus, had been very ill, but was recovering. The deceased was about seventy years old, was one of the old settlers of the county and was unusually vigorous. His death is a great surprise to his friends here. He had lived an industrious, plodding sort of life until within a few years, when he retired from farming to live in Monroe, investing in real estate, and receiving a handsome income from his accumulated wealth.

AN EXPENSIVE EPISODE.

"Bless me this is pleasant., Riding on a rail."

Saxe.

In a previous chapter mention has been made of an oath being prepared during the war for the citizens to subscribe to, which some refused to take and that, as a consequence, one citizen a resident of Sylvester was ordered to keep outside the limits of the village of Monroe, and another—a citizen of Clarno—was treated to a free ride part of the way home, on a rail. The last method of treating obnoxious persons did not, however, work well when again tried except for the time being. A Mr. Steves, of Durand, happened to be in Monroe and took occasion to denounce the proceedings which required the taking of the oath. At this point, we cannot do better than give the particulars as recited in Miss Bingham's history:

"He [Steves] was denouncing the proceedings in a violent manner, when some one remarked that probably Mr. Steves had better take the oath. A crowd formed, and escorted him to the court house, and summoned Mr. Rote from his supper table to administer the oath. Mr. Rote read it and asked the prisoner if he would subscribe to it. Being answered in the negative, he said nothing more, for by that time the office was so full of men who wanted to take it that he was obliged to light a candle and go up into the court room to accommodate them. When about sixty men had been sworn, proceedings up stairs were interrupted by a cry that those who had been laboring with the man below were riding him out of town on a rail. Mr. Steves' fate made "copperheads" cautious about expressing themselves in Monroe; and his resistance taught Union men to be less busy in seeking out offenses. This was the last encounter of the kind during the war, but it was long before men heard the last of this. Mr. Steves brought suit against twelve citizens of Monroe. In selecting the twelve, he was assisted by Monroe men whose opinion of the war was the same as his own. All those selected were zealous supporters of the war, and most of them were members of the committee of fifteen appointed the 29th of July; but a majority of them were opposed to such violent measures as were adopted in Mr. Steves' case, and some of them did not reach the square that night until the work was done. One of those sued was Mr. Rote, whose part in the affair has been told. On the other hand, some who helped carry the rail were not mentioned in the suit. The case was tried in 1865 in Milwaukee; Judge Miller presided, and during the trial gave vent to his feelings by exclamations of 'oh!' and 'horrible!!' The disunion element predominated in the jury, and damages was awarded Mr. Steves to the amount of $5,000 and costs."

CHAPTER XXIII.

COUNTY BUILDINGS AND POOR FARMS.

When, on the 26th of March, 1838, the "commissioners court" (as the county board was first called) got together for the first time, there was no house belonging to the county for them to meet in, and they were compelled to hire a room for that purpose. At that meeting it was resolved by the commissioners that the district court should be held at the house of Jacob Ly Brand until otherwise ordered. Of course the necessity for a court house was at once felt and it was not long before a temporary one was provided for.

OF THE THREE COURT HOUSES.

On the 8th day of July, 1840, the county commissioners

"Ordered, That the clerk of this board give notice, by posting up in three or more of the most public places in this county, notices that sealed proposals will be received by the clerk of this board at his office, until the first Monday of August next, for the building and enclosing a two-story frame house, 20x30 feet, in the town [village] of Monroe, for a temporary court house, said proposals to designate particularly the size and description of the timber, quality of shingles and siding, etc. Bond and security will be required to the faithful performance of said contracts."

On the 4th day of August, 1840, the following entry was made in the record of the "commissioners court:"

"WHEREAS, Proposals were ordered to be received, and have been received by the clerk of this board, for the purpose of erecting a two-story building in the town of Monroe, for the purpose of a temporary court house, be it

"Ordered, That the proposals of James Campbell and A. J. Sutherland be accepted by this board, and that they give bond in the penal sum of $900 for the faithful performance of said contract, to the board of commissioners of the county of Green, agreeable to the tenor and effect of said proposals on file, to be completed on or before the 1st day of December, 1840."

This building was accepted on the 4th of November, as appears by the following entry upon the record of the board:

"WHEREAS, James Campbell and Andrew J. Sutherland are bound to the board of commissioners of the county of Green, by bond, dated Aug. 4, 1840, to erect a two-story building for the purpose of a court house in the town [village] of Monroe, and in the opinion of the court, the condition of the said bond has been complied with, it is "Ordered, By this court that the said house and job of work be received and that an order be made out to them for the balance due them on said contract, amounting to $150.30."

But this temporary court house soon after took fire accidentally and was totally destroyed. It was erected on the lot upon which is now (1884) the United States House, owned and occupied by Louis Schuetze, as a hotel.

The next spring, the county commissioners agreed with Demas Beach to lend him $400 for six years, for which consideration he was to erect a building in which the county should have the use of certain rooms. This building,

HISTORY OF GREEN COUNTY.

afterward known as the American House, had a court room and county offices on the second floor, while the ground floor was used for a store and dwelling. When court was not in session, a shoe shop was kept in the jury room. The building was ready for use in November, 1841, as appears by the following entry upon the record of the board:

“Nov. 1, 1841;

Ordered, That the county commissioners’ court be hereafter held at the court house in the town [village] of Monroe.”

This so-called court house was occupied until April, 1846, when another one took its place. As to the last mentioned structure, the one which is still to be seen (1884) in the center of the public square, we have the following record from the “commissioners’ court:”

April 23, 1844.

Ordered, That William Dunten, of Rochester, Racine Co., Wis. Terr., be employed to build a court house in Monroe, Green Co. Wis. Terr., for the sum of $3,500 said building to be put up with brick and in all things agreeing with the plan and specification on file in the clerk’s office, for which said Dunten is to receive payment as follows, to-wit: One payment is to be made when the foundation or stone work is done, to two-thirds of the amount of the estimated value of the work done and materials furnished, one-half of which payment is to be made in drafts on the county treasury and the other half to be made in bonds issued by the board of county commissioners, bonds drawing interest from the 1st day of January next. One payment is to be made when the brick work is done to two-thirds the amount of labor and materials furnished, one-half of which payment is to be made in drafts on the county treasury and the other in bonds issued by the board of county commissioners with interest, and the remainder to be paid in bonds drawn by the board of commissioners on the 1st day of August 1845 or when the job of work shall be completed; and, he it further ordered that said Dunten file his bond with approved security for the performance of said work.” The work of “William Dunten, of Rochester,” still stands; but, as a “magnificent temple of justice,” worthy of Green county, it cannot be said to be a success. It is neither useful nor ornamental. It will soon be torn down and a new court house erected.

FIRE PROOF BUILDING.

The increasing business of the county and the danger of fire consuming the valuable county records, induced the county board to order the erection of a fire proof building as an “overflow,” so to speak, to the court house. Therefore, on the 4th day of June, 1857, it was “Resolved, That a building be erected for the county offices, and that the same be located on lots 132 and 133 in Ly Brand’s donation to the county of Green, and that there be a committee appointed by this board to superintend the erection of the same.

[Signed] "WILLIAM BROWN.”

The following is also taken from the records of the county board:

“Nov. 20, 1857.

“The committee appointed to superintend the construction of a fire proof building for the different county offices, beg leave to submit the following in addition to the foregoing report of the chairman of said committee now absent, he being sick and unable to attend the meeting of the board. The statement accompanying the report of the receipts and expenditures shows an amount of receipts of $1,600 and disbursements of $1,563, leaving a balance of $37 in the hands of the chairman, and would further report and beg leave to submit the plan and specifications, contract and bond as a part of their report, and would say that they have examined the material used, and have frequently examined the work in the course of its construction, and believe that Mr. Brewer has done a fair, honest and honorable job in the erection of said fire proof building, but has not completed the job by the time the contract called on the old site on lands owned by the county of Green where the old log jail stood.

“Your committee would further recommend that the building committee be authorized to sell said old site and purchase another within the limits of the village of Monroe if thought advisable by the said building committee, provided such exchange should not increase the amount in building said jail, but to the contrary, provided further, that such site should not be located upon the public square.

ISRAEL SMITH,
Chairman of Com.

“Report accepted and laid on the table voted to take up the report of committee on estimation of cost of draft and building. Voted to adopt the size for the jail recommended in the report of the above committee.

“On motion to build the jail of stone the ayes and noes were called the vote stood, ayes Messrs. Smith of Adams, Smith of Clarno, Smiley, Flood, Brown, Ball, Munson, Hurlbut, Jenny, Pengra, 10. Nays, Messrs. Clark, Leonard, Johnson, Roby and Green, 5; carried.

“Voted that the walls be built of range work in the ordinary way, except that part of the second story which shall enclose the cells of the prisoners, and which shall be of blocks of range work running the whole thickness of the wall, and of the same length both on the outside and inside.

“May 23, 1855.

“On motion of Mr. Smith of Adams, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That the height of the main wall of the jail edifice, from its foundation to the bottom of the first tier of joists be not less than seven feet, and its thickness not less than two feet, that from the bottom of the first tier of joists to the bottom of the second tier, the height be not less than nine feet six inches, and the thickness not less than twenty inches, and that from the bottom of the second tier of joists to the bottom of the third tier, the height be not less than nine feet and the thickness of not less than eighteen inches.

“Voted to take up the report of committee on location.

“Voted to strike out all of said report after the re-consideration.

“On motion to adopt the remaining part of the report, Mr. Smith of Adams moved to amend by adding as follow: and that it be left to the building committee, either to erect that edifice on the ground on which it formerly stood or on any other lot within the village limits the public square excepted, as to them shall be deemed most advisable, and best adapted to promote the public advantage.

“Voted to take up the report of the committee on finance.

“Voted to adopt the report. Mr. Ball offered the following resolution which was adopted:

Resolved, That this board appropriate the sum of $3,000 for the use of the building committee to be expended in the construction of the jail, leaving such other amount as may be necessary for its completion to be appropriated by the board at its November session.”

On the 24th of May, 1870, the county board determined to build a new jail and jailor's residence” on the old jail site.” The jail building committee of the county board, by their final report showed that the cost of the new jail, including $1,800 “for the purchase of Beebe lots,” was $25,405.69. This report was submitted, Nov. 25, 1871.

The jail is built of stone, brick and iron. The brick upon the outside are white. The sheriff's dwelling is about 40x20 feet, two stories. The jail part is two stories in height and contains eight cells. This part is of stone, brick and iron. The whole on the inside is encased with boiler iron. The cells are made also of boiler iron and are set inside of an inclosure of iron bars. There is a ward for females separate from the jail proper. This is likewise encased in boiler iron and contains room for six beds. No one has as yet broke this jail. The building is heated by a furnace. The jail is located on lot 152, in Ly Brand's donation.

GREEN COUNTY POOR FARMS.

The first poor farm purchased in Green county was in the town of Mount Pleasant in 1861. It was used about sixteen years and then sold. Light is thrown on the transactions resulting in buying of this farm by the following extracts from the record of the county board:

"Nov. 21, 1860.

"E. R. Allen made a motion that the sum of $1,500 be appropriated to purchase a poor farm.

"D. S. Sutherland moved to amend by inserting $2,000 instead of $1,500. The vote being taken on the amendment, eight members voted for the amendment and seven against it. The amendment carried, and the sum of $2,000 was appropriated for said purpose, this sum to be placed in hand of the superintendents."

"Dec. 21, 1860.

"Mr. Flood offered the following resolution, to-wit:

"Resolved, By the county board that $2,000 of the expected surplus in the treasury be placed at the disposal of the superintendents of county poor for the purpose of purchasing a county poor farm and defraying such other expenses as they shall deem proper in the performance of their duties as superintendents of the county poor.

"On motion, said resolution was adopted."

The following concerning the first poor farm and poor house is from the Brodhead Reporter of May 24, 1861:

"Hiram Rust, Esq., of Monroe, and D. Drake, Esq., of Mount Pleasant, were in town yesterday, and gave us a call. They are about purchasing lumber for the building on the poor farm in Mount Pleasant and were here getting prices from our lumber dealers. The building is to be of wood, with a basement of stone; three stories in height, including the basement; size of building 24x36 feet.

"The farm contains 130 acres of rich and productive land, pleasantly located in the town of Mount Pleasant. Cost of farm $2,900. "From all that we can learn, having heard both sides, the pretended dissatisfaction on the part of some in the county with the action of the superintendents arises more from outside causes than anything else. We believe the superintendents acted in good faith, and performed their duty as they understood it; and we believe farther that no better selection of a farm could have been made. They have kept within the limit of their means, and have made a judicious appropriation of them. They are candid and honorable men.

"The work on the building will be prosecuted as rapidly as possible, and the building ready for use in a few weeks."

"Nov. 15, 1861.

"Money drawn from the treasury for pool purposes by the county superintendents of the poor is as follows, to-wit:

Upon May 20, by county order.....	$250.00
July 22,	250.00
Aug. 19,	500.00
Sept. 9,	750.00

Making in all. $1,750.00

"With the above money the superintendents have built a county poor house 27x33 feet, two stories above the basement.. The cost, separate from boarding the hands, amounts to $773.38 furnished with ten comfortable beds, twelve chairs, five stoves, dishes to feed twenty persons.

"Nov. 12, 1862.

"The superintendents of the county poor presented the following report, which was adopted, to-wit:

"To the Hon. Board of Supervisors:

"The superintendents of the poor of Green county herewith submit this, their annual report:
 The county poor farm. 130 acres cost $2,900.00
 Improvements thereon since purchase 850.00
 Amount of personal property 720.53
 Total of real and personal property $4,479.53

EXTRACT FROM THE MONROE SENTINEL.

On the 20th of June, 1877, the county superintendents of poor were instructed by county board to sell the old county poor farm "in the best possible manner."

The poor farm (a small part having previously been sold) was disposed of March 1, 1878, by William Brown, Daniel Smiley and Cyrus Troy, "county superintendents of poor of the county of Green, in the State of Wisconsin," to Simon Brown, for the sum of $4,000.

On the 15th day of May, 1879, the county of Green purchased of Samuel Truax "the northwest quarter of section twenty-seven (27); the west half of the northeast quarter of said section twenty-seven (27); also the east half of the southwest quarter of section twenty-two (22); all in township No. two (2) north of range No. seven (7) east in said county of Green, and State of Wisconsin," for the sum of $12,000, as a poor farm. The new farm contains 320 acres, more or less, and is located in the town of Monroe, about two miles northwest of the city of Monroe.

When on the 21st day of June, 1877, it was determined by the county board to build a new poor house on the poor farm last purchased, it was resolved that it "should be built of brick, two stories high, not exceeding in cost $6,000." What kind of a house was built, and what was its entire cost, will more fully appear hereafter.

COUNTY INSANE ASYLUM.

On the 18th of November, 1881, $2,000 were appropriated to build an asylum for the chronic insane of Green county, on the poor farm, not to exceed in cost, $6,000. The building was let to Churchill, Dodge & Soaper, contractors, for $6,390. The building was completed in the fall of 1882.

The building is 34x68 feet; is two stories in height; and has a capacity for forty inmates. The number of the insane at present (1884) in this asylum, is thirty-six. R. C. Whitcomb, the overseer of the poor house and farm, is also overseer of the asylum, at this time (1884) and has been since its opening for patients.

CHAPTER XXIV.

LITERATURE--SCIENCE--ART

LITERATURE.

In the domain of English literature, there has been, in Green county, no one in the past, nor is there one at the present time, who has achieved a national reputation nor even, perhaps, one co-extensive with the limits of the State; but several have written fugitive pieces of poetry published in the county papers of considerable merit; and there are not a few who, in prose, have done themselves equal credit. One book, however, has been written in Green county, of a high order of merit, and is deserving of special commendation. It is the "History of Green County, 'Wisconsin,'" by Helen M. Bingham. It was published in 1877 and is a small 12 mo. volume of 310 pages. The author, in her excellent preface, says:

"In the effort to make this history correct, a great many letters have been written, and a great many visits have been made in the several towns. Assistance has been received from over 200 persons, more than one-fourth of whom came to the county before 1840, some of them before 1830. With all the avidity of Dryden's reaper, who

'——fills his greedy hands
And binds the golden sheaves in brittle bands,'

I have seized upon these individual gleanings from memory's field and bound them together." And thus she concludes:

"With just one plea in its behalf, the history is now submitted to the people of Green county. The plea is this: It is often said, though whether the saying originated with an unsuccessful historian cannot now be ascertained, that 'that people is most fortunate whose history is most wearisome to read. Will those to whom this history is the dullest and most monotonous of books have the charity to infer that Green is the most fortunate of counties?"

But the fair author is altogether too modest. She has written a book which is neither dull nor monotonous, and one which, it may safely be said, has been fortunate for Green county. It is the best county history, not biographical, written by any Wisconsin historian. The style of the author is terse and lively and her generalizations are marked with much more than ordinary ability. There is but one matter of regret connected with the publication of Miss Bingham's history, and that is, that so few of the citizens of Green county have purchased the book and attentively perused it. It is worthy a careful reading by all.

HELEN MARIA BINGHAM

was born in Monroe, Green Co., Wis., Oct. 10, 1845. She is the daughter of the late Judge John A. Bingham and Caroline E. Bingham, (nee Churchill) who is still living, and is a resident of Green county. Dr. Bingham received her early education in Monroe. She afterwards attended the State University at Madison and Lombard University, in Galesburg, Ill., graduating from the latter in 1867. She has taught school not only in Wisconsin but in Arkansas, and was, at one time, an instructor in her Alma Mater. She was, also, employed for awhile on the Janesville Gazette. She is the author of the "History of Green County, Wisconsin," published in 1877, mention of which has already been made in this chapter. In the fall of 1877, Miss Bingham went to Boston, and the succeeding spring began the study of medicine. She graduated from the Boston University School of Medicine, in June, 1881, with honors. In January, 1882, she established herself in the practice of her profession in Milwaukee, where she now (1884) resides.

EXTRACTS FROM THE MONROE SENTINEL.

I.—HELEN M. BINGHAM.

[July 27, 1870.]

Helen Bingham, daughter of the late John A. Bingham, of this place, will take up the editorial pen and scissors for the Janesville Gazette, next Monday or Tuesday, as assistant editor. Miss Bingham is a young lady of good taste, education, and, what is worth still more, is possessed of that rare quality, good common sense. She will undoubtedly make an efficient and valuable acquisition to the Gazette, as a writer and compiler of entertaining and instructive reading. We wish her success in her new vocation.

II—A CARD.

[March 15, 1876.]

To Miss HELEN M. BINGHAM:
Monroe, March 1, 1876.

The undersigned residents of Monroe feeling confident of your ability to give an entertaining and instructive lecture upon some literary subject of your own choice, extend to you a pressing invitation to do so at some future time, to be selected by yourself, for the benefit of the Young Ladies' High School Literary Society

A. C. Dodge, Edmund Bartlett, P. J. Clawson, W. W. Chadwick, F. R. Melvin, J. Bolender, C. Payne, A. S. Douglas, H. Medberry, B. Dunwiddie, A. M. Wolcott, Z. H. Howe, P. W. Puffer, E. M. Bartlett, J. H. Foster, H. W. Whitney, Lewis Rote, John C. Hall, William Monroe, J. B. Treat, Lewis McKahn, S. W. Abbott, W. E. Noble, E. P. Treat, W. P. Woodworth, J. S. Harper, J. B. Galusha, J. H. Van Dyke, F. S. Parlin, C. A. Booth, N. B. Treat, William Gray, W. S. Wescott, J. S. Smock, H. N. Bradshaw, John Chadwick, I. T. Carr, A. W. Goddard, C. E. Adams, D. W. Ball, Henry Tschudy, George B. McLean, Henry Ludlow, William W. Wright. Messrs.. Dodge, Bartlett, Douglas, Chadwick, and others

I thank you for the invitation of March 1.

I am anxious for the society to succeed in the work it has undertaken. Therefore, though I feel that you have done me an unmerited honor, I accept the invitation, leaving the time of the lecture to be determined by the society.

Respectfully,

HELEN M. BINGHAM.

Dated Monroe, March 13, 1876.

Helen M. Bingham will lecture at the Universalist Church, on Tuesday evening, March 21, upon the "Early History of Monroe." Miss Bingham has lived here all her life. Her father came to Monroe in 1841, and was the first county judge of this county.

SCIENCE.

The attention of the people of Green county, as well as of those of other counties of the State, have of late years been drawn more and more to the importance of a scientific education as one calculated not only to develop the powers of the mind, but easily to be put in practice. In this utilitarian age, mere theories go for little. What is demanded is that which is practical. Knowledge is perpetuated and aided by literature; systematized, by science. As one of Green county's representative men in a profession dealing largely with scientific research, mentioned may be made of

JOSEPH T. DODGE,

who was born at Barre, Vt., May 16, 1823, and who is the son of Joseph and Azubah (Thompson) Dodge, both natives of the same place. The "Dodge" family in the United States is now very numerous, but believed to have a common ancestor. A large branch of it has descended in a direct line from Richard Dodge, a native of England, who became a citizen of Salem, Mass., Aug. 29, 1638. A well authenticated family register, in possession of our subject, shows him to be a lineal descendant of the said Richard in the seventh generation, the intermediate links in the genealogical chain being

Joseph, a younger son of (Richard), born 1651; Joseph, Jr., born 1676; Elijah, born April 18, 1709. Thus far the family had continued to reside in Beverly, Mass., originally a part of Salem. Elijah married Dorcas Brown and removed to Winchester, N. H., where he died at a ripe old age, and where his wife also died, October 1809, aged 100 years and six months. He had three sons—Elijah, Joseph and Nathaniel Brown. The last named married Lydia Barber, in 1761, and removed to Barre, Vt., where he raised a large family, and died in 1823. One of his sons, Asa, born in 1770, married Abigail Blodgett, and became the father of Joseph, who was born in 1795, and who married Azubah Thompson, in 1818, and became the father of our subject, who perpetuates his name (which seems to have been a favorite patronymic with the family) affixing to it, however, the maiden name of his mother. Thus far the successive generations had been tillers of the soil and had, by the sweat of their brows, wrung a frugal subsistence from the rocky hill sides of their native New England. Their habits were simple, their lives blameless and contented; they were a hardy and long-lived race, blessed with physical vigor and vital force, and were not disobedient to the divine injunction regarding the perpetuation of their kind. On the maternal side our subject is descended from James Thompson, a native of the north of Ireland, of Scotch Covenant stock, born 1671, who emigrated to America in 1712, in company with his son Samuel, born 1698, and settled in Holden, Mass. The latter was the father of Capt. Samuel Thompson, born 1735, who served in, the Revolutionary War, four of whose sons and two of whose daughters afterward settled in Barre, Vt. The Thompson's also belong to the agricultural classes, and were mainly long lived. The mother of our subject, however, was an exception to the rule; she died at the age of thirty-three, and bequeathed to her son a slender frame but an active nervous organization. Joseph Thompson Dodge attended the common district school till the age of sixteen. In 1839 he entered

Newberry Seminary, where he was prepared for Dartmouth College, which he entered in 1841, but not enjoying the atmosphere of the institution, he was honorably dismissed by letter at the end of one year, and admitted to Vermont University, from which he graduated with honors in 1845, ranking the first in his class in mathematics. During the latter part of his college experience he determined to devote his life to the profession of civil engineering, the various lines of railroad then in course of construction and in contemplation seeming to offer an inviting field in this department. The Vermont Central Railroad Company, then being organized, afforded the desired opening, and he served an apprenticeship of three years as assistant engineer of this road, and until the completion of the work. The building of a railroad through this part of Vermont was, perhaps, the best school of discipline that an incipient in the art of enginery could have enjoyed, and proved to be an excellent recommendation to him in after life. In 1849 he was employed to make the preliminary survey for a projected railroad from Montpelier to Bradford, Vt., by the way of his native town of Barre. Having completed this, he, in the following autumn, removed to the west, and after visiting the principal cities of Illinois and Missouri, accepted a subordinate position on the macadamized roads of St. Louis county, in the last named State, his principal being J. B. Moulton, Esq., who has since played a conspicuous part in developing that city and the State of Missouri, and for nine months had charge of the work on the St. Charles road. In 1850 he engineered the Illinois Coal Company's railroad, from East St. Louis to Caseyville, Ill. Soon after the completion of the track, however, all the bridges and embankments were swept away by the high floods of the Mississippi which occurred in 1851. The disaster proved to be a serious loss to the company, and for a time laid an embargo on the work. In 1852 he obtained a contract on the Missouri Pacific Railroad and spent that year in directing the work, but the climate proving injurious to his health, he resolved to move farther northward, and in the spring of 1853 settled in Milwaukee, Wis., and during the five years following was engaged in engineering on Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, having control of the work, first from Stoughton to Madison, and afterwards from Janesville to Monroe. During this period he invested largely in real estate in the county of Green and in the city of Monroe, and thereby laid the foundation of the large estate that has so amply rewarded his industry and wisdom.

The money panic which prevailed in 1857 and following years laid a temporary embargo on railroad construction, and Mr. Dodge retired to the then village of Monroe, and was employed by the corporation to take the oversight of the improvements provided for in the new charter, which he carried to successful completion. In 1860—61 he published a very complete map of Green county and the State of Wisconsin, which has since been the standard authority on matters of geography within its scope. During the last named year he also served several months as clerk of the mustering and disbursing officer of the United States army at Madison. From January, 1862, to July, 1863, he was principal of the high schools of Monroe, a position for which his thorough education and large experience eminently fitted him. In the autumn of 1863 he was employed on the Minnesota Central Railroad and placed in charge of the work between, Minneapolis and St. Paul. He also engineered the Winona & St. Peter Railroad from Rochester to Kasson, and made its location through Dodge and Steele counties. In 1866 he made the location of the La Crosse, Trempealeau & Prescott Railroad, but owing to a difference of opinion which arose between himself and the officers of the company, he resigned his position and for a time retired with his family to his early home in Vermont. Returning to Monroe in April, 1867, he bought a three-fourths interest in the Monroe Planing Mill Company, of which he intended to take the management, but receiving an overture from the general government, he spent the following year in making a survey of the battlefields in the Atlanta campaign. For the next three years, ending March, 1871, he was resident engineer of the Winona division of the St. Paul & Chicago Railroad, and during the two succeeding years held the position of chief engineer of the line, completing the work at La Crescent.

It is worthy of note here, as illustrating the accuracy of Mr. Dodge, as an accountant, that although during the last named period, over $1,000,000 had been disbursed by him, yet, a rigid audit of the accounts, failed to reveal an error of even one cent. Subsequently he was chief engineer of the Hastings & Dakota Railroad, and directed its construction from Carver to Glencoe. He also engineered the McGregor & Missouri River Railroad, from Algona to Spencer, Iowa. At this point we will make a slight digression, in order to place on record a matter of history, which cannot be otherwise than gratifying to our subject. In the fall of 1871, he had made the location of the St. Paul & Chicago Railroad, from Winona to La Crescent, and after a careful survey of the river—its banks, channels, islands and bottom lands—for two miles, he made a location of the bridge that was to span its channel at La Crosse, and connect that line with the La Crosse division of the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, which was immediately staked out, and has since become celebrated, as the location of the La Crosse bridge. The citizens of La Crosse, however, interposed objections to the proposed site, because it did not terminate in the heart of their city, and much local feeling was engendered by the circumstance. The late secretary of war, Gen. Belknap, lent himself to the citizens of La Crosse, and appointed a commission of three government engineers, who twice reported against the location in question. An injunction was obtained from the United States circuit court, to restrain the company from proceeding with the construction of the bridge, but the court in rendering the opinion commented so severely upon the injustice of the proceeding, that the opinion itself became one of the strongest grounds for contesting the decision. In the trial of the case, six of the most eminent civil engineers of the northwest had given their testimony, in the most emphatic manner, in favor of Mr. Dodge's location, and their report ultimately proved the turning point in the case. After a flight of years all obstacles were finally removed, and now a magnificent triumph of engineering skill spans the "Father of Waters" at La Crosse, having been completed and put in operation during the centennial year of the republic, and the wisdom and skill of our subject have received the most flattering indorsements and commendation from the most eminent engineers of the county. The name of Mr. Dodge is indissolubly connected with that magnificent enterprise.

The panic of 1873 being followed by a persistent "granger crusade" against railroads, nearly all public works were, in that year, suspended, and the year following, our subject made an extensive tour in Europe, visiting many of the cities and monuments of art and science in that distinguished quarter of the globe. In November, 1875, he removed his family to Monroe, from Madison, where he had resided for some years, and took charge of his interest in the planing mill, which he had owned since 1867. Mr. Dodge was raised in the communion of the Methodist Church, to which his ancestors for several generations belonged, but his theological views have undergone a change; he now attends the Universalist Church. He is in politics a republican, although reared a democrat. He having, in early life, become indoctrinated with anti-slavery principles, he joined the republican party soon after its organization, and is still identified with it. On the 24th of October, 1850, Mr. Dodge married Melissa J. Marble, of North Hartland, Vt. This union has been blessed with a family of one son and three daughters:—Joseph, Marion, Florence and Mattie. In 1862, his Alma Mater conferred upon him the degree of M. A., and in 1875, the still more complimentary distinction of Ph. D., an honor worthily bestowed.

ART.

As the kindred art of poetry and music, that painting is gradually gaining a prominence in Green county, as, indeed, all over our country. That which illustrates knowledge is certainly worthy the consideration of the greatest and best of minds; and, in all ages of the world, it has received it, but not more generally than at the present time. The growing desire of the matrons of Green county to adorn their dwellings with beautiful pictures is one of the "signs of the times" of the progress of enlightened culture right here at home. The labor of the artist is more and more appreciated. This is as it should be. To the people of Green county we would say, cultivate the fine arts.

WILBER C. WOODWORTH

was born in Monroe, May 7, 1861. He is the son of W. P. Woodworth and Almira Prescott Woodworth, both of whom are now living. The subject of this sketch was educated in the schools of Monroe. He early developed a talent for drawing and received his first instruction of H. G. Austin of Monroe in colors, at about the age of eighteen years. Mr. Woodworth's first paintings were landscapes. Two paintings—Mt. Washington and Hoosatic—have attracted much attention. Portrait painting, however, with Mr. Woodworth is more of a specialty than landscape. One deserving of particular attention is an antique portrait of the mother of Mrs. A. Ludlow. Mr. Woodworth has received advantages in his artistic career in sojourning in the east, studying master-pieces and typical scenery, and in Chicago, where he has spent much time with profit. He has taught large classes in painting and drawing in Monroe, with flattering and deserved success. Mr. Woodworth is unmarried.

CHAPTER XXV.

THE NEWSPAPER PRESS OF GREEN COUNTY.

Green county had "a local habitation and a name," thirteen years and a half before any newspaper was printed within its limits. It was in April, 1850, that J. W. Snow started the first Green county paper. It was called

THE GREEN COUNTY UNION.

Subscriptions to this paper which was neutral in politics, might be paid "in cash, grain, potatoes, butter, eggs, wood, lumber, saw-logs or labor." It was published in Monroe, in Francis Emerson's stone building on the south side of the square. The first number contained this promise: "In reference to the subject of politics we shall studiously avoid injuring the feelings of any one." It started out with about 150 subscribers. It was in size 22x32 inches—a six column folio. It was first issued on Tuesdays; then changed to Wednesdays. The Union lived just a year. Its materials then fell into the hands of John W. Stewart, who, early in May, 1851, changed its name to

THE MONROE SENTINEL.

The Sentinel, the size of which was the same as the Union, was a whig paper. In five months, it was disposed of to John Walworth and O. D. Moulton, who made it an organ of the democratic party. Mr. Moulton sold his interest to Walworth, who conducted the paper as sole editor and proprietor, gradually changing its politics to republican. On Sept. 13, 1854, the paper, which had been enlarged one column at the beginning of Vol. III, was leased for one year, as appears by the following announcement:

"TO THE PUBLIC

"The undersigned having leased the office, rooms and fixtures of the Monroe Sentinel, for the term of one year from the 13th of September inst., would respectfully solicit an extended patronage. The paper will sustain the principles of freedom with what ability and earnestness we may possess. All questions involving the interests of society (political or otherwise) will be freely discussed and commented upon without fear or favor. We shall excuse no act of a public nature, that shall seem to require comment or condemnation. While we shall studiously avoid all personalities, principles and measures will be handled without gloves, or any faint-hearted fear of consequences to ourselves. We belong, in all matters interesting the public, to that public, and shall not permit our position to be prostituted to private ends.

N. L. STOUT,
G. W. TENNEY.

On the 16th of May, 1855, the lessees, Messrs. N. L. Stout and G. W. Tenney purchased the Sentinel outright as indicated by the following:

"TO THE PUBLIC.

"Having recently disposed of my interest in the Monroe Sentinel and the printing office, after a connection with it as editor and proprietor for the last three years, a due regard to a long established custom, as well as a sentiment of gratitude to the friends and patrons of the paper require at least a respectful retiring bow.

"Upon due reflection the only regret that we now feel in relation to the course pursued, and the principles advocated by the Sentinel, is that we have not accomplished more for the public good—but we have done what we could, and it has not been in vain, our political opponents being judges.

Within the last three years a man has been elected as President of the United States, who probably more than any other man, has disappointed the hopes of his best and truest friends, has with impunity trampled upon the constitutional rights of one portion of the people to promote the unconstitutional and oppressive claims of another and minor portion. And no administration that has proceeded it will stain the page of our national and political history with so many deep and dark spots of ignorance or wickedness and depravity, as that of Franklin Pierce. But these usurpations and departure from the long established democratic principles, has called forth a just deserved constitutional resistance and repudiation of the present administration, from nearly all of the free States of the Union. The rebuke has been loud and unmistakable, and from no State has it been uttered with more firmness and effect than from our own beloved Wisconsin.

Since the organizations of the republican party at the State capitol, on the 13th of July last, the political change has been unprecedented; and the triumph of liberty more complete than its most sanguine friends would dare to anticipate under circumstances so unfavorable. Every important election has resulted in the triumph of the republican party, or rather its principles. Our State legislature, a judge of the Supreme Court, our representatives in the next Congress, and a United States senator for the next six years, has already crowned the united efforts of the party, and next fall the governor and the entire State administration will be elected upon the same issue as the others, and grace the triumph of the friends of freedom over the advocates of slavery.

In this struggle the Sentinel, though a regular democratic paper, took an early and a firm stand against the Nebraska swindle, and the usurpations of the slave power, the interests and prospects of the paper were at once laid upon the altar of freedom, and in this position the paper has been sustained in this county. Of its efficiency, the public will, of course, decide.

Retiring for a time only from the perplexities, and pleasures of the editorial sanctum—though we carry away not much of the treasures of wealth, and certainly no official endowments, as the reward for our hard toil, yet we do feel a proud satisfaction, in the reflection that we have stood in truth and right—that God, and conscience and good men approve the course which we have pursued, while we have contended for the same principles (embraced in the declaration of rights), for which the fathers of the revolution fought so nobly, and bled so freely—the doctrine of the immortal Jefferson, the letter and the spirit of the constitution. As our successors, Messrs. Stout & Tenney, are already so favorably known to the readers of the Sentinel from their connection with the paper, it is unnecessary to say more than that we hope they will continue to meet and receive the public confidence, and a liberal patronage. Let Green county give its paper a good support, it is abundantly able—the paper will, in time, promote the best interests of the county.

Wishing success and prosperity to the Sentinel, its readers, and the rest of mankind—we ask leave of absence until they shall hear from us again.

“J. WALWORTH.”

TO THE FRIENDS OF THE SENTINEL.

The undersigned, having purchased the office, good will and fixtures of the Monroe Sentinel beg leave to make a statement to the public of what they intend to do, and also, what they desire their friends may do. We have now been connected with this office since the 12th of last September. The public are the judges of our course, and we leave what has been done, with that public. The course we shall pursue has been partially indicated in the past; and if we meet with proper encouragement, we shall accomplish more than has been done, and hope to meet with the support which the interests of Green county, the village of Monroe, and the principles we advocate seem, at this particular crisis to demand. There is now due the office, on the last volume something over $500. We are desirous that this debt should be promptly paid. If so, we shall be enabled to improve the Sentinel with a new dress throughout, and give a larger amount of reading matter every week. We also desire that a prompt advance payment will be made on the incoming volume. Our friends will see the necessity for prompt action and cordial support by material aid. If every one will render unto the printer the money that is due the printer, we shall be enabled to furnish our office complete with new material. Spare us from duns. At the present time the expenses attending the publication of a newspaper are enormous. All the stock for the business has recently advanced, and invariably requires cash, and the expenses of living, too, are vastly increased over what they have heretofore been, still we shall make no change in the terms of the paper. It will be furnished to subscribers as in times past—$1.50 in advance or $1.75 if paid within the year; we always preferring the advance payment. Within the next few weeks one of the undersigned will visit the different townships in this county with a view to extending the circulation of the Sentinel and we hope thereby its usefulness.

We acknowledge the courtesies of editorial brethren, and shall reciprocate them as well as we can.

In conclusion, we may properly reiterate that we are pledged, in principle, to the cause of universal liberty, and shall carefully and conscientiously live up to such a standard, and we shall endeavor to make our paper of local importance to the citizens of Green county, as well as a medium of news proportioned to our journal.

N. L. STOUT,
G. W. TENNEY.

On the 12th day of September, 1855 the Sentinel contained the following announcement:

TO OUR PATRONS.
